START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

DECEMBER 1993

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-002

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 2

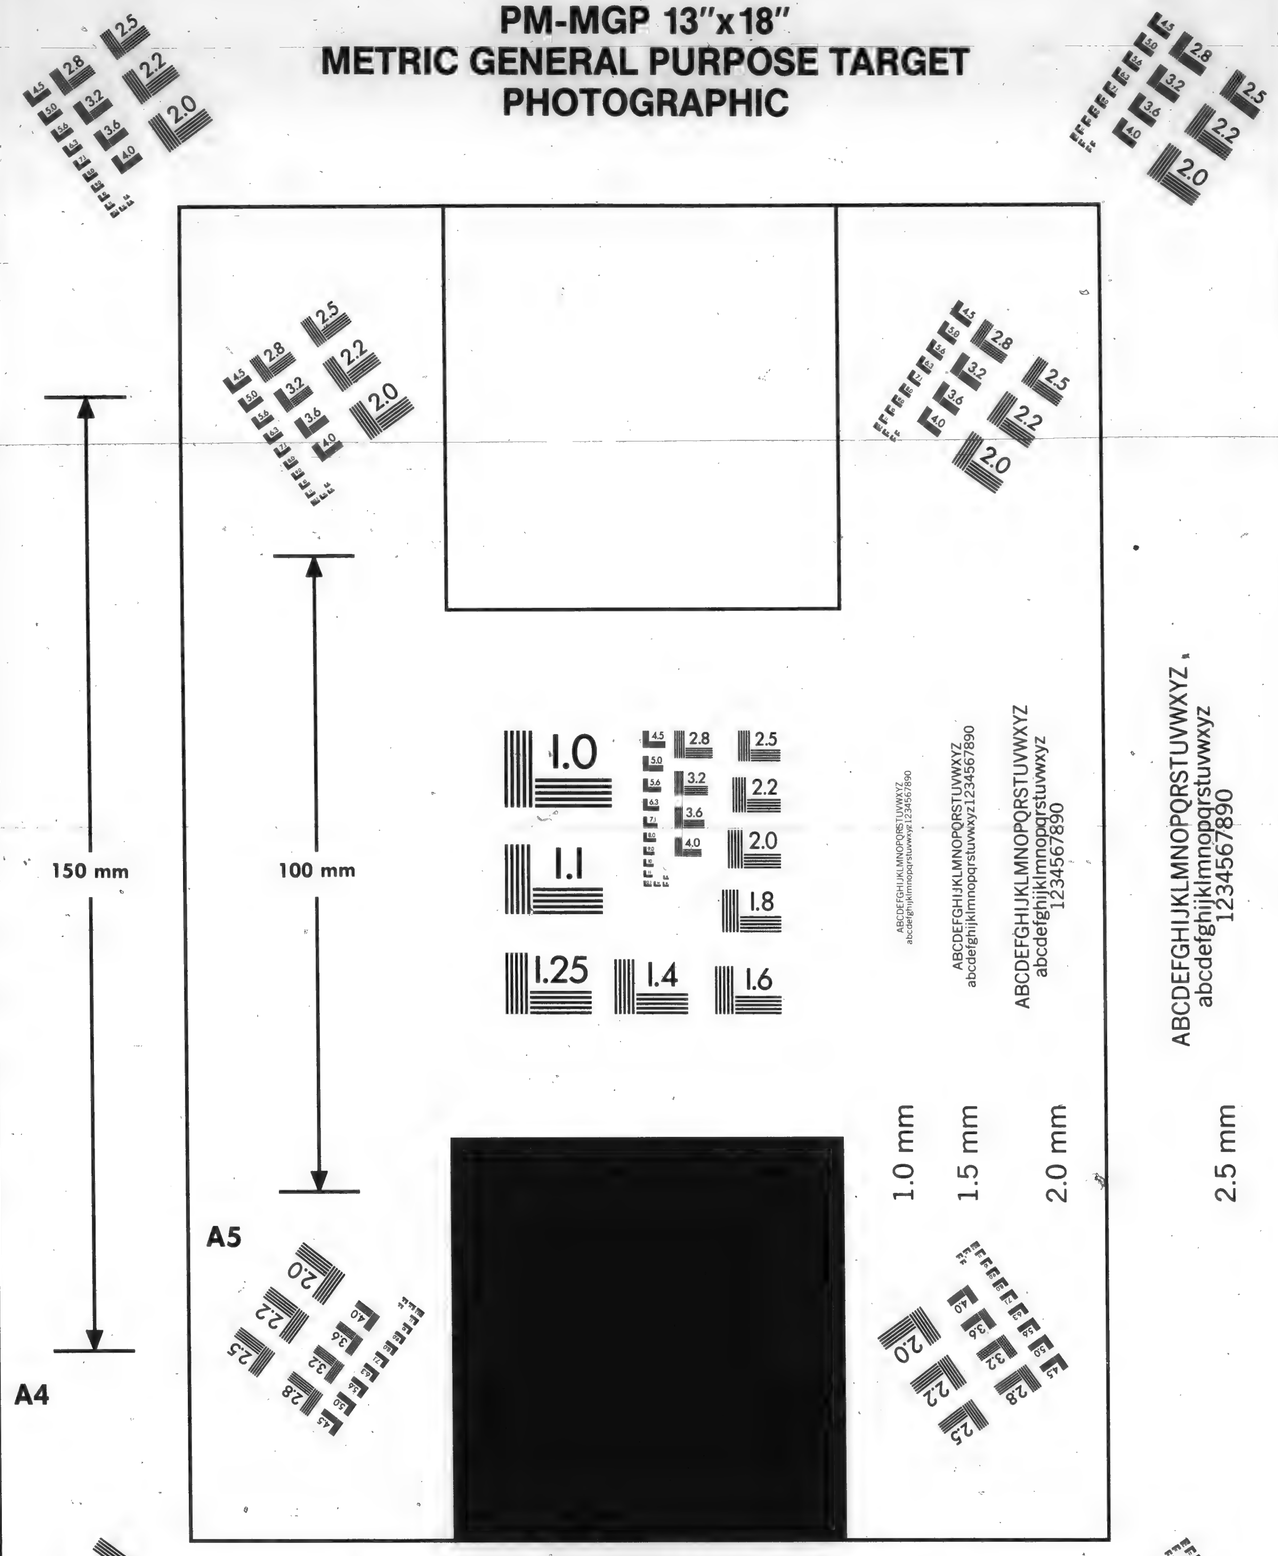
Volume 2

BSO, Kneisel
1890-1891

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 2

BSO
KNEISEL QUARTET

1890 - 1891

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

9.91 Sample

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TENTH SEASON.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(85 PERFORMERS,)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 11, 1890, TO APRIL 25, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 15, DEC. 13, 1890, JAN. 17, FEB. 28, AND MARCH 28, 1891, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 10, 1890, TO APRIL 24, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 14, DEC. 12, 1890, JAN. 16, FEB. 27, AND MARCH 27, 1891.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, September 15th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 16th, at 10, A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17th.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 18th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, September 19th, at 10, A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office, on and after Saturday, September 20th.

The Symphony Concerts---Some New "Bostonians."

The Symphony Tickets All to Be Sold at Auction—Novelties in the Bostonians' Repertoire—The Season's Promises—News Notes, Comment and Gossip About Current Events.

The near approach of the annual sale of seats for the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra has already stirred the musical public of this city, scattered though its members be throughout the summer resorts of New England and in more distant places. Evidences of the remarkable hold these concerts have upon the patrons of music have never been more pronounced than now, and those who have for years made it a business to act for absent, but would-be buyers of tickets, are already well stocked with orders to purchase. All the doubt and uncertainty which was felt in certain quarters a year ago, when Mr. Arthur Nikisch was unknown in this country, save by reputation, have vanished, and today the Symphony concerts have an additional strength as an attraction in the personal following of the conductor, a factor in insuring their continued success which cannot easily be overestimated. It would be difficult to recall a more notable victory won by an artist in this country than that which resulted from the devoted labors of Mr. Arthur Nikisch in his direction of the Boston orchestra last season, and it would be equally difficult to instance an artistic triumph so honestly achieved. He has so thoroughly identified himself with the organization, and has shown himself so ready to meet his American audiences with liberality, intelligence, and, above all, good nature, that his personal popularity, wherever his appearances have been made, either in the home concerts or in other cities, is entirely unprecedented. Although he has given himself a well earned vacation in Europe since the season closed last May, he has by no means forgotten his American patrons, and advices received from him of recent date give rare promise for the concerts of the coming season. He has collected a large number of compositions of more or less importance from the modern composers' works, and his programmes of the coming winter will be enriched by many orchestral gems which have had no previous hearing in America. It is a source of great gratification to be able to state that the 85 men of the orchestra will be practically the same as during last season, so that there is no cause for doubt as to the results of the coming series of concerts. The vexed questions concerning the sales of seats for these concerts will be settled in the most satisfactory way by the arrangements made for the disposal of the seats for the coming season, as the public will be put upon an equal footing as regards all the tickets to be sold, as all the seats in the entire house, both for the public rehearsals and the concerts, will be put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder, whatever the premium. This plan will remove many unpleasant and annoying incidents attendant upon the sales of former years, for which, however, the managers were in no way responsible, and will put the tickets in the hands of the concert patrons at their exact value, which is "what they will fetch." The scale of prices for season tickets for each series will be the same already established—$12 and $7.50, according to location—and there will be no change in the division of the house from that of last year. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any tickets for the public rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sales will be sold at the box office, Music Hall, on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore. During the season the orchestra will give the usual performances in other cities, including a series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cambridge, Providence and New Haven, and at the close of the Boston season will make its annual western tour. So great has become the popularity of the organization in the West that nearly all the concerts to be given on the tour are already guaranteed. The Boston concerts will number 24 as usual, and will be begun on Saturday evening, Oct. 11, and will be continued on consecutive Saturday evenings, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons of the same weeks.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, AUGUST [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Interesting Details of the Approaching Season—Auction Sale Announced.

The arrangements for the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra are well advanced, and the numerous inquiries daily received at Music Hall indicate no falling off in the public interest in this splendid series of concerts.

Conductor Nikisch has been spending the summer in Europe, where he has secured such novelties as he was able to find worthy of a place in his programme. He has engaged one or two new artists for the orchestra, but the membership will remain practically the same as last year.

The Boston season will, as usual, consist of 24 concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 11, (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28), and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons in the same weeks.

The scale of prices will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. All the reserved seats will this year be sold at auction, an arrangement which cannot fail to be most satisfactory to patrons, as it will do away entirely with the annoyance of the tedious wait in line for a box office sale.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m., and the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any tickets for the rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sale will be sold at the box office on Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m., and the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

Any seats not taken at the auction sales will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. The seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, but will be available for purchasers of admission tickets, as heretofore.

Clipping from Evening New Bedford Journal

Date 8/30

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steps are being taken to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two concerts this coming season by the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association. Should the project meet with sufficient encouragement, the concerts will be given in the Opera House the latter part of October or November and in March. The proceeds, if any above expenses, will be devoted to furnishing the Y. M. C. A. Hall in the new building. The price of tickets for the two concerts will be about $2.50, including reserved seats. The committee should know by the latter part of next week how many wish to subscribe for the course. A meeting will be held Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock to decide upon plans of work and open a subscription list for those who wish to attend. Fully 700 tickets should be subscribed for to insure the success of the enterprise. Secretary Lougee has already secured subscriptions for 60 tickets.

Standard, New Bedford, [illegible]

Date 9/

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—A meeting of the committee on the Symphony orchestra concerts was held yesterday afternoon in the Y. M. C. A. rooms. This committee consists of Charles S. Kelley, Ellis L. Howland, William H. Wood, Hay Greene Huling, George Needham and W. E. Lougee, and Misses Lucy Milliken, Henrietta Burt, Mary Sanford, Jennie Denison and Lizzie Rugg. The project of giving the proposed concerts was discussed, and it was decided to vigorously push the canvass. It is necessary that the committee should know by the end of the present week who will take tickets. About 200 have already been subscribed for, and the prospect is that the enterprise will be a success. In addition to the orchestra a soloist will be engaged, but it is undecided as yet whether a vocalist, pianist or violinist will be secured. Whatever the decision may be, the public will undoubtedly be served a rare musical treat. There will be two concerts, probably the last part of November and early part of March. The price of tickets for both concerts will be $2.50, and subscribers will have first choice of seats.

Standard, New Bedford, [illegible]

Date 8/2

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Our music loving people will be glad to know that steps are being taken to secure the orchestra for two concerts this coming season, by the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association. Should the project meet with sufficient encouragement, the concerts will be given in the Opera House the latter part of October or November, and in March. The proceeds, if any above expenses, will be devoted to furnishing the Y. M. C. A. Hall in the new building. The price of tickets for the two concerts will be about $2.50, including reserved seats. The committee should know by the latter part of next week how many wish to subscribe for the course. A meeting will be held Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock, to decide upon plans of work and open a subscription list for those who wish to attend. Fully 700 tickets should be subscribed for to insure the success of the enter-

---

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1890

With a full recollection of the great confusion which attended the sale of tickets for the symphony orchestra concerts last season in mind, and all the dissatisfaction which arose from it among the patrons of the concert, the management will this year avoid a repetition of all that by selling all the seats at auction. It is hoped that as far as possible all those who wish to avail themselves of the concerts will attend one of the sales, as it is felt by the management that more satisfaction will be given the public if the scenes which occurred last year in Winter place could be avoided. It rests with the public.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The concerts of the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to begin in Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. A. Nikisch, Oct. 11, and will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings until April 25. The public rehearsals will begin Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, ending April 24. The auction sale of seats for the rehearsals will take place in Music Hall Monday morning, Sept. 15, and Tuesday morning, Sept. 16. The sale of seats for the concerts will take place Thursday morning, Sept. 18, and Friday morning, Sept. 19. Full particulars of the conditions attending these sales will be found in the advertisement in another column, to which attention is called.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(85 PERFORMERS)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1816.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 8, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

s8 9 13

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1890.

Seats for the symphony rehearsals go on sale at auction next Monday and Tuesday, at Music Hall; and the seats for the symphony concerts will be sold in the same way and at the same place on Thursday and Friday. All the seats will be offered at these sales.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TENTH SEASON.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(85 PERFORMERS,)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 11, 1890, TO APRIL 25, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 15, DEC. 13, 1890, JAN. 17, FEB. 28, AND MARCH 28, 1891, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 10, 1890, TO APRIL 24, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 14, DEC. 12, 1890, JAN. 16, FEB. 27, AND MARCH 27, 1891.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, September 15th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 16th, at 10, A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17th.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 18th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, September 19th, at 10, A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office, on and after Saturday, September 20th.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, AUGUST 31, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts---Some New "Bostonians."

The Symphony Tickets All to Be Sold at Auction—Novelties in the Bostonians' Repertoire—The Season's Promises—News Notes, Comment and Gossip About Current Events.

The near approach of the annual sale of seats for the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra has already stirred the musical public of this city, scattered though its members be throughout the summer resorts of New England and in more distant places. Evidences of the remarkable hold these concerts have upon the patrons of music have never been more pronounced than now, and those who have for years made it a business to act for absent, but would-be buyers of tickets, are already well stocked with orders to purchase. All the doubt and uncertainty which was felt in certain quarters a year ago, when Mr. Arthur Nikisch was unknown in this country, save by reputation, have vanished, and today the Symphony concerts have an additional strength as an attraction in the personal following of the conductor, a factor in insuring their continued success which cannot easily be overestimated. It would be difficult to recall a more notable victory won by an artist in this country than that which resulted from the devoted labors of Mr. Arthur Nikisch in his direction of the Boston orchestra last season, and it would be equally difficult to instance an artistic triumph so honestly achieved. He has so thoroughly identified himself with the organization, and has shown himself so ready to meet his American audiences with liberality, intelligence, and, above all, good nature, that his personal popularity, wherever his appearances have been made, either in the home concerts or in other cities, is entirely unprecedented. Although he has given himself a well earned vacation in Europe since the season closed last May, he has by no means forgotten his American patrons, and advices received from him of recent date give rare promise for the concerts of the coming season. He has collected a large number of compositions of more or less importance from the modern composers' works, and his programmes of the coming winter will be enriched by many orchestral gems which have had no previous hearing in America. It is a source of great gratification to be able to state that the 85 men of the orchestra will be practically the same as during last season, so that there is no cause for doubt as to the results of the coming series of concerts. The vexed questions concerning the sales of seats for these concerts will be settled in the most satisfactory way by the arrangements made for the disposal of the seats for the coming season, as the public will be put upon an equal footing as regards all the tickets to be sold, as all the seats in the entire house, both for the public rehearsals and the concerts, will be put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder, whatever the premium. This plan will remove many unpleasant and annoying incidents attendant upon the sales of former years, for which, however, the managers were in no way responsible, and will put the tickets in the hands of the concert patrons at their exact value, which is "what they will fetch." The scale of prices for season tickets for each series will be the same as already established—$12 and $7.50, according to location—and there will be no change in the division of the house from that of last year. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at th same place on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any tickets for the public rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sales will be sold at the box office, Music Hall, on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore. During the season the orchestra will give the usual performances in other cities, including a series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cambridge, Providence and New Haven, and at the close of the Boston season will make its annual western tour. So great has become the popularity of the organization in the West that nearly all the concerts to be given on the tour are already guaranteed. The Boston concerts will number 24 as usual, and will be begun on Saturday evening, Oct. 11, and will be continued on consecutive Saturday evenings, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons of the same weeks.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 31, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Interesting Details of the Approaching Season—Auction Sale Announced.

The arrangements for the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra are well advanced, and the numerous inquiries daily received at Music Hall indicate no falling off in the public interest in this splendid series of concerts.

Conductor Nikisch has been spending the summer in Europe, where he has secured such novelties as he was able to find worthy of a place in his programme. He has engaged one or two new artists for the orchestra, but the membership will remain practically the same as last year.

The Boston season will, as usual, consist of 24 concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 11, (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28), and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons in the same weeks.

The scale of prices will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. All the reserved seats will this year be sold at auction, an arrangement which cannot fail to be most satisfactory to patrons, as it will do away entirely with the annoyance of the tedious wait in line for a box office sale.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m., and the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m.

Any tickets for the rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sale will be sold at the box office on Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m., and the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

Any seats not taken at the auction sales will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. The seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, but will be available for purchasers of admission tickets, as heretofore.

Clipping from Evening New Bedford Journal

Date 8/30

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steps are being taken to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two concerts this coming season by the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association. Should the project meet with sufficient encouragement, the concerts will be given in the Opera House the latter part of October or November and in March. The proceeds, if any above expenses, will be devoted to furnishing the Y. M. C. A. Hall in the new building. The price of tickets for the two concerts will be about $2.50, including reserved seats. The committee should know by the latter part of next week how many wish to subscribe for the course. A meeting will be held Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock to decide upon plans of work and open a subscription list for those who wish to attend. Fully 700 tickets should be subscribed for to insure the success of the enterprise. Secretary Lougee has already secured subscriptions for 60 tickets.

Clipping from Standard, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/2

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—A meeting of the committee on the Symphony orchestra concerts was held yesterday afternoon in the Y. M. C. A. rooms. This committee consists of Charles S. Kelley, Ellis L. Howland, William H. Wood, Ray Greene Huling, George Needham and W. E. Lougee, and Misses Lucy Milliken, Henrietta Burt, Mary Sanford, Jennie Denison and Lizzie Rugg. The project of giving the proposed concerts was discussed, and it was decided to vigorously push the canvass. It is necessary that the committee should know by the end of the present week who will take tickets. About 200 have already been subscribed for, and the prospect is that the enterprise will be a success. In addition to the orchestra a soloist will be engaged, but it is undecided as yet whether a vocalist, pianist or violinist will be secured. Whatever the decision may be, the public will undoubtedly be served a rare musical treat. There will be two concerts, probably the last part of November and early part of March. The price of tickets for both concerts will be $2.50, and subscribers will have first choice of seats.

Standard, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 8/2

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Our music loving people will be glad to know that steps are being taken to secure the orchestra for two concerts this coming season, by the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association. Should the project meet with sufficient encouragement, the concerts will be given in the Opera House the latter part of October or November, and in March. The proceeds, if any above expenses, will be devoted to furnishing the Y. M. C. A. Hall in the new building. The price of tickets for the two concerts will be about $2.50, including reserved seats. The committee should know by the latter part of next week how many wish to subscribe for the course. A meeting will be held Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock, to decide upon plans of work and open a subscription list for those who wish to attend. Fully 700 tickets should be subscribed for to insure the success of the enter-

---

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1890

With a full recollection of the great confusion which attended the sale of tickets for the symphony orchestra concerts last season in mind, and all the dissatisfaction which arose from it among the patrons of the concert, the management will this year avoid a repetition of all that by selling all the seats at auction. It is hoped that as far as possible all those who wish to avail themselves of the concerts will attend one of the sales, as it is felt by the management that more satisfaction will be given the public if the scenes which occurred last year in Winter place could be avoided. It rests with the public.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The concerts of the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to begin in Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. A. Nikisch, Oct. 11, and will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings until April 25. The public rehearsals will begin Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, ending April 24. The auction sale of seats for the rehearsals will take place in Music Hall Monday morning, Sept. 15, and Tuesday morning, Sept. 16. The sale of seats for the concerts will take place Thursday morning, Sept. 18, and Friday morning, Sept. 19. Full particulars of the conditions attending these sales will be found in the advertisement in another column, to which attention is called.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(85 PERFORMERS)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 8, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

85 PERFORMERS.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 15, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

ss 9 13

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1890.

Seats for the symphony rehearsals go on sale at auction next Monday and Tuesday, at Music Hall; and the seats for the symphony concerts will be sold in the same way and at the same place on Thursday and Friday. All the seats will be offered at these sales.

[3]

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPT. 7, 1890.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
TENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

85 PERFORMERS,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCT. 11, 1890, TO APRIL 25, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 15, DEC. 13, 1890, JAN. 17, FEB. 28 AND MARCH 28, 1891, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 10, 1890, TO APRIL 24, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 14, DEC. 12, 1890, JAN. 16, FEB. 27 AND MARCH 27, 1891.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.
All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office, on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It is somewhat interesting to read again the comments made 10 years ago concerning the action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in establishing the Boston Symphony orchestra, and compare the predictions then made with the accomplished results of this great local institution. Those who expressed doubts of the permanency of the organization were amply justified in their position in the light of previous experiences in orchestral endeavor in this city, but they failed to fully grasp the character of the man who assumed the duty of founding the Boston orchestra. Mr. Higginson said at that time that he looked upon the orchestral enterprise exactly the same as if he had decided to add another department to Harvard University; and that his intention was to acknowledge his loyalty to Boston and her institutions by giving the musical public opportunities to gain a knowledge of all that is best in orchestral composition, just as the students of the law, divinity, medical and other schools benefit by their founding. How well he has carried out this intention is best proven by the widespread interest in the Symphony concerts of the day. This interest has been healthily and steadily developed, and is now shared in so generally that the opportunities to attend the concerts have became a source for a competitive sale of seats of unprecedented extent. Without doubt the personal popularity gained by Mr. Arthur Nikisch during last season will add a new element in the interest felt in the concerts of the coming months, and the knowledge he has sought and gained of the demands of American audiences gives ample assurance of the satisfactory character of the concert programmes, which are said to be already completed for the season. The soloists who will participate in the concerts have not yet been fully decided upon, but Mr. Theodore Reichmann and a few other equally strong names are announced in the earlier engagements of the season. All who intend purchasing tickets for the season should remember that all the seats, both for the rehearsals and concerts, will be offered at auction this year, thus giving an equal opportunity to every one desiring to attend the concerts. The plans for this sale are as follows: The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats will be sold on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office, on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

BOSTON HERALD.
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1890.
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Tenth Season.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, SEPT. 8.
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor
TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, 1891, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.
MThS 48

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 8, 1890.
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor
TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 8, 1890.
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.
MWS sep8

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 7, 1890.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been spending the summer vacation time at Ischl, a famous Austrian watering place. He will sail for America about the 15th inst.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will probably bring his family with him to this country.

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts.

No events of the musical year in our city are looked forward to with more delightful anticipation by all classes of music lovers than the concerts of our peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has become one of our institutions. The coming season will consist, as usual, of 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals. The prices of season tickets for each series will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall next Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Tuesday, and the concert seats will be sold in the same manner on Thursday and Friday of next week.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 9, 1890.

The Music Hall auction sales of Symphony Concert and Rehearsal tickets takes place on Monday and Tuesday and Thursday and Friday of next week, the full particulars of the sales being given in the advertising columns.

Boston Post
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra excites the liveliest interest among the thousands of music lovers in Boston and its vicinity, to whom these concerts have become almost a necessity, embodying, as they do, all that is greatest and best in the divine art of music. It is almost superfluous at this period in the history of this splendid organization to call attention to its complete equipment in all departments for a worthy and adequate presentation of the works of the great masters. Season tickets for the series of twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall next week. Full details of the sales may be found in the advertisement which appears in another column.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 10.

Symphony Concert Tickets.

Next week come the auction sales of tickets for the 10th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall. Music lovers do not need to be reminded of the excellence of this organization, whose fame has become national. Full details of the sale of tickets, etc., are given in the advertisement in another column.

BOSTON HERALD.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 10, 1890.

The orders for purchases of symphony rehearsal and concert tickets are coming in to the agents in this line of purchases with unusual freedom, and the auction sales at Music Hall next week promise to be the scene of many sharp competitions for the choice seats.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As the time of the opening of the musical season approaches, the enterprise of all others which claims the interest of musicians, amateurs and the public alike is the series of concerts to be given by our superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all indications point to an even more successful and interesting season than ever. To one who can appreciate even in a moderate degree the work which this orchestra is doing, not only as a purveyor of the highest class of musical entertainment, but also as an educational force of the greatest value in a musical community—the success which has attended these concerts in all the large cities seems but natural. The season ticket sales for the coming series will be held at Music Hall next week. Full details may be found this morning in the advertisement.

BOSTON POST
SEPTEMBER 10.

THE NUMBER OF ORDERS for tickets to the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now in the hands of the regular purchasing agents in this line indicate a sharp competition for choice seats at the Music Hall auction sales next week. The rehearsal tickets will be offered on Monday and Tuesday, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday.

Boston Daily Traveller
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 10, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 24 concerts and as many public rehearsals for the tenth season in the Music Hall as follows: Public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, and continued at weekly intervals with the exceptions of Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27. Concerts on Saturday nights beginning Oct. 11, and continued at weekly intervals with the exceptions of Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be conductor, and the orchestra will number 85 players. It has been decided to offer all the reserved seats with season tickets at auction, after this manner: The prices for either series will be the same as last season, $12 and $7.50 according to position, and there will be no change in the division of the house. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction in the Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A.M. Season tickets for the rehearsals not taken at the auction will be sold at the office on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be offered at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

85 PERFORMERS.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCT. 11, 1890, TO APRIL 25, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 15, DEC. 13, 1890, JAN. 17, FEB. 28 AND MARCH 28, 1891, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 10, 1890, TO APRIL 24, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 14, DEC. 12, 1890, JAN. 16, FEB. 27 AND MARCH 27, 1891.

Tickets for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the REHEARSALS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the REHEARSALS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 Seats for the CONCERTS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the CONCERTS will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.
The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE RESOLD.
All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auction Sale of Tickets for the Tenth Season Soon to Begin.

A reminder of the near approach of the opening of the musical season is the announcement of the sale of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be read with interest by the musical public all over New England. The number of performances will be the same as last year—24 in each series. This year, for the first time, the $7.50 as well as the $12 tickets will be sold by auction. The sales will take place at Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock each day. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 15, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 16. On Wednesday, Sept. 17, any rehearsal seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 18, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 19. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. Patrons will do well to attend the auction sales personally as far as possible. Ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases.

Conductor Nikisch will arrive before the end of September, bringing with him considerable additions to the library of the orchestra, and will begin his rehearsals on Oct. 2. The outlook for the season is most promising, and there are indications of a greater public interest than ever before.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its tenth season in the Music Hall on Friday, Oct. 1, public rehearsal, and Saturday, Oct. 11, concert. The following are the appointments for the sale of season tickets: Public rehearsals—Sept. 15, $10 seats, auction; Sept. 16, $7.50 seats, auction; Sept. 17, seats unsold at auction at ticket office. Concerts—Sept. 18, $10 seats, auction; Sept. 19, $7.50 seats, auction; Sept. 20, seats unsold at auction, at ticket office. The auction sales will be held in Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891; and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 7, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

MR. ARTHUR, NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct, 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in a like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THEIR EDUCATIONAL VALUE—MR. NIKISCH AND MR. GERICKE.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming course of Symphony concerts is a forcible reminder that summer is over and that the musical season is close at hand. A year ago Boston was in a state of high excitement over the expected advent of the new conductor, who was to take the baton laid down by Mr. Gericke and lead our splendid orchestra to heights that had never before been attained by them under his predecessor. Under Mr. Nikisch the patrons of the concerts were to be favored with model programmes, and with an originality and breadth of conception of the works of the masters as had previously been unknown in our city. Of one thing in particular they were fully assured: there could be no doubt but that he would accomplish one feat that Mr. Gericke had at least been exceedingly chary of performing—that of "letting out the brass." In fact there were all sorts of rumors and statements in circulation, many of which in the course of the winter were proved to have been absurd; and in all likelihood no one, if he could have realized the nature of the expectations thus aroused, would have regretted it more sincerely than Mr. Nikisch. The result of all this fever of anticipation was an unheard-of demand for tickets, and phenomenal prices at the auction sales. As to the concerts, the balance was so unevenly maintained between the fulfillment of these expectations and many unlooked for disappointments as to give rise to more confident assertion than ever before by some people, who, although deeply interested in the musical welfare of Boston, have always seemed to regard them with suspicion—that at last it had seen their best days. It is to show why this is quite improbable, and to recall to the minds of would-be patrons of the coming season its true purpose, that this article is written.

Any thoughtful person who hears for the first time of the scheme of the Boston Symphony Concerts can hardly fail to come to the conclusion that their mission must be, of necessity, purely educational. A few such concerts, given during a winter, may not improperly be regarded in the light of refined entertainment. But a course of twenty-four, given weekly, must soon cease to become entertaining, in the accepted sense of the term, and take on instead the form of a regular course of musical instruction. No persons, however indifferent or unmusical, can attend such a series constantly, without finding themselves involuntarily trying with more and more earnestness to comprehend what is going on. In addition, their ears gradually become so thoroughly accustomed to music and performances of the highest class, that inferior music and inadequate performances will soon grow to a large degree intolerable to them.

It is evident that the importance of the relation of the present to the coming generation is not to be overlooked in music any more than in other departments of education. All teachers of this art know the disadvantages they labor under, when they have to deal with the musical children of unmusical parents; and as this condition of things is nowadays more prevalent than otherwise, it can readily be seen that any institution that tends to remedy it, is, if for no other reason, worthy of the highest praise and sincerest support.

However the Symphony concerts may have been regarded at the outset, there can be no reasonable doubt that their present prosperity is really due to their value as a means of education, rather than to their power of creating momentary pleasure. They are eagerly anticipated by a very large number of cultivated people of Boston and vicinity, who will in all probability continue to take a deep interest in them as long as their present high standard is maintained.

Even in the event of their becoming no longer fashionable, it is impossible to believe that the places made vacant by followers of the fickle goddess would not be quickly filled. There might result to the management a loss in premiums, but it is fair to presume that such a loss would not produce any change in their character or quality; for Mr. Higginson, when he established them, could not possibly have foreseen the course they have since taken, and consequently could not have counted on the great help the premiums have been in keeping down the yearly deficit.

With respect to Mr. Nikisch and his success and lack of it last winter, it seems clear now that he was placed at as great a disadvantage as Mr. Gericke was during the first part of his engagement: that is, he was as much over-rated as his predecessor was under-rated. Mr. Gericke had everything to do when he took the leadership, for the reason that the first three years of the existence of the orchestra were purely experimental. A man of ideas and faithful to a high ideal, he had to make it clear that a thorough reorganization was necessary before that which he deemed worthy of the institution and himself could be accomplished. This done, he proceeded on his way toward his chosen goal with as much loyalty and forgetfulness of self as it is given most men to show.

It is easy to recall the results of his faithfulness; how, year after year he labored, until his efforts were finally crowned with the tremendous success of his last two seasons; how the fame of his band spread abroad until the demand for tickets became unprecedented. Every one felt that he was doing magnificent work. And yet, the love of change is so inborn with most people, that, notwithstanding this evident appreciation, the eagerness with which the glowing accounts of Mr. Nikisch were received was sure proof that he had not been estimated at his true worth.

It has been said of Mr Gericke that he was a great drill-master, but not a great interpreter. There is, without doubt, plenty of truth in the first assertion, and plenty of room for argument over the last. One thing however is certain: the value of his work as a whole, and his influence on the thousands that listened to his splendid examples of ensemble playing and artistic and conservative readings of the masters cannot be over-estimated.

The noble music in which Mr. Gericke performed his part can as plainly be seen now as can the failure of Mr. Nikisch to justify wholly the expectations that were aroused concerning him. But if the latter's conceptions, and lack of care in maintaining the technical excellence of the orchestra were subject to much adverse comment, so also were the former's first efforts. It is said that Mr. Nikisch is sensitive to criticism. However that may be, the performances under his direction present at this time a curious spectacle of ups and downs. For some time there was a steady falling off in accuracy and finish; and the audiences were treated to certain interpretations, which could at the time only be accounted for when his former intimate connection with the opera at Leipsic was taken into consideration.

But we have now a dim suspicion that other things may have influenced him strongly. Mr. Nikisch, although extremely talented, is also extremely young for the position he holds. It seems improbable that he could have fully realized before he came here the nature of the institution of which he was to be the autocratic leader. Being a man of boundless imagination and ambition, when he discovered the true state of affairs—this mine of wealth as it were, which was placed at his disposal, what could be more natural than that he should have desired to work it for his own benefit? In other words, his audiences were most likely the victims of not a few experiments on his part. Perhaps, too, he labored under the impression that nothing short of loud and sensational readings would suit us Americans.

Whether these suppositions are correct or not, before the end of the season a marked improvement in the performances was noticeable, which seemed at least to indicate that he was getting more thoroughly accustomed to the atmosphere of the concert room than he had been in Leipsic.

That Mr. Nikisch possesses rare talent is unquestionable. And it will be to his friends, whose number already is legion, the saddest of surprises if, having sown his wild oats last year, he does not proceed to put the orchestra and their performances on the high plane that he was expected to do at the very commencement of his first season. There can be scarcely a doubt but that he will accomplish all this, and that the end of his term will find him indissolubly identified with another step in the progress of music in Boston.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, SEPT. 8, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16 Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a.m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a.m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a.m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a.m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. 8,11,13 sep8

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 11, 1890.

THE Symphony concerts of Boston are going to take the belt awarded by Fashion, as usual, this year. Their favor in this respect increases. It will cost more money than ever for the better seats, but the public is willing to pay it, and it is very fortunate that Fashion has this time given its sanction to something so highly artistic and otherwise meritorious.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1890.

——Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, is due here on September 28 on the Lahn from Bremen.

——Fred. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work.

——Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be at one of the first violin stands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

——Ad. M. Foerster, the well-known Pittsburgh

Boston Sunday Globe, SUNDAY, SEPT. 7, 1890.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

85 PERFORMERS.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCT. 11, 1890, TO APRIL 25, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 15, DEC. 13, 1890, JAN. 17, FEB. 28 AND MARCH 28, 1891, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 10, 1890, TO APRIL 24, 1891, OMITTING NOV. 14, DEC. 12, 1890, JAN. 16, FEB. 27 AND MARCH 27, 1891.

Tickets for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the REHEARSALS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the REHEARSALS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 Seats for the CONCERTS will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the CONCERTS will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.
The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE RESOLD.
All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auction Sale of Tickets for the Tenth Season Soon to Begin.

A reminder of the near approach of the opening of the musical season is the announcement of the sale of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be read with interest by the musical public all over New England. The number of performances will be the same as last year—24 in each series. This year, for the first time, the $7.50 as well as the $12 tickets will be sold by auction. The sales will take place at Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock each day. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 15, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 16. On Wednesday, Sept. 17, any rehearsal seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 18, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 19. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. Patrons will do well to attend the auction sales personally as far as possible. Ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases.

Conductor Nikisch will arrive before the end of September, bringing with him considerable additions to the library of the orchestra, and will begin his rehearsals on Oct. 2. The outlook for the season is most promising, and there are indications of a greater public interest than ever before.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its tenth season in the Music Hall on Friday, Oct. 1, public rehearsal, and Saturday, Oct. 11, concert. The following are the appointments for the sale of season tickets: Public rehearsals—Sept. 15, $10 seats, auction; Sept. 16, $7.50 seats, auction; Sept. 17, seats unsold at auction at ticket office. Concerts—Sept. 18, $10 seats, auction; Sept. 19, $7.50 seats, auction; Sept. 20, seats unsold at auction, at ticket office. The auction sales will be held in Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891; and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 7, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

MR. ARTHUR, NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct, 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at aution, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in a like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THEIR EDUCATIONAL VALUE—MR. NIKISCH AND MR. GERICKE.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming course of Symphony concerts is a forcible reminder that summer is over and that the musical season is close at hand. A year ago Boston was in a state of high excitement over the expected advent of the new conductor, who was to take the baton laid down by Mr. Gericke and lead our splendid orchestra to heights that had never before been attained by them under his predecessor. Under Mr. Nikisch the patrons of the concerts were to be favored with model programmes, and with an originality and breadth of conception of the works of the masters as had previously been unknown in our city. Of one thing in particular they were fully assured: there could be no doubt but that he would accomplish one feat that Mr. Gericke had at least been exceedingly chary of performing—that of "letting out the brass." In fact there were all sorts of rumors and statements in circulation, many of which in the course of the winter were proved to have been absurd; and in all likelihood no one, if he could have realized the nature of the expectations thus aroused, would have regretted it more sincerely than Mr. Nikisch. The result of all this fever of anticipation was an unheard-of demand for tickets, and phenomenal prices at the auction sales. As to the concerts, the balance was so unevenly maintained between the fulfillment of these expectations and many unlooked for disappointments as to give rise to more confident assertion than ever before by some people, who, although deeply interested in the musical welfare of Boston, have always seemed to regard them with suspicion—that at last it had seen their best days. It is to show why this is quite improbable, and to recall to the minds of would-be patrons of the coming season its true purpose, that this article is written.

Any thoughtful person who hears for the first time of the scheme of the Boston Symphony Concerts can hardly fail to come to the conclusion that their mission must be, of necessity, purely educational. A few such concerts, given during a winter, may not improperly be regarded in the light of refined entertainment. But a course of twenty-four, given weekly, must soon cease to become entertaining, in the accepted sense of the term, and take on instead the form of a regular course of musical instruction. No persons, however indifferent or unmusical, can attend such a series constantly, without finding themselves involuntarily trying with more and more earnestness to comprehend what is going on. In addition, their ears gradually become so thoroughly accustomed to music and performances of the highest class, that inferior music and inadequate performances will soon grow to a large degree intolerable to them.

It is evident that the importance of the relation of the present to the coming generation is not to be overlooked in music any more than in other departments of education. All teachers of this art know the disadvantages they labor under, when they have to deal with the musical children of unmusical parents; and as this condition of things is nowadays more prevalent than otherwise, it can readily be seen that any institution that tends to remedy it, is, if for no other reason, worthy of the highest praise and sincerest support.

However the Symphony concerts may have been regarded at the outset, there can be no reasonable doubt that their present prosperity is really due to their value as a means of education, rather than to their power of creating momentary pleasure. They are eagerly anticipated by a very large number of cultivated people of Boston and vicinity, who will in all probability continue to take a deep interest in them as long as their present high standard is maintained.

Even in the event of their becoming no longer fashionable, it is impossible to believe that the places made vacant by followers of the fickle goddess would not be quickly filled. There might result to the management a loss in premiums, but it is fair to presume that such a loss would not produce any change in their character or quality; for Mr. Higginson, when he established them, could not possibly have foreseen the course they have since taken, and consequently could not have counted on the great help the premiums have been in keeping down the yearly deficit.

With respect to Mr. Nikisch and his success and lack of it last winter, it seems clear now that he was placed at as great a disadvantage as Mr. Gericke was during the first part of his engagement: that is, he was as much over-rated as his predecessor was under-rated. Mr. Gericke had everything to do when he took the leadership, for the reason that the first three years of the existence of the orchestra were purely experimental. A man of ideas and faithful to a high ideal, he had to make it clear that a thorough reorganization was necessary before that which he deemed worthy of the institution and himself could be accomplished. This done, he proceeded on his way toward his chosen goal with as much loyalty and forgetfulness of self as it is given most men to show.

It is easy to recall the results of his faithfulness; how, year after year he labored, until his efforts were finally crowned with the tremendous success of his last two seasons; how the fame of his band spread abroad until the demand for tickets became unprecedented. Every one felt that he was doing magnificent work. And yet, the love of change is so inborn with most people, that, notwithstanding this evident appreciation, the eagerness with which the glowing accounts of Mr. Nikisch were received was sure proof that he had not been estimated at his true worth.

It has been said of Mr Gericke that he was a great drill-master, but not a great interpreter. There is, without doubt, plenty of truth in the first assertion, and plenty of room for argument over the last. One thing however is certain: the value of his work as a whole, and his influence on the thousands that listened to his splendid examples of ensemble playing and artistic and conservative readings of the masters cannot be over-estimated.

The noble manner in which Mr. Gericke performed his part can as plainly be seen now as can the failure of Mr. Nikisch to justify wholly the expectations that were aroused concerning him. But if the latter's conceptions, and lack of care in maintaining the technical excellence of the orchestra were subject to much adverse comment, so also were the former's first efforts. It is said that Mr. Nikisch is sensitive to criticism. However that may be, the performances under his direction present at this time a curious spectacle of ups and downs. For some time there was a steady falling off in accuracy and finish; and the audiences were treated to certain interpretations, which could at the time only be accounted for when his former intimate connection with the opera at Leipsic was taken into consideration.

But we have now a dim suspicion that other things may have influenced him strongly. Mr. Nikisch, although extremely talented, is also extremely young for the position he holds. It seems improbable that he could have fully realized before he came here the nature of the institution of which he was to be the autocratic leader. Being a man of boundless imagination and ambition, when he discovered the true state of affairs—this mine of wealth as it were, which was placed at his disposal, what could be more natural than that he should have desired to work it for his own benefit? In other words, his audiences were most likely the victims of not a few experiments on his part. Perhaps, too, he labored under the impression that nothing short of loud and sensational readings would suit us Americans.

Whether these suppositions are correct or not, before the end of the season a marked improvement in the performances was noticeable, which seemed at least to indicate that he was getting more thoroughly accustomed to the atmosphere of the concert room than he had been in Leipsic.

That Mr. Nikisch possesses rare talent is unquestionable. And it will be to his friends, whose number already is legion, the saddest of surprises if, having sown his wild oats last year, he does not proceed to put the orchestra and their performances on the high plane that he was expected to do at the very commencement of his first season. There can be scarcely a doubt but that he will accomplish all this, and that the end of his term will find him indissolubly identified with another step in the progress of music in Boston.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, SEPT. 8, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16 Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 a.m.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 a.m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 a.m.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a.m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. 8,11,13 sep8

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 11, 1890.

THE Symphony concerts of Boston are going to take the belt awarded by Fashion, as usual, this year. Their favor in this respect increases. It will cost more money than ever for the better seats, but the public is willing to pay it, and it is very fortunate that Fashion has this time given its sanction to something so highly artistic and otherwise meritorious.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1890.

——Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, is due here on September 28 on the Lahn from Bremen.

——Fred. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work.

——Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be at one of the first violin stands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

——Ad. M. Foerster, the well-known Pittsburgh

[5]

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Occasions of great interest to concert-goers will be the annual auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These sales take place at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week as announced in the advertisement. The method now adopted for disposing of the seats for these wonderfully popular performances certainly gives the fairest possible chance to everyone without the discomfort incidental to a box office sale. Intending purchasers will do well to attend personally the sales if possible. There is likely to be a wide range of prices, suiting all purses.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The talk of the town in musical circles is the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the auction sales of season tickets at Music Hall next week promise to develop some lively competition for seats. Certainly no amusement enterprise deserves better of the public, and no entertainments given return greater enjoyment and benefit for the money invested in tickets. The auction sales of rehearsal tickets will be held at Music Hall Monday and Tuesday, and the concert tickets will be sold at auction on Thursday and Friday. Circulars giving full information may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 12.

The Symphony Concerts.

Tickets for the 10th season's performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be sold at auction at Music Hall next week. Seats for the public rehearsals are to be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and for the concerts on Friday and Saturday. Circulars, giving full particulars, may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, SEPT. 12, 1890.

Symphony Concert Tickets.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 24 concerts and as many public rehearsals for the 10th season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, and continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27. Concerts on Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, and continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28.

Arthur Nikisch will again be conductor, and the orchestra will number 85 players. It has been decided to offer all the reserved seats with season tickets at auction after this manner: The prices for either series will be the same as last season, $12 and $7.50, according to position, and there will be no change in the division of the house. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction in the Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A.M.

Season tickets for the rehearsals not taken at the auction will be sold at the office on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be offered at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A.M. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the rehearsals will not be reserved and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore.

Standard, New Bedford,

9/11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Less than 600 tickets are needed now to make it possible to have the finest musical organization in New England if not in this country, give a course of two concerts in our city. These should be subscribed for at once that the committee having the matter in charge should feel no embarrassment in closing the contracts. The Boston Herald in an editorial this morning says: "The Symphony concerts of Boston are going to take the belt awarded by Fashion, as usual, this year. Their favor in this respect increases: it will cost more money than ever for the better seats, but the public is willing to pay it, and it is very fortunate that Fashion has this time given its sanction to something so highly artistic and otherwise meritorious."

There will be a meeting of the committee this afternoon at 4 o'clock, at the Young Men's Christian Association, to see what steps shall be taken to make the matter a success. The proceeds, if any, go towards the furnishing the new building of the association and this fact, coupled with the merits of the orchestra, ought not to leave a seat unsold.

Mercury, New Bedford, M

Date 9/11

The Symphony Concerts.

The number of tickets now sold for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, is 606. This success is very gratifying, and it assures to the people of New Bedford two exceptionally fine con-

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 13, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(85 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor

TENTH SEASON.

Twenty-Four Concerts

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890 to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, 1891, and

Twenty-Four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890 to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 AM.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALE.

We have seen the last of the unseemly aggregation of disreputable-looking men and boys waiting to help intending purchasers secure Symphony tickets, and a considerable expense will also be done away with. Hereafter all the tickets, both for rehearsals and concerts, will be sold at auction, only those for which nobody cares to bid an advance being put on sale at the box-office—exception made of the second-balcony, afternoon admission-tickets for which will be sold from week to week as heretofore. This is by far the best course for everybody; individuals can then offer for places just what they are worth to them and be assured that every step in the sale procedure is an open and fair one if they are unable to secure what they wish. There is no reason to think that the average of premium will overpass that of other seasons or exceed the usual cost of obtaining in a roundabout way the seats formerly sold otherwise. There is furthermore a distinct gain, in that all the surplusage of price goes into the treasury, which is sure to return good value for it, an increase of the orchestra to eighty-five men being already promised. An advertisement in another column names the dates set for the sales and prescribes the conditions, which are in no respect different from those which have been made in previous seasons. As usual there will be some breaks in the continuity of the series, in order to provide for the concerts which the orchestra must give in other cities, and these omissions are now announced.

publican, Springfield, Mass

Date 9/11

The Boston symphony orchestra under Arthur Nikisch will begin their series of 24 rehearsals and concerts at Music hall in Boston in October, the concerts taking place on Saturday evenings from October 11 to April 25 next, omitting November 15, December 13, January 17, February 28 and March 28; and the rehearsals on the Friday afternoons preceding, with corresponding omissions. Tickets for the entire course of either concerts or rehearsals are $12 and $7.50. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall, on the 15th instant the $12 seats, and on the 16th the $7.50 seats, and those remaining over will be on sale at the box office on the 17th. The auctions of concert seats in the same order will be held on the 18th and 19th; all sales being at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, SEPT. 15.

Symphony Seats Sold Today.

The first important events of the musical season will be the sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The auction sale of the $12-season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold tomorrow, and seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1890.

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event of much importance to the musical public. The organization is recognized all over the country as the leading one for the performance of orchestral music. Last year its success outside of Boston was far in advance of previous years, and the demand for seats was as great as it has been in this city for the last few seasons. Mr. Nikisch has passed the initiatory year with the public in this country; he has been indorsed as no other conductor has been indorsed here. With his return it is confidently expected that the library of the organization will be enriched by novelties which his sojourn in Germany this summer has enabled him to secure, and that the attractiveness of the coming season will equal anything heard in this country. Monday the sale of tickets opens at Music Hall, and the readers of The Journal should remember that all seats are to be sold thus: Monday, the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals; Tuesday, the $7 50 seats for the same rehearsals. Thursday, the $12 seats for the concerts on Saturday evening will be disposed of, and Friday the $7 50 seats for the concerts. There is no difficulty in the way of ladies attending the auction sales. Experience has shown that this is the proper method of selling, and the management invites the ladies to come and takes pains to have them treated with the greatest consideration. It is felt that the change from last year in offering the $7 50 seats at auction will not result in the patrons of the concerts being compelled to pay any higher price for the tickets. Last year the $7 50 seats were all taken by speculators, who kept men and boys in line for a week, and the purchasers of tickets this year who pay a slight premium at auction will pay no more, in all probability, than was paid last year by those who purchased. This additional money will therefore go to the treasury directly, and to this no one can object. On the contrary, it should go there. It is known to all musical people that this Symphony Orchestra could not be supported, even with the large sales which have resulted the past few years, were it not for the munificence and public spirit of Mr. Higginson. Our people cannot be reminded of this too often, and with the course of concerts an established thing in this city, there is too much danger that it may be forgotten.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be conductor, and the orchestra will number eighty-five players. All the reserved seats with season tickets will be offered at auction, according to this scheme: Prices for either series, same as last season, $12 and $7.50, according to position, and there will be no change in the division of the house. The $12 seats for rehearsals will be offered at auction in the Music Hall next Monday, and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday; tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the office on Wednesday; the $12 seats for concerts will be offered at auction on Thursday and the $7.50 seats on Friday; tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office on Saturday. Seats in the upper balcony for rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at twenty-five cents each, as heretofore. Further particulars are given in the advertisement.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for rehearsals tomorrow (TUESDAY) at 10. Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The absence of the long line of waiters which graced (?) the entrance to Music Hall a year ago at this time indicates no less eagerness on the part of the public than last season to secure seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The plan of selling all seats at auction has done away wholly with the necessity of a long wait at the box office, and will doubtless give entire satisfaction to patrons, being manifestly the fairest way. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall this morning, and the $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold in the same way on Tuesday. The auction sales of the $12 and the $7 50 seats for the concerts will take place on Thursday and Friday, respectively. For this splendid series of concerts the public owe a debt of gratitude to the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which it would be difficult to express. While other cities are dependent on the fickle fortunes of managers or the chance visit of outside organizations, Boston has had for nine years a resident permanent orchestra whose performances have steadily increased in excellence until it is today unquestionably the peer of any orchestra in the world.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. 37m

The event of next week to musical people will be the auction sale of seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. It will begin on Monday, the 15th inst., the $12-rehearsal seats being offered that day at Music Hall, and the $7.50 seats being sold on the following day. The concert tickets will be put up on Thursday and Friday, and all the seats will this year be sold in this way. Full particulars of these sales were given last week and the announcement will be found in another column.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

85 Performers.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall. Tomorrow (Monday), beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, TUESDAY, Sept. 16th.

Auction Sale of $12.00 Seats for Concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18th.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19th.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become almost a necessity to thousands of of music lovers in Boston and vicinity and there is likely to be a greater demand than ever for seats at the sales of season tickets, which takes place at Music Hall during the coming week. As As has already been announced, all the seats will be sold at auction. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold tomorrow (Monday), the sale beginning at ten o'clock. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been passing the summer at Ischl, a famous watering place in Austria. He sails for this country with his wife about Sept. 15.

Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be one of the first violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work at duties for the coming season.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 14.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony rehearsals and concerts will take place this week, the rehearsal seats to be disposed of at the auctions of Monday and Tuesday, and the concert seats at those of Thursday and Friday. All of the seats for both the rehearsals and concerts are to be sold at auction, thus doing away with the line of agents, uncleanly, boisterous and otherwise, that have hitherto burdened, day and night, the entrance to Music Hall when the tickets were to be sold. The new plan is commendable at every point, and those wishing to attend these concerts will be able to secure them with less trouble, and in all likelihood at no more expense than by the old and inconvenient method. The only seats that will be sold at the box office are those in the second balcony, for which afternoon admission tickets may be had from week to week as usual, and those seats for which nobody cares to pay a premium, and which are left over from the sales.

[5]

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Occasions of great interest to concert-goers will be the annual auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These sales take place at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week as announced in the advertisement. The method now adopted for disposing of the seats for these wonderfully popular performances certainly gives the fairest possible chance to everyone without the discomfort incidental to a box office sale. Intending purchasers will do well to attend personally the sales if possible. There is likely to be a wide range of prices, suiting all purses.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The talk of the town in musical circles is the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the auction sales of season tickets at Music Hall next week promise to develop some lively competition for seats. Certainly no amusement enterprise deserves better of the public, and no entertainments given return greater enjoyment and benefit for the money invested in tickets. The auction sales of rehearsal tickets will be held at Music Hall Monday and Tuesday, and the concert tickets will be sold at auction on Thursday and Friday. Circulars giving full information may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 12.

The Symphony Concerts.

Tickets for the 10th season's performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be sold at auction at Music Hall next week. Seats for the public rehearsals are to be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and for the concerts on Friday and Saturday. Circulars, giving full particulars, may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, SEPT. 12, 1890.

Symphony Concert Tickets

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 24 concerts and as many public rehearsals for the 10th season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, and continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27. Concerts on Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, and continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28.

Arthur Nikisch will again be conductor, and the orchestra will number 85 players. It has been decided to offer all the reserved seats with season tickets at auction after this manner: The prices for either series will be the same as last season, $12 and $7.50, according to position, and there will be no change in the division of the house. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction in the Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A.M.

Season tickets for the rehearsals not taken at the auction will be sold at the office on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be offered at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A.M., and the $7.50 seats on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A.M. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the rehearsals will not be reserved and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore.

Standard, New Bedford, Mass

9/11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Less than 100 tickets are needed now to make it possible to have the finest musical organization in New England if not in this country, give a course of two conderts in our city. These should be subscribed for at once that the committee having the matter in charge should feel no embarrassment in closing the contracts. The Boston Herald in an editorial this morning says: "The Symphony concerts of Boston are going to take the belt awarded by Fashion, as usual, this year. Their favor in this respect increases. It will cost more money than ever for the better seats, but the public is willing to pay it, and it is very fortunate that Fashion has this time given its sanction to something so highly artistic and otherwise meritorious."

There will be a meeting of the committee this afternoon at 4 o'clock, at the Young Men's Christian Association, to see what steps shall be taken to make the matter a success. The proceeds, if any, go towards the furnishing the new building of the association and this fact, coupled with the merits of the orchestra, ought not to leave a seat unsold.

Mercury, New Bedford, Mass

Date 9/11

The Symphony Concerts.

The number of tickets now sold for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, is 606. This success is very gratifying, and it assures to the people of New Bedford two exceptionally fine con-

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 13, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(85 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor

TENTH SEASON.

Twenty-Four Concerts

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890 to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, 1891, and

Twenty-Four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890 to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 AM.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALE.

We have seen the last of the unseemly aggregation of disreputable-looking men and boys waiting to help intending purchasers secure Symphony tickets, and a considerable expense will also be done away with. Hereafter all the tickets, both for rehearsals and concerts, will be sold at auction, only those for which nobody cares to bid an advance being put on sale at the box-office—exception made of the second-balcony, afternoon admission-tickets for which will be sold from week to week as heretofore. This is by far the best course for everybody; individuals can then offer for places just what they are worth to them and be assured that every step in the sale procedure is an open and fair one if they are unable to secure what they wish. There is no reason to think that the average of premium will overpass that of other seasons or exceed the usual cost of obtaining in a roundabout way the seats formerly sold otherwise. There is furthermore a distinct gain, in that all the surplusage of price goes into the treasury, which is sure to return good value for it, an increase of the orchestra to eighty-five men being already promised. An advertisement in another column names the dates set for the sales and prescribes the conditions, which are in no respect different from those which have been made in previous seasons. As usual there will be some breaks in the continuity of the series, in order to provide for the concerts which the orchestra must give in other cities, and these omissions are now announced.

Republican, Springfield, Mass

Date 9/11

The Boston symphony orchestra under Arthur Nikisch will begin their series of 24 rehearsals and concerts at Music hall in Boston in October, the concerts taking place on Saturday evenings from October 11 to April 25 next, omitting November 15, December 13, January 17, February 28 and March 28; and the rehearsals on the Friday afternoons preceding, with corresponding omissions. Tickets for the entire course of either concerts or rehearsals are $12 and $7.50. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall, on the 15th instant the $12 seats, and on the 16th the $7.50 seats, and those remaining over will be on sale at the box office on the 17th. The auctions of concert seats in the same order will be held on the 18th and 19th; all sales being at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, SEPT. 15.

Symphony Seats Sold Today.

The first important events of the musical season will be the sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The auction sale of the $12-season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold tomorrow, and seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1890.

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event of much importance to the musical public. The organization is recognized all over the country as the leading one for the performance of orchestral music. Last year its success outside of Boston was far in advance of previous years, and the demand for seats was as great as it has been in this city for the last few seasons. Mr. Nikisch has passed the initiatory year with the public in this country; he has been indorsed as no other conductor has been indorsed here. With his return it is confidently expected that the library of the organization will be enriched by novelties which his sojourn in Germany this summer has enabled him to secure, and that the attractiveness of the coming season will equal anything heard in this country. Monday the sale of tickets opens at Music Hall, and the readers of The Journal should remember that all seats are to be sold thus: Monday, the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals; Tuesday, the $7 50 seats for the same rehearsals. Thursday, the $12 seats for the concerts on Saturday evening will be disposed of, and Friday the $7 50 seats for the concerts. There is no difficulty in the way of ladies attending the auction sales. Experience has shown that this is the proper method of selling, and the management invites the ladies to come and takes pains to have them treated with the greatest consideration. It is felt that the change from last year in offering the $7 50 seats at auction will not result in the patrons of the concerts being compelled to pay any higher price for the tickets. Last year the $7 50 seats were all taken by speculators, who kept men and boys in line for a week, and the purchasers of tickets this year who pay a slight premium at auction will pay no more, in all probability, than was paid last year by those who purchased. This additional money will therefore go to the treasury directly, and to this no one can object. On the contrary, it should go there. It is known to all musical people that this Symphony Orchestra could not be supported, even with the large sales which have resulted the past few years, were it not for the munificence and public spirit of Mr. Higginson. Our people cannot be reminded of this too often, and with the course of concerts an established thing in this city, there is too much danger that it may be forgotten.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with the exceptions of Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be conductor, and the orchestra will number eighty-five players. All the reserved seats with season tickets will be offered at auction, according to this scheme: Prices for either series, same as last season, $12 and $7.50, according to position, and there will be no change in the division of the house. The $12 seats for rehearsals will be offered at auction in the Music Hall next Monday, and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday; tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the office on Wednesday; the $12 seats for concerts will be offered at auction on Thursday and the $7.50 seats on Friday; tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office on Saturday. Seats in the upper balcony for rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at twenty-five cents each, as heretofore. Further particulars are given in the advertisement.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for rehearsals tomorrow (TUESDAY) at 10. Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The absence of the long line of waiters which graced (?) the entrance to Music Hall a year ago at this time indicates no less eagerness on the part of the public than last season to secure seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The plan of selling all seats at auction has done away wholly with the necessity of a long wait at the box office, and will doubtless give entire satisfaction to patrons, being manifestly the fairest way. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall this morning, and the $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold in the same way on Tuesday. The auction sales of the $12 and the $7 50 seats for the concerts will take place on Thursday and Friday, respectively. For this splendid series of concerts the public owe a debt of gratitude to the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which it would be difficult to express. While other cities are dependent on the fickle fortunes of managers or the chance visit of outside organizations, Boston has had for nine years a resident permanent orchestra whose performances have steadily increased in excellence until it is today unquestionably the peer of any orchestra in the world.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. 37m

The event of next week to musical people will be the auction sale of seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. It will begin on Monday, the 15th inst., the $12-rehearsal seats being offered that day at Music Hall, and the $7.50 seats being sold on the following day. The concert tickets will be put up on Thursday and Friday, and all the seats will this year be sold in this way. Full particulars of these sales were given last week and the announcement will be found in another column.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

85 Performers.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tomorrow (Monday), beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, TUESDAY, Sept. 16th.
Auction Sale of $12.00 Seats for Concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18th.
Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19th.

THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become almost a necessity to thousands of of music lovers in Boston and vicinity and there is likely to be a greater demand than ever for seats at the sales of season tickets, which takes place at Music Hall during the coming week. As As has already been announced, all the seats will be sold at auction. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold tomorrow (Monday), the sale beginning at ten o'clock. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been passing the summer at Ischl, a famous watering place in Austria. He sails for this country with his wife about Sept. 15.

Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be one of the first violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work at duties for the coming season.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 14.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony rehearsals and concerts will take place this week, the rehearsal seats to be disposed of at the auctions of Monday and Tuesday, and the concert seats at those of Thursday and Friday. All of the seats for both the rehearsals and concerts are to be sold at auction, thus doing away with the line of agents, uncleanly, boisterous and otherwise, that have hitherto burdened, day and night, the entrance to Music Hall when the tickets were to be sold. The new plan is commendable at every point, and those wishing to attend these concerts will be able to secure them with less trouble, and in all likelihood at no more expense than by the old and inconvenient method. The only seats that will be sold at the box office are those in the second balcony, for which afternoon admission tickets may be had from week to week as usual, and those seats for which nobody cares to pay a premium, and which are left over from the sales.

OBSCURED TEXT

[6]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 14, 1890.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, and March 28, 1891, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REAEARSALS

On consecutive F iday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27, and March 27, 1891.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Every music-lover in Boston and its many suburbs reads with much interest anything referring to the approaching series of concerts by the renowned Boston Symphony orchestra. The first concerts of the season will take place Friday evening (rehearsal) Oct. 10, and Saturday evening, Oct. 11.

The sale of seats will this year be by auction. The series will consist of twenty-four evening concerts and twenty-four rehearsals, and the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall tomorrow, Sept. 15, at 10 a. m.; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction. Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m., and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 10, at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats rematning unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

Opening of the Series of Auction Sales at Music Hall.

It was like a morning reception at the auction sale of rehearsal seats at Music Hall from ten o'clock until time for luncheon—like one with two minor exceptions: first, people sat down; second, the chat, the comments and the visiting, natural after long summer separations, were carried on in animated whispers. The hall was silent except for the cheerful vocal efforts of the auctioneer and the infrequent murmurs of the bidders.

A finger or a raised hand did duty for every one of the few women who were bidding for seats. An hour's participation in the matinee could have given the most acute listener no chance to detect either eagerness or timidity on the part of the future feminine contingent at the Friday rehearsals. As a rule their bidding was done for them, either by duly accredited men of their family or by agents, although now and then a soprano note sounded over the well-filled floor of the hall, as the price of a choice place was raised five or ten dollars.

Boston—the best of Boston—really showed to excellent advantage at the auction matinee, and when the names were called of those who took two or four of the most desirable seats in the centre of the house, it sounded like a review of the discovery of America and the founding of Boston with historical names like Cabot and Alden and Endicott, Adams and Everett rippling off the fluent lips of the conductor of the matinée. As he kept time to his own refrain of "Twenty, [illegible], am I offered twenty-two?" and the [illegible] rose to $50 apiece on some of the [illegible], there was a murmur of talk in the [illegible] which all tended to praise of the new system. It was better to come in the rain one's self than to send one's agent to suffer "in line" as in previous years. For each of the gentlemen who came—and you could have counted distinguished fellow-citizens by the dozen—the affair was over as soon as his word was given for the twenty or forty or thirty-six dollars which he must pay for the chairs which "madame and the girls" will occupy Friday afternoons" for a long season. But for these, [illegible]

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

TENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tomorrow, Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of $12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Thousands of concertgoers will be glad to be reminded of the ticket sales for the 10th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra (the second under direction o Arthur Nikisch) which are to be held a Music Hall during the coming week.

All the sales will be by auction as has already been several times announced—and they will begin each day at 10 o'clock. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold tomorrow (Monday) and the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday. The $12 and the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively. Every arrangement will be made at these sales for the comfort and convenience of bidders, and ladies will have no difficulty in making purchases. A large diagram will be erected on the stage showing plainly the position of seats, which will be marked off as they are sold. To avoid mistakes, it should be understood that bids received are for the premium on each seat, which in every case is to be added to the face value of the ticket—$12 or $7.50, as the case may be. No more than four seats will be sold on any one bid. Without doubt the demand for tickets will be greater than ever before. There is likely, however, to be a very wide range of prices, which will suit all purses, and satisfaction is expressed on all sides at the decision of the management to offer all seats at auction. The Symphony concerts have become well nigh indispensable to the musical public of Boston and vicinity, and their annual occurrence easily lead the musical events of the years. It would be impossible to overestimate the good influence which they exert on the musical taste of our city or the pleasure they give to the multitudes who are their constant patrons.

citizens went away by ones and twos, but the members of their families who had come to the auction with them remained after their fate was decided, and there were groups in the entrance talking over the situation in tones more or less cheerful, mingling the talk about the premium on tickets with discussions about waterproofs which the rainy morning had made necessary. There was a coming and going of cabs in Hamilton Place; there were greetings of friends not seen since June or earlier; there were murmurs of "came home on the Cephalonia," "expected on the Sevia," "will stay down until November," "the boys come up to school everyday now," "beautiful there till the snow flies," and so on—murmurs which show how many Boston families are lingering out of Boston still, and how the interest in the rehearsals made them all kin and drew them up to town. Paterfamilias as represented at the auction matinee in large numbers wore a face less sunburned than the women of various families. It was the symphony audience of midwinter, with the difference of a good coat of tan on two-thirds of the faces, a tan which will vanish before that time. It was amusing to see the vigor with which some gray heads were shaken in the negative when the auctioneer called for fifty cents more. There is a greater difference perceptible to any mind between $39.50 and $40 than between $39 and $38.50. The great upright board with the plan of the hall obscured Beethoven, and the man who mounted high on the ladder to chalk off the high-priced places at the top of the board, had to move his ladder back and forth and mount and descend many times to keep his score going. It read in the Hindostanee manner, from right to left, and he must needs get down and go up after every row of seats was sold. On either side of the great board which shows the plan of the house and in several places in the hall were posted huge placards, warning the unwary:

BIDS
are the premiums on each seat, to be added to $12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions. Arthur Nikisch will conduct and the orchestra will number eighty-five. All reserved seats with season tickets will be offered at auction, according to this scheme: The $12 seats for rehearsals were put up this morning; $7.50 seats will be sold tomorrow morning; rehearsal tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the office on Wednesday; $12 seats for concerts will be offered on Thursday; $7.50 seats on Friday; concert tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office on Saturday. Seats in the upper balcony for rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at twenty-five cents each.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 14, 1890.

MINIATURE ALMANAC, Sept. 14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[85 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

Monday to Begin the Symphony Sale at Music Hall.

This week marks the sale of seats for the 10th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There are many indications of undiminished public interest in these concerts; and Mr. Nikisch may count upon warm appreciation, for no conductor has made himself more quickly a favorite in Boston. The series of 24 concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 11, 1890, to April 25, 1891, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, 1890, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, 1891, and the twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 10, 1890, to April 24, 1891, omitting Nov. 14, Dec. 12, 1890, Jan. 16, Feb. 27 and March 27, 1891. Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The symphony rehearsal tickets go on sale at auction on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats being offered first. On Tuesday morning the $7.50 seats to the rehearsals will be sold, and the concert tickets will be offered on Thursday and Friday at the same place and in the same order.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1890.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals of the symphony concerts is to be held at Music Hall this morning, and the concert tickets will be sold on Thursday and Friday mornings as already announced.

C. Erin Verner, recognized as one of the

THE MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

The seats to the Symphony concerts at Music Hall sold higher than ever yesterday. There are no bounds to theenthusiasm that Boston displays in engaging in this undertaking. We wish we could say it all arises from a genuine love of music on the part of the people who pay these great sums for their musical entertainments; but candor compels us to admit that fashion has much to do with the furor that these concerts create. Still, good comes of it. The people hear music that ought to improve them all, and does improve the taste as well as gratify the higher artistic sense in many of them, while the city has acquired the reputation of furnishing the most creditable series of instrumental concerts that has yet been realized on this side the Atlantic ocean. It is not to be forgotten that we owe this to the munificence of a Boston business man, who strove unselfishly to furnish a great boon to genuine musical art in his native city, and who has succeeded in this endeavor, even if fashion does come in and stand in the way of some of the people who love music for its own sake enjoying it under the best conditions.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1890.

Sale of Symphony Rehearsal Tickets.

The sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenth season, took place yesterday at Music Hall, with a large attendance and spirited bidding. The highest premium received was $150, paid by Mr. Harland, for each of four end seats in K, the tenth row from the front.

There were also two seats sold at $125, two more at a trifle less than that figure, and the price ranged from $30 to $60 for the large part of the floor until the seats in the rear, under the balcony, were reached, when the premium dropped to about $16 in some cases. The balcony seats sold at a high figure, the first seats sold bringing a premium of $13 50, and Mr. Wadsworth bought four seats in the right balcony at $70 and two at $74 premium, and several at about $50. There was a wide difference in the price of seats for the front row in the right balcony and in the opposite one, few in the left balcony bringing over $40 premium. Many ladies were present bidding for seats, and a large sprinkling of purchasers were of the fair sex. The premiums averaged much in advance of last year, the highest premium for any seat last year being less than $100. Every $12 seat was sold. The premium for the rehearsal seats is usually more than for the evening concerts. This morning at 10 o'clock the $7 50 rehearsal seats will be sold at auction.

Boston Transcript

SEPTEMBER 16.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra!

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12.00 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL THURSDAY, SEPT. 18, AT 10 O'CLOCK, AND CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19. 1[A] s16

[7]

EVENING EDITION.

SALE OF CONCERT SEATS.

High Prices Paid for the Privilege of Hearing the Symphony Public Rehearsals at Music Hall.

The sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Concert Company, commenced at Music Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. Auctioneer Jackson handled the gavel, and his lungs were severely taxed during the day. The bidding was prompt and spirited, and the prices were in most instances very high, ranging in some cases well up in the second hundred. Mr. Connelly of the Adams House was the first to break the 100 limit, and when seats 16 and 17, in section I, were knocked down to him for $115, there was a round of applause from those assembled.

The next two seats, however, went higher, being knocked off at $125, and the same gentleman a few minutes later purchased four seats more. Numbers 14, 15, 18 and 19, in section K, for $150 each. The bid in each instance was to be added to $12 as a premium.

The seats were sold as follows:

SECTION A.

No. 1, $12.50, purchased by a lady, name unknown.
No. 2, $10.50, Mr. Abbott.
Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, Mr. Connolly, Adams House, $9.50 each.
No. 7, $10.75.
Nos. 29, 30, 31, $17.
No. 33, $14.50, Mr. Stewart.

SECTION B.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $14.50, Mr. Stewart.
Nos. 4, 5, $15, Mr. Howell.
Nos. 6, 7, $18, H. D. White.
No. 8, $20.50.
Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, $18.50, Mr. Connolly.
No. 13, $21, Mr. Harrington.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $21.
Nos. 18, 19, $28, Mr. Humphreys.
No. 20, $22, Mr. Foster.
Nos. 21, 22, 23 and 24, $22, Mr. Brooks.
Nos. 25, 26, $21, Mr. Smith.
Nos. 28, 29, $20.50, Mr. Sargent.
No. 31, $18, Capt. Sherman.
Nos. 32, 33, 34, $17.50, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION C.

No. 1, $17.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9, $24.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 10 and 11, $22, Mr. Pratt.
No. 12, $21, Mr. Warren.
Nos. 13, 14, $20.
Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, $22.50, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 19, 20, $23.
Nos. 21, 22, 23, 24, $21, Mr. Warren.
Nos. 25, 26, 27, $24.
Nos. 28, 29, $25, Mr. Tucker.
Nos. 30, 31, $25.
Nos. 32, 33, 34, $21.

SECTION D.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, $21.
No. 5, $24.50, Mr. Bigelow.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $27.50, Mr. Stewart of the Germania orchestra.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, Gen. W. W. Blackmer, $24.
Nos. 18, 19, $34, Mr. Sherman.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, 23, $32, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 24, 25, 26, 27, $29.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 28, 29, $24, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 30, 31, $26, A. F. Reed.
No. 32, $25, Dr. J. Foster Bushe.
Nos. 33, 34, $22.50, Mr. Fuller.

SECTION E.

Nos. 1, 2, 3 4, $22.50.
Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, $25.50, C. H. Thayer.
No. 9, $22.50, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, $31.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $40, Mr. Herrick.
Nos. 18, 19, $42, Mr. Gay.
No. 20, $41, Mr. White.
No. 21, $40, Mr. Bigelow.
No. 22, $39, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, $40, Mr. Warren.
No. 26, $42, Mr. Rice.
Nos. 27, 23, 29, 30, $34, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 31, 32, $26.
Nos. 33, 34, $23.50.

SECTION F.

No. 1, $24.50, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, $23.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $40, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, $34, Louis Hector.
Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, $36, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 16, 17, $43, Mr. Hall.
Nos. 21, 22, $34, Mr. Lowell.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $34, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $30, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 30, 31, $28.
No. 32, $22, Mr. Lowell.
Nos. 33, 34, $20.50, Mr. Ellis.

SECTION G.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $45, Mr. Endicott.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $45, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, $28, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, $33, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 17, 18, 19, $50, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 20, 21, $40.
Nos. 22, 23, $31, Mr. Baker.
Nos. 24, 25, 26, 27, $41, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 28, 29, $50, Mr. Lyman.
Nos. 30, 31, $29.
Nos. 32, 33, $23, Mr. Stanley.
No. 34, $22.50.

SECTION H.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, $24.
Nos. 5, 6, $25.
Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, $36, Hon. E. L. Davis, Worcester.
Nos. 11, 12, 13, $37.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $50.
Nos. 18, 19, 20, 21, $55, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 22, 23, 24, 25, $40, C. H. Thayer.
No. 26, $41, C. H. Thayer.
No. 29, $31.
No. 30, $31.
Nos. 31, 32, 33, $29.
No. 34, $21, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION I.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $21, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, $37.
Nos. 7, 8, $33, Mr. King.
Nos. 9, 10, $32.
Nos. 11, 12, $47, Mr. Stewart.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, $44, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 16, 17, $115, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 18, 19, $125, Mr. Harland.
No. 20, $45.
No. 25, $49, Mr. Wadsworth.
No. 31, $30.50, Mr. Royce.
No. 34, $24.

SECTION J.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $27, Mr. Johnson of C. F. Hovey & Co.
Nos. 4, 5, $36.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $49, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, $33.
Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, Levi C. Wade, $36.
Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, $53, Mr. Wadsworth.
No. 20, $38.
Nos. 21, 22, $37.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $32, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $49, Mr. Baker.
No. 30, $50.
Nos. 31, 32, $30.
Nos. 33, 34, $21, Mr. Cushing.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $28, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, $29, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 10, 11, $35, Mr. Blake.
Nos. 17, 18, $32, Arthur Foote.
Nos. 14, 15, 18, 19, $150, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 20, 21, $41, ——.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $35, Hon. Levi C. Wade.
Nos. 27, 28, $42, Hon. Levi C. Wade.
Nos. 31, 32, $28, ——.
Nos. 33, 34, $25, Mr. Cabot.

SECTION L.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $25.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, $29.
Nos. 8, 9, $33, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 10, 11, $37, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, $35, Mr. Minot.
Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, $44, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 29, 30, 31, $28.
Nos. 32, 33, $22, Mr. Herrick.
No. 34, $21, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION M.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $21, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, $28, Mr. Heyward.
Nos. 8, 9, 10, $38, ——.
Nos. 11, 12, $35, ——.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, $36, ——.
Nos. 17, 18, 19, $51, Mr. Curtis.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, $40, ——.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $36, ——.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $33, ——.

As the seats towards the back of the hall were sold the prices grew smaller in proportion, though the bidding went on with considerable spirit to the close.

Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be put up for sale at 10 o'clock.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TICKETS.

Opening Sale for This Season's Concerts in Music Hall.

The sale of the $12 tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season was begun at Music Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The sale was by auction, as usual, and Auctioneer Jackson conducted it as in former years. The general arrangements were made after the plan of earlier seasons, excepting that additional notices were displayed about the hall informing patrons that only the $12 seats were to be sold during that day, the $7 50 seats being held for today. There was a large attendance notwithstanding the storm. The bidding was lively and prices ranged much higher, it was stated, than ever before. Up to 12:30 o'clock the highest premium at which seats were knocked down was $150 each for four seats in K, the tenth row. Two of these seats were next to the end seat on the right hand side of the centre aisle, while the other two were the end seats on the left hand side of the centre aisle. These four seats were knocked down to Mr. "Harland," who is said to represent a speculator from one of the hotel news stands in Boston, who was himself a prominent buyer. The next highest premium that had been paid up to this time was $125 for the two end seats on the left hand side of the centre aisle in I, the eighth row; these were also disposed of to Mr. Harland. Nos. 16 and 17, the two end seats on the right hand side of the centre aisle, in I, were taken by Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House news stand. This was the first big premium paid, and the bidding on these seats between Mr. Connelly and Mr. Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House was very spirited. The result was received with some applause.

This year a change has been introduced in the manner of disposing of the tickets, both for the rehearsals and the concerts. The scale of prices of season tickets for each series was the same as already established—$12 and $7 50, according to location, and there was no change in the division of the house, but the $12 seats for the public rehearsal were sold yesterday, and the $7 50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place today. Any tickets for the public rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sales will be sold at the box office, Music Hall, on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m., and the $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore. The Boston concerts will number twenty-four, as usual, and will be begun on Saturday evening, Oct. 11, and continued on successive Saturday evenings, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, the public rehearsals occurring on Friday afternoons of the same weeks.

Among the prominent bidders were Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House, Mr. Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House, Mr. Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, Mr. George F. Wadsworth, presumably representing Colonel Henry L. Higginson; Mr. George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band; the "Mr. Harland" already referred to; Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Frank Capen Herrick of 229 Boylston street, Copley square; the Hon. Levi C. Wade, president Mexican Central railway; Professor Royce of Harvard College, and the Hon. E. S. Davis of Worcester.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (THURSDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

85 Performers.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tomorrow (Monday), beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, TUESDAY, Sept. 16th.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18th.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19th.

The tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced in another column, and the management have adopted the sale of the tickets for both rehearsals and concerts by auction, as the best plan for the interests of the public and all concerned. This will increase the revenues directly, and result in a good return to the concert patrons. Already the orchestra has been increased to eighty-five men by promise, and as has been announced the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. The patrons of the Symphony Concerts are to be congratulated upon the fact that the sale of tickets at auction does away with the unseemly rabble which filled the entrance to Music Hall, in the struggle to be "in line," when the sale at the window began. The "ticket fiend's" occupation is gone at Music Hall, and the public rejoices.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890.

Sale of Seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The sale of seats for the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this year be by auction. The series will consist of 24 evening concerts and 24 rehearsals, and the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, SEPT. 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Rehearsal Tickets at $7.50 Command Good Premiums.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the Symphony rehearsals began at 10 o'clock this morning in Music Hall, buyers being mostly the ticket brokers and ladies. The seats on sale comprised those in the rear portion of the main hall beneath the balcony, a few back rows in the first balcony, and some side seats in the second and third rows of the same. The bidding started in rather slowly, but increased in briskness when the balcony seats were put up. The seats in the rear of the hall averaged perhaps $14 in premiums, the highest price being $17. The balcony went better, most of the bids being above $20, and even reaching as high as $27, which was the price paid for seats 541 and 542 by a gentleman who did not give his name.

These are in the third row of the first balcony, on the left, commanding a good view of the house and stage, and brought the highest price of the morning. Many of the seats went singly or in pairs, since this is the "popular" sale, and did not reach as large figures as the $12 seats. Nevertheless, though not of the best, many went to the ticket brokers in "blocks of four," the favorite combination of those gentlemen. Of the seats in the body of the house many were gathered in by Mr. Dilloway, who seemed the only large buyer at that time. As the balcony tickets came up, however, Mr. Connelly of the Adams House took a hand and appeared to be the high-line buyer of the day. The rear-balcony seats sold well, averaging $18 or $20 apiece. In fact there was competition for nearly every seat in the house.

[7]

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, SEPT. 15, 1890.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Opening of the Sale of Seats at Music Hall.

The auction sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony concerts began this morning at Music Hall, and in spite of the unpleasant weather the attendance was large, and the average bidding was much higher than that of previous years. Ten o'clock was the time announced for the sale to begin, but it was a quarter past that hour when Auctioneer Jackson took his position on the platform and Mr. Hartshorn mounted the step-ladder, which was placed in front of an enormous diagram, and prepared to mark out the seats as fast as they were sold.

The bids were the premium on each seat to be added to the $12, and only four seats were sold on one bid. A large proportion of the audience was composed of men, but there was a generous sprinkling of women, both old and young, and at times there was considerable excitement shown, especialy when the bidding was for the most desirable seats nearest the isles. Those who, from former experience, knew about what they wanted, kept a calm demeanor, and a few individuals were observed who had no apparent interest in the scene about them, but who were carefully perusing books or papers until a favorable moment. The speculators were on hand, of course, and never lost sight of an opportunity to purchase in a desirable location.

The seats were sold in regular order, beginning at the front row and extending across the hall. Seat No. 1, in A, brought $12.50; the next four being sold to Mr. Conolly at $9.50 each. The highest price paid for seats in the first row was $17. The first four seats in B brought $15, the next two $18, two in the centre brought $28, the last three being sold to Mr. Conolly for $17.50 each. The next five rows sold at prices varying from $15 to $50; Messrs. Thayer, Conolly, Harland, Herrick and Wadsworth being the principal purchasers. The seats numbered 16 and 17 in I went for $115, while 18 and 19, just across the aisle, brought $125, the latter being purchased by Mr. Harland, who also paid $150 for Numbers 14, 15, 18 and 19 in K, that being the highest bid of the day. Hon. Levi C. Wade paid $35 each for four seats in J; Hon. E. L. Davis of Worcester purchased the same number of seats in H at the same price, and Mr. Arthur Foote bought 12 and 13 in K for $36. In L the prices ranged from $21 to $33, and the prices decreased toward the rear of the hall. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold in the same manner tomorrow morning, and there is much interest shown in the result, as in former years this method was not adopted. The sale of the seats for the concerts will be on Thursday and Friday.

Symphony tickets this week! It is not unlikely that there will be many disappointments concerning the price received at auction for the $7.50 seats. The higher priced tickets are sure to run high, perhaps higher than last year, but if the excitement regarding the $7.50 seats, apparent on an incoming suburban train this morning was duplicated on many roads, the demand for the comparatively few seats of this grade, either for concerts or rehearsals, will send the cost skywards. The wise will approach the sales of Tuesday and Friday with sufficient funds to protect themselves and secure for a certainty the one great privilege of a season in Boston. Those who have not attended the auctions may go with every confidence that their bids will be recognized; Mr. Jackson is a model auctioneer.

The following extract from a letter of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke to Dr. L. Kelterborn of this city will interest many patrons of the symphony concerts: "In consequence of a bad cold caught on a trip to Eisenach, all my plans for the summer had to be abandoned, and I felt it painfully, to be thus obliged to give up a promised rendezvous with Boston friends, the pleasure of which I had anticipated so long before. So many touching marks of friendship have reached me from there during the last winter, that I felt it as a real need only to find some one to whom I could have said, how proud I am of all these tokens of attachment and friendship! Through a three weeks' sojourn in Ischl I had an opportunity to meet Mr. Nikisch with his family, who lived in the same hotel with me. Mr. Nikisch told me a great deal of Boston and the musical events of the last season, and I rejoice greatly at the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in such good hands and wins everywhere such handsome and many successes. The steadiness and security which this institution has obtained is for me a matter of joyful conscience and fine satisfaction. As to next winter, six concerts and weekly chorus rehearsals with the Vienna Sing-Verein, is all that is expected from me, as much as a mere plaything for a man who has worked for several years in America. The new work has a new charm for me, as I have to be engaged in chorus music, of which I was almost deprived during my whole stay in America. But it is particularly the Vienna Sing-Verein from which I expect much enjoyment, as with their beautiful and musical voice material they stand unrivalled.

"At the present time I am occupied with Handel,—not to be confounded with the Styrian 'Baked Handels,' which are good too, also nourishing, although there are not plenty this year. The Handel under my hands now I have to provide with a corresponding accompaniment, a work which is exceedingly interesting, because of an extremely delicate na-

From the above it appears that Mr. [illegible] is contemplating a work of

Boston Daily Globe.

EVENING EDITION.

SALE OF CONCERT SEATS.

High Prices Paid for the Privilege of Hearing the Symphony Public Rehearsals at Music Hall.

The sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Concert Company, commenced at Music Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. Auctioneer Jackson handled the gavel, and his lungs were severely taxed during the day. The bidding was prompt and spirited, and the prices were in most instances very high, ranging in some cases well up in the second hundred. Mr. Connelly of the Adams House was the first to break the 100 limit, and when seats 16 and 17, in section I, were knocked down to him for $115, there was a round of applause from those assembled.

The next two seats, however, went higher, being knocked off at $125, and the same gentleman a few minutes later purchased four seats more, Numbers 14, 15, 18 and 19, in section K, for $150 each. The bid in each instance was to be added to $12 as a premium.

The seats were sold as follows:

SECTION A.

No. 1, $12.50, purchased by a lady, name unknown.
No. 2, $10.50, Mr. Abbott.
Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, Mr. Connolly, Adams House, $9.50 each.
No. 7, $10.75.
Nos. 29, 30, 31, $17.
No. 33, $14.50, Mr. Stewart.

SECTION B.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $14.50, Mr. Stewart.
Nos. 4, 5, $15, Mr. Howell.
Nos. 6, 7, $18, H. D. White.
No. 8, $20.50.
Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, $18.50, Mr. Connolly.
No. 13, $21, Mr. Harrington.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $21.
Nos. 18, 19, $28, Mr. Humphreys.
No. 20, $22, Mr. Foster.
Nos. 21, 22, 23 and 24, $22, Mr. Brooks.
Nos. 25, 26, $21, Mr. Smith.
Nos. 28, 29, $20.50, Mr. Sargent.
No. 31, $18, Capt. Sherman.
Nos. 32, 33, 34, $17.50, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION C.

No. 1, $17.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9, $24.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 10 and 11, $22, Mr. Pratt.
No. 12, $21, Mr. Warren.
Nos. 13, 14, $20.
Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, $22.50, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 19, 20, $23.
Nos. 21, 22, 23, 24, $21, Mr. Warren.
Nos. 25, 26, 27, $24.
Nos. 28, 29, $25, Mr. Tucker.
Nos. 30, 31, $25.
Nos. 32, 33, 34, $21,

SECTION D.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, $21.
No. 5, $24.50, Mr. Bigelow.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $27.50, Mr. Stewart of the Germania orchestra.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, Gen. W. W. Blackmer, $24.
Nos. 18, 19, $34, Mr. Sherman.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, 23, $32, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 24, 25, 26, 27, $29.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 28, 29, $24, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 30, 31, $26, A. F. Reed.
No. 32, $25, Dr. J. Foster Bushe.
Nos. 33, 34, $22.50, Mr. Fuller.

SECTION E.

Nos. 1, 2, 3 4, $22.50.
Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, $25.50, C. H. Thayer.
No. 9, $22.50, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, $31.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $40, Mr. Herrick.
Nos. 18, 19, $42, Mr. Gay.
No. 20, $41, Mr. White.
No. 21, $40, Mr. Bigelow.
No. 22, $39, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, $40, Mr. Warren.
No. 26, $42, Mr. Rice.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, 30, $34, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 31, 32, $26.
Nos. 33, 34, $23.50.

SECTION F.

No. 1, $24.50, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, $23.50, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $40, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, $34, Louis Hector.
Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, $36, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 16, 17, $43, Mr. Hall.
Nos. 21, 22, $34, Mr. Lowell.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $34, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $30, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 30, 31, $28.
No. 32, $22, Mr. Lowell.
Nos. 33, 34, $20.50, Mr. Ellis.

SECTION G.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $45, Mr. Endicott.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $45, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 10, 11, 12, $28, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, $33, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 17, 18, 19, $50, Mr. Thayer.
Nos. 20, 21, $40.
Nos. 22, 23, $31, Mr. Baker.
Nos. 24, 25, 26, 27, $41, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 28, 29, $50, Mr. Lyman.
Nos. 30, 31, $29.
Nos. 32, 33, $23, Mr. Stanley.
No. 34, $22.50.

SECTION H.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, $24.
Nos. 5, 6, $35.
Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, $36, Hon. E. L. Davis, Worcester.
Nos. 11, 12, 13, $37.
Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, $50.
Nos. 18, 19, 20, 21, $55, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 22, 23, 24, 25, $40, C. H. Thayer.
No. 28, $41, C. H. Thayer.
No. 29, $31.
No. 30, $31.
Nos. 31, 32, 33, $29.
No. 34, $21, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION I.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $21, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, $37.
Nos. 7, 8, $33, Mr. King.
Nos. 9, 10, $32.
Nos. 11, 12, $47, Mr. Stewart.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, $44, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 16, 17, $115, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 18, 19, $125, Mr. Harland.
No. 20, $45.
No. 25, $49, Mr. Wadsworth.
No. 31, $30.50, Mr. Royce.
No. 34, $24.

SECTION J.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $27, Mr. Johnson of C. F. Hovey & Co.
Nos. 4, 5, $36.
Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, $49, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 10, 11, $33.
Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, Levi C. Wade, $36.
Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, $58, Mr. Wadsworth.
No. 20, $38.
Nos. 21, 22, $37.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $32, C. H. Thayer.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $49, Mr. Baker.
No. 30, $30.
Nos. 31, 32, $30.
Nos. 33, 34, $21, Mr. Cashin.

SECTION K.

Nos. 1, 2, $21, Mr. Cashin.
Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, $26, Mr. Connolly.
No. 7, $27, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 10, 11, $35, Mr. Blake.
Nos. 12, 13, $36, Arthur Foote.
Nos. 14, 15, 18, 19, $150, Mr. Harland.
Nos. 20, 21, $41, ——.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $35, Hon. Levi C. Wade.
Nos. 27, 28, $42, Hon. Levi C. Wade.
Nos. 31, 32, $28, ——.
Nos. 33, 34, $25, Mr. Cabot.

SECTION L.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $25.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, $29.
Nos. 8, 9, $63, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 10, 11, $37, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, $35, Mr. Minot.
Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, $44, Mr. Wadsworth.
Nos. 29, 30, 31, $28.
Nos. 32, 33, $22, Mr. Herrick.
No. 34, $21, Mr. Connolly.

SECTION M.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, $21, Mr. Connolly.
Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, $28, Mr. Heyward.
Nos. 8, 9, 10, $38, ——.
Nos. 11, 12, $35, ——.
Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, $36, ——.
Nos. 17, 18, 19, $51, Mr. Curtis.
Nos. 20, 21, 22, $40, ——.
Nos. 23, 24, 25, 26, $36, ——.
Nos. 27, 28, 29, $33, ——.

As the seats towards the back of the hall were sold the prices grew smaller in proportion, though the bidding went on with considerable spirit to the close.

Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be put up for sale at 10 o'clock.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TICKETS.

Opening Sale for This Season's Concerts in Music Hall.

The sale of the $12 tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season was begun at Music Hall yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. The sale was by auction, as usual, and Auctioneer Jackson conducted it as in former years. The general arrangements were made after the plan of earlier seasons, excepting that additional notices were displayed about the hall informing patrons that only the $12 seats were to be sold during that day, the $7 50 seats being held for today. There was a large attendance notwithstanding the storm. The bidding was lively and prices ranged much higher, it was stated, than ever before. Up to 12:30 o'clock the highest premium at which seats were knocked down was $150 each for four seats in K, the tenth row. Two of these seats were next to the end seat on the right hand side of the centre aisle, while the other two were the end seats on the left hand side of the centre aisle. These four seats were knocked down to Mr. "Harland," who is said to represent a speculator from one of the hotel news stands in Boston, who was himself a prominent buyer. The next highest premium that had been paid up to this time was $125 for the two end seats on the left hand side of the centre aisle in I, the eighth row; these were also disposed of to Mr. Harland. Nos. 16 and 17, the two end seats on the right hand side of the centre aisle, in I, were taken by Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House news stand. This was the first big premium paid, and the bidding on these seats between Mr. Connelly and Mr. Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House was very spirited. The result was received with some applause.

This year a change has been introduced in the manner of disposing of the tickets, both for the rehearsals and the concerts. The scale of prices of season tickets for each series was the same as already established—$12 and $7 50, according to location, and there was no change in the division of the house, but the $12 seats for the public rehearsal were sold yesterday, and the $7 50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place today. Any tickets for the public rehearsals not disposed of at the auction sales will be sold at the box office, Music Hall, on Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 a. m., and the $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m. Any seats not taken at the auctions will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. Seats in the upper balcony for the public rehearsals will not be reserved, and will be available for purchasers of admission tickets at 25 cents each, as heretofore. The Boston concerts will number twenty-four, as usual, and will be begun on Saturday evening, Oct. 11, and continued on successive Saturday evenings, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and March 28, the public rehearsals occurring on Friday afternoons of the same weeks.

Among the prominent bidders were Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House, Mr. Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House, Mr. Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, Mr. George F. Wadsworth, presumably representing Colonel Henry L. Higginson; Mr. George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band; the "Mr. Harland" already referred to; Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Frank Capen Herrick of 229 Boylston street, Copley square; the Hon. Levi C. Wade, president Mexican Central railway; Professor Royce of Harvard College, and the Hon. E. S. Davis of Worcester.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (THURSDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

85 Performers.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tomorrow (Monday), beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, TUESDAY, Sept. 16th.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 18th.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19th.

The tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced in another column, and the management have adopted the sale of the tickets for both rehearsals and concerts by auction, as the best plan for the interests of the public and all concerned. This will increase the revenues directly, and result in a good return to the concert patrons. Already the orchestra has been increased to eighty-five men by promise, and as has been announced the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20. The patrons of the Symphony Concerts are to be congratulated upon the fact that the sale of tickets at auction does away with the unseemly rabble which filled the entrance to Music Hall, in the struggle to be "in line," when the sale at the window began. The "ticket fiend's" occupation is gone at Music Hall, and the public rejoices.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1890.

Sale of Seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The sale of seats for the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this year be by auction. The series will consist of 24 evening concerts and 24 rehearsals, and the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 15, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 17. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 18, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 20.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, SEPT. 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Rehearsal Tickets at $7.50 Command Good Premiums.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the Symphony rehearsals began at 10 o'clock this morning in Music Hall, buyers being mostly the ticket brokers and ladies. The seats on sale comprised those in the rear portion of the main hall beneath the balcony, a few back rows in the first balcony, and some side seats in the second and third rows of the same. The bidding started in rather slowly, but increased in briskness when the balcony seats were put up. The seats in the rear of the hall averaged perhaps $14 in premiums, the highest price being $17. The balcony went better, most of the bids being above $20, and even reaching as high as $27, which was the price paid for seats 541 and 542 by a gentleman who did not give his name.

These are in the third row of the first balcony, on the left, commanding a good view of the house and stage, and brought the highest price of the morning. Many of the seats went singly or in pairs, since this is the "popular" sale, and did not reach as large figures as the $12 seats. Nevertheless, though not of the best, many went to the ticket brokers in "blocks of four," the favorite combination of those gentlemen. Of the seats in the body of the house many were gathered in by Mr. Dilloway, who seemed the only large buyer at that time. As the balcony tickets came up, however, Mr. Connelly of the Adams House took a hand and appeared to be the high-line buyer of the day. The rear-balcony seats sold well, averaging $18 or $20 apiece. In fact there was competition for nearly every seat in the house.

TRANSCRIPT.

TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 16.

MUSIC-MAD.

Bavaria's late music-mad king was one of the curiosities of the world. But in this country, where every man is a sovereign, there is a city where the whole people seem almost as mad as he! What will the world say of the prices bid at the sale yesterday of the higher-priced season tickets for the public rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra? The premiums reached the highest figure yet touched at these sales. Until now the highest successful bid has been under $100, but yesterday $150, $125, and $115 were paid in several instances, and the occupants of the seats will have the satisfaction of knowing that each two hours of music they shall hear has cost the buyers anywhere from five to seven dollars. This may be to them a solace when Brahms becomes a bore, or the singer is out of tune, or the pianist enters half a measure too late. The less opulent buyers, or less generous if you will, who had their enthusiasm screwed up only to the nine-dollar point—of course there were many of these—on the other hand will be less likely to invoke the aid of philosophy when the tune or the performance suits not their ears. And this will be, not because it is a trait of mankind to find the most fault with that which costs the least, but because these twelve-plus-nine-dollar buyers will be, in all probability, better cultivated connoisseurs.

As at the opera the capacity to appreciate and the ability to judge of music or performance are in inverse proportion to the price of the seats—the higher you go, the less you pay, but the better musical company you will find—so at the Symphony concerts, it is, or it will be, 125 to 9, that on the outskirts of the floor, or in the cramp-producing seats of the galleries, there will be the larger general comprehension of the difference between Schumann and Sullivan, and a greater power of discrimination when the respective merits of German and Italian "methods" are under discussion. There, too, will you find those who can distinguish between the Munich and Paris schools of pianoforte playing, and who can tell with half an ear when it is a Boehm flute or one of the old-fashioned kind that is tootling its way through the mazes of the florid figure in the "William Tell" overture. Still, the owner of the $162 ticket may know all about it, and may have a highly refined taste and a ripe judgment on matters musical, although he has paid more for his seat than is demanded for an equal number of performances at the biggest opera houses in the world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1890.

AT AUCTION FOR THE FIRST TIME.

The $7 50 Seats at the Symphony Rehearsals Bring Good Premiums.

The $7 50 seats for the symphony rehearsals were sold yesterday at auction for the first time. Hitherto the rule of "First come, first served" has obtained in the sale of these seats. Hence the long lines of "waiters" besieging the doors of Music Hall in sun and rain and by day and night in years past.

All this has been done away with. The people who buy the $7 50 seats sat down in Music Hall yesterday morning prepared to bid after the fashion of their more opulent brethren who attended the $12 ticket sale of the day previous. The crowd was nearly as large as on Monday, but its complexion was different. The people had a plainer, every-day sort of a look. They were no less intelligent, but much less fashionable than their predecessors.

"This is the hardest job of the year," sighed one gray-haired man with great wrinkled, stubby hands that looked as if they had done about 40 years of good, hard work. "It's a job, this gittin' symphony tickets for the wimmen folks."

The seats disposed of at $7 50 included those in the last six floor rows beneath the balcony; in the third row of the right and left balconies, and a small section of the second row in the same, and in the last three rows in the rear balcony. The sale was very satisfactory, and a large sum was realized in premiums, the bidding at all times being spirited. The six floor rows beneath the balcony were first sold. The bidding started at the right of the first row at a premium of $12 50. Nearer the centre the premium advanced to $13 50. There was a second advance of a dollar, and Ticket-Seller Connolly secured four centre seats at $14 50. The highest premium paid in this row was $16 50. One centre seat was sold at this figure, and Connolly took a block of four at the same price. The highest premium paid in the second row was $14 50. In the third row $12 was realized. In the fourth row prices ranged from $8 to $12 50. Seats were sold at $8 and $9 in the fifth row. In the sixth and last row, that against the wall, a premium of $7 50 was paid for a number of seats.

The bidding became lively when the balcony seats were reached. There were some desirable seats in the $7 50 section of the second row in the right balcony. It was at the stage end of the balcony. Premiums of $18 and $19 were paid. Prices took another jump in the third row of the right balcony. Four seats were sold for $22 50, two at $23 50, two at $24 and three at $25. The interest in the sale continued strong throughout and it was afternoon before it was over.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 19.

Close of the Symphony Ticket Sales.

The auction sale of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be continued at Music Hall this morning, when the $7.50 seats will be offered. There are 1000 of these seats, which will doubtless sell at very moderate prices.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1890.

MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

Tenth Season.

No seats remain unsold for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEASON TICKETS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL TO-MORROW (THURSDAY) AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19th, at 10 A. M. 1t sep17

Sale of $7 50 Seats for Symphony Rehearsals.

There was a very spirited sale of the $7 50 tickets Tuesday morning at Music Hall for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Symphony Orchestra. This was the first time that these seats had been offered at auction, and the ideas regarding the premiums varied greatly before the sale, both with the management and the public. The seats first offered were the rear rows on the floor of the hall, under the balcony, extending to the rear wall. All of these were the most undesirable seats. The bidding started off briskly, and the first seat was knocked off at $12 50 premium. These seats ranged from $13 50 to $7—less than half a dozen being sold at this latter price, and these the corner end seats, close by the wall. A goodly number brought from $8 to $11. There remained a portion of the second row in the first balcony, and the entire third row on each side, and those were sold at from $19 to $27 premium, several being taken at $24 and $25. The rear seats in the centre balcony brought from $12 50 to $16 premium. The purchasers were largely ladies, and there was a brisk competition between them for certain seats. This was particularly the case as the end of the sale apppoached. It was a gratification to many in the audience to know that the highest price paid for any seat was bid by the speculators. They obtained what they desired, but had to pay for it. The premiums realized from the sale were very satisfactory to the Music Hall management. The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts begins Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. The auction closed yesterday at 12.45.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1890

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tenth Season.

Every seat for the FRIDAY AFTERNOON Public Rehearsals has been sold.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (THURSDAY) AT 10 A. M., CONTINUING DURING THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

SEATS FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Yesterday morning the sale of the $7 50 seats for the Symphony rehearsals Friday afternoons took place at Music Hall. The buyers were mostly ticket brokers and ladies. The seats first offered were the rear rows on the floor of the hall, under the balcony, extending to the rear wall. All of these were the most undesirable seats. The bidding started off briskly, and the first seat was knocked off at $12 50 premium. These seats ranged from $13 50 to $7—less than half a dozen being sold at this latter price, and these the corner end seats, close by the wall. A goodly number brought from $8 to $11. There remained a portion of the second row in the first balcony, and the entire third row on each side, and those were sold at from $19 to $27 premium, several being taken at $24 and $25. The rear seats in the centre balcony brought from $12 50 to $16 premium. It was perhaps a gratification to many to know that the highest price paid for any seat was bid by the speculators. The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts begins Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. The auction closed today at 12:45.

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 17, 1890.

SYMPHONY RECEIPTS.

Figures and Facts Concerning the Sale of the Rehearsal Tickets.

The sale of the $7.50 Symphony rehearsal seats at auction, yesterday, has provoked widespread comment. In spite of everything, however, the scheme was undoubtedly a success. There were at least three buyers for every seat, but, instead of the choice being determined by the stock of patience of the would-be purchaser, the best seats were secured by the owners of the largest pocket-books. Instead of a long line of the "waiting and watching" a longer line of banknotes flowed into the safes of the ticketsellers. A very great reason of the closeness of the bidding was that the number of seats to be sold was reduced by nearly one-half, for the second balcony was not opened.

Thus the 974 cheaper seats of previous years are reduced by 466. The number of seats in the second balcony, the price for which is set at 25 cents, are not reserved.

The auctioneer of the sale says that it was at least 50 per cent better than those of previous years. The $7.50 seats had never before been sold at auction, so the premiums received for them may almost be counted as clear gain. The total amount so taken in is estimated at from $7000 to $10,000, while the receipts from the premiums on the $12 seats are figured at about $30,000. The coming season of the concerts promises to be the most successful ever known.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1890.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra!

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $12.00 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, TOMORROW (THURSDAY), AT 10 A. M., CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 19. 1t[A] s17

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKETS.

The Sale Continued Tuesday—A Lively Demand for Seats.

The sale of $7.50 tickets for the Symphony rehearsals at Music Hall Tuesday was attended by three hundred or four hundred people. The bidding was at times quite spirited, and every seat in the house was sold. The lowest premium paid was $4; the highest was $27 for seats in the back row in the left balcony. As at the sale Monday, a large number of tickets was bought by speculators, presumably on orders, for at the extravagant prices paid it is not probable that speculators could realize any profit on sales made after the excitement of the auction has passed.

Some who were disappointed Monday in their unsuccessful efforts to get tickets came again Tuesday with renewed hopes and possibly with deeper pocketbooks. But many of them were disappointed again, for prices kept high as a rule, only the poor seats at the rear of the hall, under the balcony, selling within reasonable bounds. One man got comfortably seated and waited quietly for the sale to open. But when the first seats knocked down brought a premium of $12.50 he at once left the hall, not waiting to see what the next lot would bring.

A young girl caused some amusement among those around her by persistently starting lot after lot at five dollars, following the bids up to ten dollars, and then sinking back in her seat with an expression of disgust. But she would rally promptly for the next lot, and in all, must have started twenty-five lots.

A woman remarked to a friend that last year she came on admission tickets and rushed for a seat in the upper balcony, but it cost so much for repairs to dresses that this year she thought it would be cheaper to buy a seat at a moderate premium.

There was a feeling during the sale Tuesday morning that the premiums bid were offerings of music lovers. Ridiculously high premiums were paid Monday, in many instances because it is the fashionable thing to go to the Symphony rehearsals. Those premiums were for seats on the floor, however, but the prices paid today were for seats in sections of the hall not considered especially fashionable, though many of the seats are as desirable for music-lovers as many of the high-priced seats in the fashionable quarter.

....This is the day set for the sailing on the Lahn of the North German Lloyd of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. They will be well out from shore when the auction sale of the concert tickets begins at Music Hall tomorrow. Clear skies and fair breezes be with them!

....After all, the speculators managed to secure a good share of the Symphony rehearsal tickets, besides those they bought on orders (among which were included some of the most costly purchases), judging from the numerous advertisements of tickets for sale.

....Tomorrow's auction at Music Hall tells the story of what it is to cost the music lover for his Saturday evening Symphonies.

The Republican.

SPRINGFIELD, WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 17.

The first day's auction of seats for the Boston symphony orchestra rehearsals in Music hall brought out some high premiums for desirable seats; for example, two seats in I row fetched $115 in premiums and two others $125 over the ticket price of $12 apiece. But these and most of the other high premiums were bid by ticket speculators at the various hotels. There were moderate bids from private parties for their own occupancy; thus E. L. Davis of Worcester, president of the Worcester county musical association, bought four seats at $9 premium each, and Gen W. W. Blackman got four seats for $24 extra; though Prof Royce of Harvard paid $30 for a seat in I row. The best seats in the house, judging from the musician's stand-point, the first four rows, did not fetch any of the highest bids, and the buyer of the first seat in A row at a premium of $12.50, was an unknown little woman in black. But the sale prefigured the best of seasons for Mr Higginson's great foundation.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1890.

Auction of Symphony Concert Tickets.

The sale of $12 seats for the regular Saturday night Symphony concerts took place Thursday at Music Hall. The prices, while considerably higher than last year, were, as always, far below those realized for the same class of seats for the rehearsals. The sale opened at $8 for the front rows and rose to $84 in the centre of the hall. Farther in the rear the premiums were exceedingly variable, according to the personal likes of the bidders, seats side by side differing as much as $12 in the premium secured. All of the seats were sold.

The $7 50 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall this morning. There are 1000 of these seats.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its tenth season in Music Hall, Boston, Tuesday, October 1, public rehearsal, and Saturday, October 11, concert. The season will consist, as usual, of twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1890.

ANOTHER DAY'S SALE.

Symphony Concert Tickets Offered at Music Hall Today—Brisk Bidding, but Not Such High Prices as on Monday.

Again, at ten o'clock this morning, Auctioneer Jackson, with baton in hand, appeared on the platform in Music Hall to begin another day of seemingly tiresome yet thoroughly successful work in connection with the sale by premium of all the seats in the hall for a series of Saturday evening Symphony concerts. Signs about the hall gave sufficient notice that "bids are the premium on each seat to be added to $12; none but $12 seats sold today. The $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold tomorrow at 10 A. M."

As compared with the five-days' sale of $12 tickets this week, the attendance today was not large; still it was large enough to make the sale entirely successful.

Speculators were present; in number they were small, but in shrewdness and greediness they were provokingly conspicuous to the mind of the people who came to buy for themselves. It was amusing to mere spectators to watch the skilful way in which these professional ticket-purchasers would secure for a comparatively low sum the choice of four seats, beginning with the third seat from the end of a certain row. By taking the next four seats they would get the end seat on the row named and also the end seat on the next row. Everybody who has ever attended a symphony concert sale knows how this trick is played.

Although the bidding was as brisk as usual this morning, no good prices were received until Row E, the fifth from the front, was reached. The seats in that row sold as follows: Four beginning at the end at the right, $13 each; two at $15 each; one at $20; two at $21.50 each; two at $15 each; four at $17 each; one at $25; two at $33; two at $20 each; two at $19 each; four at $18 each; two at $19 each; two at $14 each; one at $12.50; two at $10 each. In the next row—F.—seats No. 18 and 19 brought the highest price, these selling at $29 each. In row H, seats 20–21 brought the highest price, being $24.50 each. The end seats 16–17 and 18–19 in row I, sold for $33 each.

The four seats in row K, namely, 14–15 and 18–19, which each sold for $150 premium at the sale for rehearsals, today sold for $18.50 and $21. The prices today were far below those at the sale for rehearsals; but this is not an unusual thing.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions. The sale of the $12 seats for concerts began this morning; the $7.50 seats will be offered tomorrow morning; tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office on Saturday.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, SEPT. 18, 1890.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts on Sale.

The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts began at a few minutes after 10 o'clock this morning. At the start the bidding was rather light and the amounts small, but as the sale progressed both increased. A noticeable feature was the small number of ladies present. The first two seats, A 1 and 2, went for $7 apiece; the next five for $6. A 28 and 29 went to a Mr. Stewart for $2.50, while B 1 and 2 only brought $2.25. The average price of row B, however, was about $8. Row C did better, seats 12 and 13 bringing $17, and seats 14 and 15 $19. In the right centre of row C Prof. Royce of Harvard bought two seats.

Row C averaged over $15, the highest price being $20.50 for No. 18. The hall then was being filled and the bidding became rather brisk. As the better seats were offered the prices rose. Row D averaged nearly $20, $25 apiece being paid for seats 17, 18, 19 and 20. Nos. 21 and 22 went to Mr. Clement Fay for $21.50. In Row E Mr. Codman and Mr. Cummings bought several seats with prices in the twenties. In the same section seats 18 and 19 went for $33, the highest price up to 11 o'clock. At that time only five rows had been sold, and the sale promised to continue well through the day. The better seats had not been offered, so the ticket brokers were not yet in competition.

[9]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1890--91. 989

REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1890--91. 215

REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1890--91. 901

CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1890--91. 901

CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (FRIDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

It

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The last of the auction sales of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall this morning, when the $7 50 seats will be offered. There are in all 1000 of these low-priced tickets for the concerts.

PREMIUMS FOR MUSIC HALL SEATS.

Some Lively Bidding at the Ticket Sale for the Symphony.

The sale of seats for the Saturday evening symphony concerts in Music Hall took place yesterday. The $12 seats were sold at auction. There were a good many lovers of music present, and they evidently did not want to go away until they had secured a ticket or two anyhow. The desire not to get left started in many cases a pretty lively run of bidding, but no extraordinary prices were obtained.

The bids began with the "A" row, and the side seats brought $4 premium. Over towards the centre of the house the premiums began to ascend, and about $19 50 was the highest price obtained there. For the first few rows back the premiums paid began to rise, and several seats in "D" sold at $25. In "E," centre, four seats brought $33 besides the original $12, and in the next row high-water mark was reached by the payment of $35 premium. The prices then began to drop, and when a lone seat at the end of "G" was offered it stuck. No one would offer a bid, and the auctioneer finally offered it at $4 premium. One man was found who was willing to pay $4, but as soon as some one else heard the offer he raised it 50 cents. All of a sudden the bids began to be heard and the seat finally brought $10 50 premium before it was knocked down. From here to the end of the $12 seats the prices held at about a $20 premium. None were left over, all being disposed of.

Today the auction sale of $7 50 seats for the Saturday afternoon concerts will begin at 10 A.M. in Music Hall.

IS MUSIC IN BOSTON A FAD?

He who runs to Music Hall this week may read a lesson whose teaching will vary as the mind of the pupil. In the first place he will see a spectacle that cannot be matched in any other American city; he will see a throng of intelligent people jostling each other—financially if not physically—and paying huge sums for the privilege of listening to a series of what may be termed purely orchestral concerts. Music-mad, one might think them, to find such zeal illustrated in so forcible a way. And then the heart may glow with pride that in Boston, of all other places, is such a condition of things at all among the possibilities. But presently comes one who sees that these sums are paid, not for the right to listen—for music is music whether behind a pillar or in proud section K—but for the lease of some particular place to sit, popularly supposed to be desirable and fashionable. Is it true, then, that to these people with fat purses Beethoven is Beethoven and Nikisch is Nikisch only through the medium of the broad aisle and a seat on the sunny side of M?

It must be admitted that it is true, in the limited sense of the question; but this by no means impeaches the musical sincerity and effort of the people as a whole. For what made this very state of things possible? Time was, and not beyond the memory of a child, when the benches before this same symphony orchestra were sometimes wofully bare. Wealth did not go to Music Hall then, but the true music lovers did, and the leaven of earnestness worked till wealth itself could no longer ignore the movement, but came in with a rush, as wealth always does when its enthusiasm is roused. By and by, no one can doubt, it will weary somewhat of its game and will turn to something else, having had its share in raising our splendid band to the high eminence. But the faithful will not desert the old place; they will not follow the lead of dollars to "something new and something strange." Music will be music to them always, and they will close up the gaps made by deserters. They are the people, musically, and they have no fad.

After all, it is not a symphony audience that proves Boston's musical bent and culture. Admitting, as we must, that fashion has set toward Music Hall, it is nothing strange or convincing that huge audiences should gather there. It is the substantial support and good attendance given the smaller organizations that are most to our city's credit. They are just as perfect as the great orchestras, and their work is on fully as high, and, sometimes as severe a plane. The Kneisel, the Listemann and the Adamowski companies never attempt to tickle the ears of their audiences with unworthy melody or rhythm, and yet they are handsomely treated in all ways that help to genuine success. They flourish where "popular" concerts fall utterly, which shows not that the people do not like music but that they like good music, but that they like good music. And if one is tempted, noting the auction battle at the great hall, to declaim against the whole system and to declare its artificialites, let him remember that in the by-ways live those who make no audible sign of their being, but are ever ready to come forth to prove that music is loved for its own sake and not for the pomp that at present seems to hem it in.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1890

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The last of the auction sales of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall this morning, when the $7 50 seats will be offered. There are in all 1000 of these low-priced seats for the concerts.

THE SECOND DAY'S SALES.

How the Symphony Concert Tickets Sold at Music Hall Yesterday.

The second day's sale of Symphony concert tickets, conducted by Auctioneer Jackson in Music Hall, was thoroughly successful in spite of the fact that the attendance was not large. The speculators were present, and provokingly conspicuous to the people who came to buy for themselves. Although the bidding was brisk, no good prices were received until Row E, the fifth from the front, was reached. The seats in that row sold as follows: Four beginning at the end at the right, $13 each; two at $15 each; one at $20; two at $21 50 each; two at $15 each; four at $17 each; one at $25; two at $33; two at $20 each; two at $19 each; four at $18 each; two at $19 each; two at $14 each; one at $12 50; two at $10 each. In the next row—F—seats Nos. 18 and 19 brought the highest price, these selling at $29 each. In row H seats 20-21 brought the highest price, being $24 50 each. The end seats, 16-17 and 18-19, in Row I sold for $33 each. The four seats in Row K, namely, 14-15 and 18-19, which each sold for $150 premium at the sale for rehearsals, yesterday sold for $18 50 and $21. The prices were far below those at the sale for rehearsals, but since the latter have become a fad that is not an unusual occurrence.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Good Prices Paid at Yesterday's Sale in Music Hall.

The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra were offered at auction yesterday, the sale beginning at 10 A. M., and ending at 4:30 P. M., at which latter time all but a half dozen of the seats had been disposed of. The premiums took a wide range, as good seats in the front balcony were knocked off at 25 cents advance while side balcony seats over the stage and seats on the floor from N to double A fetched from $35 to $40.

There was but a small attendance, yet the sale was remarkably spirited during much of the time, and a number of buyers filled big orders. The premiums run below $20, mainly from A to N, on the floor, but from N back the prices frequently went above $30—so that the average was quite as high as that received at last year, which was much ahead of any formerly known for the Saturday evening concerts. The $7.50 seats for the Saturday night concerts, some 900 in all, will be put up at auction this morning.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions. The auction sale of season tickets for both series began on Monday morning, was completed today, when the $7.50 seats for the concerts were offered. All season tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office tomorrow.

Last Sale of Symphony Concert Tickets.

Something like seven hundred of the $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts were sold at premiums at Music Hall today, the attendance filling about one-half of the hall. The best of the seats offered brought but about $5 premium; others brought only $3.25 and $3. Some prices were even as low as $2. No difficulty was experienced in disposing of all the seats, which, by the way, were on the floor under the rear balconies and also in the balconies.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 20, 1890.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts yesterday was as successful as all the sales of the week have been, the premiums ranging from $2 to $10 and $12, with occasional spurts above the latter figure. Practically all of the seats for the rehearsals and concerts have been sold, although there may be one or two dozen of scattered seats remaining. The receipts of this season exceed any previous result in these sales.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 20, 1890.

The Symphony sales this week have been unprecedented for the sums paid in special premiums and for the aggregate of all the amounts thus paid. No rehearsal tickets offered at the auction were untaken, and only a very few for the concerts were left for the box-office.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, SEPT. 19, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Closing Auction Sale of Tickets Held Today.

At 10.15 o'clock this morning Auctioneer Jackson mounted the platform at Music Hall and began on the sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bids were rather low at first, as the auction began with the fourth row of seats on the floor under the balcony, and they are not particularly desirable. The first two seats brought $3.75 premium, and those nearer the centre of the hall went for $5 each.

The next row back brought from $1.50 to 50 cents, and several in the next two rows were not sold at all. Messrs. Goldstein, Stewart & Chase were the principal buyers, and they obtained many very good seats at 25 and 50 cents premium.

After all the seats on the floor were disposed of, those in the sixth row of the centre balcony were sold at prices varying from $2.50 to $6, most of the bids being far below what was expected. Several prominent musical people were noticed among the audience, but they evidently attended merely from curiosity, as few were bidders for seats. There were more ladies present than at any of the previous sales, and the ticket speculators did not exhibit much anxiety to purchase.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tenth Season.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (FRIDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

it

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The last of the auction sales of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall this morning, when the $7 50 seats will be offered. There are in all 1000 of these low-priced tickets for the concerts.

PREMIUMS FOR MUSIC HALL SEATS.

Some Lively Bidding at the Ticket Sale for the Symphony.

The sale of seats for the Saturday evening symphony concerts in Music Hall took place yesterday. The $12 seats were sold at auction. There were a good many lovers of music present, and they evidently did not want to go away until they had secured a ticket or two anyhow. The desire not to get left started in many cases a pretty lively run of bidding, but no extraordinary prices were obtained.

The bids began with the "A" row, and the side seats brought $4 premium. Over towards the centre of the house the premiums began to ascend, and about $19 50 was the highest price obtained there. For the first few rows back the premiums paid began to rise, and several seats in "D" sold at $25. In "E," centre, four seats brought $33 besides the original $12, and in the next row high-water mark was reached by the payment of $35 premium. The prices then began to drop, and when a lone seat at the end of "G" was offered it stuck. No one would offer a bid, and the auctioneer finally offered it at $4 premium. One man was found who was willing to pay $4, but as soon as some one else heard the offer he raised it 50 cents. All of a sudden the bids began to be heard and the seat finally brought $10 50 premium before it was knocked down. From here to the end of the $12 seats the prices held at about a $20 premium. None were left over, all being disposed of.

Today the auction sale of $7 50 seats for the Saturday afternoon concerts will begin at 10 A.M. in Music Hall.

IS MUSIC IN BOSTON A FAD?

He who runs to Music Hall this week may read a lesson whose teaching will vary as the mind of the pupil. In the first place he will see a spectacle that cannot be matched in any other American city; he will see a throng of intelligent people jostling each other—financially if not physically—and paying huge sums for the privilege of listening to a series of what may be termed purely orchestral concerts. Music-mad, one might think them, to find such zeal illustrated in so forcible a way. And then the heart may glow with pride that in Boston, of all other places, is such a condition of things at all among the possibilities. But presently comes one who sees that these sums are paid, not for the right to listen—for music is music whether behind a pillar or in proud section K—but for the lease of some particular place to sit, popularly supposed to be desirable and fashionable. Is it true, then, that to these people with fat purses Beethoven is Beethoven and Nikisch is Nikisch only through the medium of the broad aisle and a seat on the sunny side of M?

It must be admitted that it is true, in the limited sense of the question; but this by no means impeaches the musical sincerity and effort of the people as a whole. For what made this very state of things possible? Time was, and not beyond the memory of a child, when the benches before this same symphony orchestra were sometimes wofully bare. Wealth did not go to Music Hall then, but the true music lovers did, and the leaven of earnestness worked till wealth itself could no longer ignore the movement, but came in with a rush, as wealth always does when its enthusiasm is roused. By and by, no one can doubt, it will weary somewhat of its game and will turn to something else, having had its share in raising our splendid band to the high eminence. But the faithful will not desert the old place; they will not follow the lead of dollars to "something new and something strange." Music will be music to them always, and they will close up the gaps made by deserters. They are the people, musically, and they have no fad.

After all, it is not a symphony audience that proves Boston's musical bent and culture. Admitting, as we must, that fashion has set toward Music Hall, it is nothing strange or convincing that huge audiences should gather there. It is the substantial support and good attendance given the smaller organizations that are most to our city's credit. They are just as perfect as the great orchestra, and their work is on fully as high, and, sometimes as severe a plane. The Kneisel, the Listemann and the Adamowski companies never attempt to tickle the ears of their audiences with unworthy melody or rhythm, and yet they are handsomely treated in all ways that help to genuine success. They flourish where "popular" concerts fail utterly, which shows not that the people do not like music but that they like good music, but that they like good music. And if one is tempted, noting the auction battle at the great hall, to declaim against the whole system and to declare its artificialites, let him remember that in the by-ways live those who make no audible sign of their being, but are ever ready to come forth to prove that music is loved for its own sake and not for the pomp that at present seems to hem it in.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1890

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The last of the auction sales of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall this morning, when the $7 50 seats will be offered. There are in all 1000 of these low-priced seats for the concerts.

THE SECOND DAY'S SALES.

How the Symphony Concert Tickets Sold at Music Hall Yesterday.

The second day's sale of Symphony concert tickets, conducted by Auctioneer Jackson in Music Hall, was thoroughly successful in spite of the fact that the attendance was not large. The speculators were present, and provokingly conspicuous to the people who came to buy for themselves. Although the bidding was brisk, no good prices were received until Row E, the fifth from the front, was reached. The seats in that row sold as follows: Four beginning at the end at the right, $13 each; two at $15 each; one at $20; two at $21 50 each; two at $15 each; four at $17 each; one at $25; two at $33; two at $20 each; two at $19 each; four at $18 each; two at $19 each; two at $14 each; one at $12 50; two at $10 each. In the next row—F—seats Nos. 18 and 19 brought the highest price, these selling at $29 each. In row H seats 20-21 brought the highest price, being $24 50 each. The end seats, 16-17 and 18-19, in Row I sold for $33 each. The four seats in Row K, namely, 14-15 and 18-19, which each sold for $150 premium at the sale for rehearsals, yesterday sold for $18 50 and $21. The prices were far below those at the sale for rehearsals, but since the latter have become a fad that is not an unusual occurrence.

BOSTON HERALD.
FRIDAY, SEPT. 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Good Prices Paid at Yesterday's Sale in Music Hall.

The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra were offered at auction yesterday, the sale beginning at 10 A. M., and ending at 4:30 P. M., at which latter time all but a half dozen of the seats had been disposed of. The premiums took a wide range, as good seats in the front balcony were knocked off at 25 cents advance while side balcony seats over the stage and seats on the floor from N to double A fetched from $35 to $40.

There was but a small attendance, yet the sale was remarkably spirited during much of the time, and a number of buyers filled big orders. The premiums run below $20, mainly from A to N, on the floor, but from N back the prices frequently went above $30—so that the average was quite as high as that received at last year, which was much ahead of any formerly known for the Saturday evening concerts. The $7.50 seats for the Saturday night concerts, some 900 in all, will be put up at auction this morning.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twenty-four concerts and, as many public rehearsals for its tenth season in the Music Hall, as follows: Public rehearsals, Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 10, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions; concerts, Saturday nights, beginning Oct. 11, continued at weekly intervals, with five exceptions. The auction sale of season tickets for both series began on Monday morning, was completed today, when the $7.50 seats for the concerts were offered. All season tickets not taken at the auctions will be sold at the box office tomorrow.

Last Sale of Symphony Concert Tickets.

Something like seven hundred of the $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts were sold at premiums at Music Hall today, the attendance filling about one-half of the hall. The best of the seats offered brought but about $5 premium; others brought only $3.25 and $3. Some prices were even as low as $2. No difficulty was experienced in disposing of all the seats, which, by the way, were on the floor under the rear balconies and also in the balconies.

BOSTON HERALD.
SATURDAY, SEPT. 20, 1890.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts yesterday was as successful as all the sales of the week have been, the premiums ranging from $2 to $10 and $12, with occasional spurts above the latter figure. Practically all of the seats for the rehearsals and concerts have been sold, although there may be one or two dozen of scattered seats remaining. The receipts of this season exceed any previous result in these sales.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 20, 1890.

The Symphony sales this week have been unprecedented for the sums paid in special premiums and for the aggregate of all the amounts thus paid. No rehearsal tickets offered at the auction were untaken, and only a very few for the concerts were left for the box-office.

Boston Daily Traveller
FRIDAY, SEPT. 19, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Closing Auction Sale of Tickets Held Today.

At 10.15 o'clock this morning Auctioneer Jackson mounted the platform at Music Hall and began on the sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bids were rather low at first, as the auction began with the fourth row of seats on the floor under the balcony, and they are not particularly desirable. The first two seats brought $3.75 premium, and those nearer the centre of the hall went for $5 each.

The next row back brought from $1.50 to 50 cents, and several in the next two rows were not sold at all. Messrs. Goldstein, Stewart & Chase were the principal buyers, and they obtained many very good seats at 25 and 50 cents premium.

After all the seats on the floor were disposed of, those in the sixth row of the centre balcony were sold at prices varying from $2.50 to $6, most of the bids being far below what was expected. Several prominent musical people were noticed among the audience, but they evidently attended merely from curiosity, as few were bidders for seats. There were more ladies present than at any of the previous sales, and the ticket speculators did not exhibit much anxiety to purchase.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1890--91. 989
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium,
Name.

[9]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1890--91. 215
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium,
Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1890--91. 901
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1890--91. 901
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name.

[10]

BOSTON DAILY AD[illegible]
Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEATS.

A Good Sale of Saturday Night Seats at $7 50.

There was another large gathering of people at Music Hall yesterday, when the auction sale of $7 50 seats for the Saturday night symphony concerts began. The seats sold were those in the last six rows on the floor; the last three rows in the first balcony, rear; the third row in the first balcony, right and left; and the second balcony. In addition a few seats in the second row of the first balcony were sold.

Among the people who attended the sale were many well-known musicians. The great basso Babcock bought three good seats, at $6 premium in the first of the six floor rows. Arthur Foote and W. L. Whitney of the Conservatory were two other musicians present. There was also a sprinkling of symphony orchestra players.

The highest premium paid for seats on the floor was $7 50. This was in the first row. In the second row the highest premium paid was $5 and in the third $3. After that prices declined rapidly.

Premiums did not range very high during the sale of the seats in the three rear rows of the first balcony. In the first row $6 was touched, in the second row $5 50, and in the third row $4 50.

The bidding became lively as soon as the side seats in the first balcony were reached. The few second row seats in the right balcony were sold first, four being sold at $10 50. Good premiums were realized during the sale of the seats in the third row against the wall. The premiums began at $8 50 at the upper end of the row and rose to $9 50, and then dropped to $9 and $8, and then jumped up to $13 50, one-half way down the row. Three seats were sold at this figure which was the highest reached. Seats farther down the row were sold at $8 50 and $9 25.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBE 20, 1890

The sale of symphony tickets this year has been a most interesting one. In past seasons it has been stated that Mr. HIGGINSON did not make himself whole with the receipts of the concerts. Not that that was a matter of vital importance to a man whose object, like that of the rich Boston banker, was for the holy cause of music, still, it was worth recording. If it be true that the premiums at the auction this year of the rehearsal alone were over $66,000, then this year Mr. HIGGINSON must have a margin on the profit side of his account.

The auction sale of tickets for the Symphony concerts attracted a large audience to Music Hall on Monday. The bids were high; many of the highest were orders. Miss Virginia Stackpole, Miss Fitzgerald, Mr. Elliott Pratt, Mr. Barton Jenks, Mr. Frank Stanwood, Miss Newell, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Nat Childs, Miss Niles and Mr. Willis Nowell were noticed amongst those present.

Many compliments have been paid Mr. Jackson, who auctioned the symphony seats. It was a trying position, but he carried himself with dignity.

There is little doubt but that the Symphony concerts are to be more popular this season than ever from the rapid way in which the tickets are being disposed of. The bidding was very animated at the auctions during the past week, and the fabulous prices some of the seats brought was most astonishing. It is quite evident that one cannot be truly fashionable this winter and not attend these concerts.

Mr. Adamowski has been giving great pleasure in Lenox, it being the first time that New York society has had an opportunity to hear him play. On Friday morning the large room of Mrs. Greenleaf was filled with a most appreciative audience, when, added to Mr. Adamowski's fine selection, Mrs. Nicholas Fish of New York sang wonderfully well, she being in excellent voice. Lenox never was gayer than at the present season. Mrs. John Struthers gave a delightful musical last week. She being a very fine pianist herself, naturally attracts a most charming collection of musical people about her.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21.

The excitement to procure seats for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was greater than ever this year, and the prices that were paid in several instances were as surprising as they were unaccountable. It was all very well in its way, as it made it more possible to give these fine concerts without loss to their founder, and is to be commended from that point of view; but beyond this the matter of wild frenzy for this or that particular seat in a part of Music Hall, where all the seats are equally desirable, becomes amusing rather than edifying; and a premium of close upon two hundred dollars for a seat at the rehearsals rises to the astounding. That the pleasure derived from listening to music from that costly seat will be more intense than that derived from listening to it from any other seat on the same row, is scarcely probable; though it would seem that the expenditure of such a sum should insure to its expender some privilege or some superiority of emotion refused to those who have paid a lesser sum for seats, and rigidly denied to those who listen to the rehearsals from a twenty-five cent locality. Perhaps, however, it is musical enthusiasm; perhaps, though, on the other hand, it is merely exaggerated indulgence in a fad.

—The sale of seats for the Symphony concerts attracted a number of well-known persons to Music Hall on Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, fresh from Europe, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. P. Blake, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Miss Gardner, Mr Parkman Haven, Mrs. William Wesselhoeft, Mr. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Gen. Dwight Faulkner, Mrs. S. A. Williams, Mr. Howard Walker, Mrs. Morton, Mrs. Darwin E. Ware, Mr. Robert M. Cushing, Miss Russell, Mr. Hecht, Mr. John Appleton Brown, Miss Heloise Hersey and Prof. Royce were among those present.

—"D——n the Symphony Concerts!" is what many husbands, fathers and lovers exclaimed vigorously last week.

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

In order to convey to the musical public an idea of the extent to which it "patronizes"—the word is vile, but must pass for the present—a musical enterprise of transcendent worth and value, pains have been taken to collate the figures of the sales of season tickets to the coming concerts and public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The results are given in the tables below. Absolute accuracy is not guaranteed. It is not unlikely, for instance, that the figures of some of the successful bids are incorrectly set down. There were also at both sales some seats that were bid off which were not taken. But the sum total in either column must surely be less than that which the treasurer's accounts will show. The receipts both at public rehearsals and at concerts will be augmented by the sale of admission tickets whose holders will find seats on the stage at the rehearsals or standing room in the aisles or about the doorways, on the floor, on all occasions. There is also more money to come in from the sale at the window of seats not sold at the auction. The several totals, however, are near enough to exact truth for the purpose of this article.

The reader will be instantly impressed by the differences in results between the sales of rehearsal and of concert tickets; the former earned an aggregate premium of over two hundred per cent.; the latter fell short of one hundred per cent. premium. Fashion, the cause? Possibly; but one would naturally think the Saturday-night concert the better opportunity for display of self and decorations than Friday afternoon, when a majority of the audience are young in years and society, or are from the suburbs and are making the hours serve both their artistic aspirations and their household needs. However, the figures are there and they are produced by bigger premiums all along the line than were earned from the sale of concert tickets. Therefore we may accept it as settled that to be seen at the rehearsals is to give assurance of one's prominence in society. They will be the counterparts of the Thursday nights at the Comédie-Française—perhaps.

There is another interesting comparison. The average receipts at the German opera in New York, last season (sixty-seven performances), was $3054.39. Note how small is the difference between this sum and the average for the public rehearsals. In this the hopeful may see an augury of a permanent opera in this city. But let us not be too sanguine in that direction. There is a little matter of an average of $3000 a night, contributed by the boxholders of the Metropolitan Opera House as a subvention to the German opera, and there was not much left of this princely subsidy to carry over to the coming season.

The reader will ask of himself or of others the question, Do not the symphony concerts pay now? An answer cannot be given here. But it may be said that the premiums on the $7.50 seats, which never before had gone into the treasurer's hands, seem to be the sum that represents a profit on the venture. From this profit, however, there will be deducted in the course of the season the losses that will come on the concert tours to the West and the South, not all of which are likely to be remunerative, but which will be undertaken, as before, mainly as a means of furnishing the orchestra with constant employment.

Study of the figures also suggests, as a device to head off the speculator—who has been very numerous through these four days' sales—that the average cost of the several styles of tickets be taken as the basis for next season's sales. Thus the prices for season tickets to the rehearsals might be $20.00 and $40.00, or less, instead of $7.50 and $12.00; those for the concerts might be $15.00 and $25.00, respectively. A principal argument in favor of this plan is that the figures show that the public is willing to pay these prices, "on an average." On the other hand the buyers who this year have secured tickets for either series at half the average, will find the plan hardly to their liking and perhaps not suited to their means.

The history of music contains no record of so large an expenditure of money in one city for a single season of concerts of classic music, without dramatic or choral element to lend attractiveness to the scheme. In round numbers 5000 people will weekly gather to hear the masterpieces of orchestral writing interpreted by an orchestra of adequate resources and superb material under the direction of a musician of genius and thought. The reader is now at liberty to study the figures:

	REHEARSALS.	CONCERTS.
$12 Tickets:
Number sold.....	1,351	1,322
Par value.....	$16,212.00	$15,864.00
Premiums.....	36,390.25	14,787.00
Total.....	$52,552.25	$30,651,00
Range of premiums.....	$9 to $150.00	25c to $39.00
Average premium...	26.90	11.19
Average cost.....	38.90	23.19
$7.50 Tickets:
Number sold.....	508	887
Par value.....	$3,810.00	$6,652.50
Premiums.....	7,044.25	4,307.75
Total.....	$10,854,25	$10,960.25
Range of premiums.....	$4 to $27.00	25c to $15.50
Average premium.....	13.87	4.86
Average cost.....	21.37	12.36
Both Grades:
Number sold.....	1,859	2,209
Par value.....	$20,022.00	$22,516.50
Premiums.....	43,384.50	19,094.75
Total sales..	$63,406.50	$41,611.25
Average par.....	$10.77	$10.19
Average premium....	23.34	8.64
Average cost....	$34.11	$18.83
Add to total sales	$63,406.50	$41,611.25
Receipts for 466 admissions to upper gallery, each rehearsal, at 25c, $116.50, 24 rehearsals.....	2,796.00
Grand total receipts..	$66,202.50	$41,611.25
Average receipts.....	$2,758.44	$1,733.80
Assured receipts for both series.....		$107,813.75
Average receipts, 48 performances.....		2,246.12

[illegible]rcury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date.....

The Symphony Concerts.

Last evening 702 tickets for the Boston symphony orchestra concerts had been subscribed for. The financial success of [illegible]

[illegible]—Among the crowd of prominent people who secured some of the best seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts at the Music Hall last week through their agents, Mr. Connelly and others, were Mrs. J. H. Sturgis, Mrs. George W. Wright, Mr. T. F. Cushing, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mr. Parsons, Mr. C. L. Lovering, Prof. Cross, Mr. Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper Sr., Mr. William Farnsworth, the Ames, Mr. Candler of Brookline, Miss Cheney of Marlboro st., Mr. Kwyvet W. Sears, Mr. H. P. Bridge, Mr. W. H. Allen, Miss Heloise Hersey, Mrs. T. C. Loring of Brookline and Mr. W. G. Webb of Salem. The auction was attended by a larger number than last year, and the bidding was very lively. Mr. Ellis, with his assistants Mr. Comee and Mr. Hughes, were most assiduous in their difficult task of managing the financial part of the sales, and their promptness and courtesy were fully appreciated by every buyer.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 21, 1890.

The Kneisel quartette will play in Providence, R. I., some time in October.

The most enjoyable event that has taken place as yet in Lenox was a concert for the benefit of Mr. Adamowski, for which Dr. Greenleaf lent the use of his beautiful music room, with its fine organ and piano. Mrs. Nicholas Fish sang delightfully with both piano and violin accompaniment, and her selections from Mendelsshon's "St. Paul," with Mr. Dixie at the organ, were given with great taste and true knowledge of her art. Mr. Adamowski was, as usual, charming in his violin playing. —N. Y. Sun.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22 1890.

The proscenium for the performance this evening in Music Hall of "Robin Hood" by the Bostonians was in position Saturday afternoon. The arch is very handsomely decorated, the colors being bronze and dark green, and the design is specially appropriate to the drama. A rich garnet colored curtain adds to the beauty of the stage, and everything will be in working order in season for this evening's performance. The opening in the proscenium is ample for all purposes, and the stage itself will be found to be large enough. There will be an interested audience this evening, and the advance sale for the entire season is very encouraging.

T HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 189 0

The event of the week was the Symphony concert sale. The audiences were fashionable, and at the rehearsal sales the premiums were large. The satire of the thing has ceased to exist from familiarity with it. The to-be cheap classical concerts which a philanthropic capitalist was to offer up on the altar of art have been lost sight of, and Boston can only take pride in her ability to put fifty-two large and fashionable audiences into Music Hall every winter. Money has it as usual.

Inter-Ocean, Chicago Ill.

[illegible]te.....9/

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 16.—Special Telegram—The demand for tickets this year to the symphony concerts is phenomenal. The auction sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals took place yesterday and the prices were far beyond those of previous years. For the first choice $150 premium was paid on each of four seats. The regular price for the seats was $12, which added to the premium makes a total of $162 for each seat, or about $7 per seat for each concert, while the regular price is only 50 cents. A new departure was made in the sale of the rehearsal and concert tickets. Last year the $12 and $7.50 seats were sold at auction, the lower priced seats being offered at the box office to the first comer without premium. This mode of sale led to such a demoralized condition of affairs about the box office by the employment of messenger boys and other representatives of the buyers for days previous to the sale, that it was determined this year to offer all the seats at auction. The attendance at to-day's sale was quite as large as at that of Monday, and the competition was quite as sharp. The sale began on the floor and the first lot of four seats brought $13 each, the bidding starting at a premium of $5. The prices quickly jumped to $18 and $20, and as the last seats on the floor were put up the bidding took a jump, so that the back rows of the side balconies sold at about an average of $20 premium, and a better figure was got for the back rows of the front balcony. In all 508 seats offered brought, it is estimated, over $10,000 in premiums, making a clear gain of that amount over last year's receipts, in addition to the increased prices paid for the $12 seats on Monday. The Saturday evening concerts will be sold Thursday and Friday.

POST, Hartford Conn.

Date.....9/19

Boston has invested $10,000 in tickets for the symphony concerts. Music reigns in that town of east winds

---

New Milford, and John P. Healy from Winn[illegible] Lock[illegible]

BOSTON LOVES GOOD MUSIC,

AND SEEMS RIGHT WILLING TO PAY HANDSOMELY FOR IT.

BOSTON, Sept. 15.—The sale of season tickets for the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun in Music Hall to-day. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen, notwithstanding the storm. The bidding was very lively and the prices ranged very high—much higher, it was stated, than ever before. The highest premium at which seats were knocked down was $150 each for four seats in K—the tenth row—which were taken by Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House newsstand. This was the first premium paid, and the bidding on these seats between Mr. Connelly and Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House was very spirited. The result was received with some applause. As usual, the premiums paid increased the further back the seats were situated, until the end of the first division, about the middle of the hall, was reached.

This year a change has been introduced in the manner of disposing of the tickets, both for the rehearsals and the concerts. The scale of prices of season tickets for each series was the same—$12 and $7.50, according to location—and there was no change in the divisions of the house, but the twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals were sold to-day, and the seven-dollar-and-fifty-cent seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place to-morrow.

Among the prominent bidders at to-day's sale were C. J. Connelly of the Adams House, Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House, Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, George F. Wadsworth, presumably representing Col. Henry L. Higginson; George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band; Arthur Foote, Frank Capen Herrick, Levi C. Wade, President Mexican Central Railway; Prof. Royce of Harvard University, and E. S. Davis of Worcester.

Clipping from Sentinel Fitchburg Mass

Date 9/19

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

The auction sales of season tickets for the two series of performances by the Boston S[illegible]chestra will begin at Music Hall, Boston, next Monday, when the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, respectively.

Clipping from Times, Philadelphia Pa.

Date.....9/1[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

Special Telegram to THE TIMES.

BOSTON, September 15.—The auction sale of the seats for the matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day. The seats offered were those at $12 for the season of twenty-four matinees, the cheaper seats being kept till to-morrow. In spite of a driving rain-storm the sale was the most astonishing success ever known here. Every seat was sold. Last year the highest premium was $95, making $107 in all. This year many seats were sold at premiums ranging from $100 to $125, while four brought $150 premium, or $648 for four seats for twenty-five Friday afternoon concerts. The popularity of the orchestra and of Mr. Nikisch were never before so clearly manifested.

Clipping from Rochester Ev[illegible]

Date.....

BOSTON dotes on music. At the auction sale of symphony concert ticket the first four seat went for $[illegible] each for the season's Friday afternoon rehearsals, or about $7 a seat for each performance, while the premiums for all the seats aggregated $10,000.

Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date.....9/16

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Large Premiums Paid for Seats on the First Day's Sale.

BOSTON, Sept. 15 [SPECIAL]—The auction sale of the seats for the matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day. The seats offered were those at $12 for the season of twenty-four matinees, the cheaper seats being kept till to-morrow. In spite of a driving rainstorm, the sale was the most astonishing success ever known here. Every seat was sold.

Last year the highest premium was $95, making $107 in all. This year many seats were sold at premiums ranging from $100 to $125, while four brought $150 premium. The immense popularity of the orchestra and of Mr. Nikisch were never before so clearly manifested.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEATS.

A Good Sale of Saturday Night Seats at $7 50.

There was another large gathering of people at Music Hall yesterday, when the auction sale of $7 50 seats for the Saturday night symphony concerts began. The seats sold were those in the last six rows on the floor; the last three rows in the first balcony, rear; the third row in the first balcony, right and left; and the second balcony. In addition a few seats in the second row of the first balcony were sold.

Among the people who attended the sale were many well-known musicians. The great basso Babcock bought three good seats at $6 premium in the first of the six floor rows. Arthur Foote and W. L. Whitney of the Conservatory were two other musicians present. There was also a sprinkling of symphony orchestra players.

The highest premium paid for seats on the floor was $7 50. This was in the first row. In the second row the highest premium paid was $5 and in the third $3. After that prices declined rapidly.

Premiums did not range very high during the sale of the seats in the three rear rows of the first balcony. In the first row $6 was touched, in the second row $5 50, and in the third row $4 50.

The bidding became lively as soon as the side seats in the first balcony were reached. The few second row seats in the right balcony were sold first, four being sold at $10 50. Good premiums were realized during the sale of the seats in the third row against the wall. The premiums began at $8 50 at the upper end of the row and rose to $9 50, and then dropped to $9 and $8, and then jumped up to $13 50, one-half way down the row. Three seats were sold at this figure which was the highest reached. Seats farther down the row were sold at $8 50 and $9 25.

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBE 20, 1890

The sale of symphony tickets this year has been a most interesting one. In past seasons it has been stated that Mr. HIGGINSON did not make himself whole with the receipts of the concerts. Not that that was a matter of vital importance to a man whose object, like that of the rich Boston banker, was for the holy cause of music, still, it was worth recording. If it be true that the premiums at the auction this year of the rehearsal alone were over $66,000, then this year Mr. HIGGINSON must have a margin on the profit side of his account.

The auction sale of tickets for the Symphony concerts attracted a large audience to Music Hall on Monday. The bids were high; many of the highest were orders. Miss Virginia Stackpole, Miss Fitzgerald, Mr. Elliott Pratt, Mr. Barton Jenks, Mr. Frank Stanwood, Miss Newell, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Nat Childs, Miss Niles and Mr. Willis Nowell were noticed amongst those present.

Many compliments have been paid Mr. Jackson, who auctioned the symphony seats. It was a trying position, but he carried himself with dignity.

There is little doubt but that the Symphony concerts are to be more popular this season than ever from the rapid way in which the tickets are being disposed of. The bidding was very animated at the auctions during the past week, and the fabulous prices some of the seats brought was most astonishing. It is quite evident that one cannot be truly fashionable this winter and not attend these concerts.

Mr. Adamowski has been giving great pleasure in Lenox, it being the first time that New York society has had an opportunity to hear him play. On Friday morning the large room of Mrs. Greenleaf was filled with a most appreciative audience, when, added to Mr. Adamowski's fine selection, Mrs. Nicholas Fish of New York sang wonderfully well, she being in excellent voice. Lenox never was gayer than at the present season. Mrs. John Struthers gave a delightful musical last week. She being a very fine pianist herself, naturally attracts a most charming collection of musical people about her.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21.

The excitement to procure seats for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was greater than ever this year, and the prices that were paid in several instances were as surprising as they were unaccountable. It was all very well in its way, as it made it more possible to give these fine concerts without loss to their founder, and is to be commended from that point of view; but beyond this the matter of wild frenzy for this or that particular seat in a part of Music Hall, where all the seats are equally desirable, becomes amusing rather than edifying; and a premium of close upon two hundred dollars for a seat at the rehearsals rises to the astounding. That the pleasure derived from listening to music from that costly seat will be more intense than that derived from listening to it from any other seat on the same row, is scarcely probable; though it would seem that the expenditure of such a sum should insure to its expender some privilege or some superiority of emotion refused to those who have paid a lesser sum for seats, and rigidly denied to those who listen to the rehearsals from a twenty-five cent locality. Perhaps, however, it is musical enthusiasm; perhaps, though, on the other hand, it is merely exaggerated indulgence in a fad.

—The sale of seats for the Symphony concerts attracted a number of well-known persons to Music Hall on Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, fresh from Europe, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. P. Blake, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Miss Gardner, Mr Parkman Haven, Mrs. William Wesselhoeft, Mr. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Gen. Dwight Faulkner, Mrs. S. A. Williams, Mr. Howard Walker, Mrs. Morton, Mrs. Darwin E. Ware, Mr. Robert M. Cushing, Miss Russell, Mr. Hecht, Mr. John Appleton Brown, Miss Heloise Hersey and Prof. Royce were among those present.

—"D——n the Symphony Concerts!" is what many husbands, fathers and lovers exclaimed vigorously last week.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY [illegible] 20.

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

In order to convey to the musical public an idea of the extent to which it "patronizes"—the word is vile, but must pass for the present—a musical enterprise of transcendent worth and value, pains have been taken to collate the figures of the sales of season tickets to the coming concerts and public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The results are given in the tables below. Absolute accuracy is not guaranteed. It is not unlikely, for instance, that the figures of some of the successful bids are incorrectly set down. There were also at both sales some seats that were bid off which were not taken. But the sum total in either column must surely be less than that which the treasurer's accounts will show. The receipts both at public rehearsals and at concerts will be augmented by the sale of admission tickets whose holders will find seats on the stage at the rehearsals or standing room in the aisles or about the doorways, on the floor, on all occasions. There is also more money to come in from the sale at the window of seats not sold at the auction. The several totals, however, are near enough to exact truth for the purpose of this article.

The reader will be instantly impressed by the differences in results between the sales of rehearsal and of concert tickets; the former earned an aggregate premium of over two hundred per cent.; the latter fell short of one hundred per cent. premium. Fashion, the cause? Possibly; but one would naturally think the Saturday-night concert the better opportunity for display of self and decorations than Friday afternoon, when a majority of the audience are young in years and society, or are from the suburbs and are making the hours serve both their artistic aspirations and their household needs. However, the figures are there and they are produced by bigger premiums all along the line than were earned from the sale of concert tickets. Therefore we may accept it as settled that to be seen at the rehearsals is to give assurance of one's prominence in society. They will be the counterparts of the Thursday nights at the Comédie-Française—perhaps.

There is another interesting comparison. The average receipts at the German opera in New York, last season (sixty-seven performances), was $3054.39. Note how small is the difference between this sum and the average for the public rehearsals. In this the hopeful may see an augury of a permanent opera in this city. But let us not be too sanguine in that direction. There is a little matter of an average of $3000 a night, contributed by the boxholders of the Metropolitan Opera House as a subvention to the German opera, and there was not much left of this princely subsidy to carry over to the coming season.

The reader will ask of himself or of others the question, Do not the symphony concerts pay now? An answer cannot be given here. But it may be said that the premiums on the $7.50 seats, which never before had gone into the treasurer's hands, seem to be the sum that represents a profit on the venture. From this profit, however, there will be deducted in the course of the season the losses that will come on the concert tours to the West and the South, not all of which are likely to be remunerative, but which will be undertaken, as before, mainly as a means of furnishing the orchestra with constant employment.

Study of the figures also suggests, as a device to head off the speculator—who has been very numerous through these four days' sales—that the average cost of the several styles of tickets be taken as the basis for next season's sales. Thus the prices for season tickets to the rehearsals might be $20.00 and $40.00, or less, instead of $7.50 and $12.00; those for the concerts might be $15.00 and $25.00, respectively. A principal argument in favor of this plan is that the figures show that the public is willing to pay these prices, "on an average." On the other hand the buyers who this year have secured tickets for either series at half the average, will find the plan hardly to their liking and perhaps not suited to their means.

The history of music contains no record of so large an expenditure of money in one city for a single season of concerts of classic music, without dramatic or choral element to lend attractiveness to the scheme. In round numbers 5000 people will weekly gather to hear the masterpieces of orchestral writing interpreted by an orchestra of adequate resources and superb material under the direction of a musician of genius and thought. The reader is now at liberty to study the figures:

	REHEARSALS.	CONCERTS.
$12 Tickets:
Number sold	1,351	1,322
Par value	$16,212.00	$15,864.00
Premiums	36,390.25	14,787.00
Total	$52,552.25	$30,651,00
Range of premiums	$9 to $150.00	25c to $39.00
Average premium	26.90	11.19
Average cost	38.90	23.19
$7.50 Tickets:
Number sold	508	887
Par value	$3,810.00	$6,652.50
Premiums	7,044.25	4,307.75
Total	$10,854,25	$10,960.25
Range of premiums	$4 to $27.00	25c to $15.50
Average premium	13.87	4.86
Average cost	21.37	12.36
Both Grades:
Number sold	1,859	2,209
Par value	$20,022.00	$22,516.50
Premiums	43,384.50	19,094.75
Total sales	$63,406.50	$41,611.25
Average par	$10.77	$10.19
Average premium	23.34	8.64
Average cost	$34.11	$18.83
Add to total sales	$63,406.50	$41,611.25
Receipts for 466 admissions to upper gallery, each rehearsal, at 25c, $116.50, 24 rehearsals	2,796.00
Grand total receipts	$66,202.50	$41,611.25
Average receipts	$2,758.44	$1,733.80
Assured receipts for both series		$107,813.75
Average receipts, 48 performances		2,246.12

---

rcury, New Bedford, Mass.
Date

The Symphony Concerts.

Last evening 702 tickets for the Boston symphony orchestra concerts had been subscribed for. The financial success of the concerts is therefore assured.

Boston Evening Globe.
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 21, 1890.

—Among the crowd of prominent people who secured some of the best seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts at the Music Hall last week, through their agents, Mr. Connelly and others, were Mrs. J. H. Sturgis, Mrs. George W. Wright, Mr. T. F. Cushing, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mr. Parsons, Mr. C. L. Lovering, Prof. Cross, Mr. Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper Sr., Mr. William Farnsworth, the Ames, Mr. Candler of Brookline, Miss Cheney of Marlboro st., Mr. Kwyvet W. Sears, Mr. H. P. Bridge, Mr. W. H. Allen, Miss Heloise Hersey, Mrs. T. C. Loring of Brookline and Mr. W. G. Webb of Salem. The auction was attended by a larger number than last year, and the bidding was very lively. Mr. Ellis, with his assistants Mr. Comee and Mr. Hughes, were most assiduous in their difficult task of managing the financial part of the sales, and their promptness and courtesy were fully appreciated by every buyer.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 21, 1890.

The Kneisel quartette will play in Providence, R. I., some time in October.

The most enjoyable event that has taken place as yet in Lenox was a concert for the benefit of Mr. Adamowski, for which Dr. Greenleaf lent the use of his beautiful music room, with its fine organ and piano. Mrs. Nicholas Fish sang delightfully with both piano and violin accompaniment, and her selections from Mendelsshon's "St. Paul," with Mr. Dixie at the organ, were given with great taste and true knowledge of her art. Mr. Adamowski was, as usual, charming in his violin playing. —N. Y. Sun.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1890.

The proscenium for the performance this evening in Music Hall of "Robin Hood" by the Bostonians was in position Saturday afternoon. The arch is very handsomely decorated, the colors being bronze and dark green, and the design is specially appropriate to the drama. A rich garnet colored curtain adds to the beauty of the stage, and everything will be in working order in season for this evening's performance. The opening in the proscenium is ample for all purposes, and the stage itself will be found to be large enough. There will be an interested audience this evening, and the advance sale for the entire season is very encouraging.

T HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1890

The event of the week was the Symphony concert sale. The audiences were fashionable, and at the rehearsal sales the premiums were large. The satire of the thing has ceased to exist from familiarity with it. The to-be cheap classical concerts which a philanthropic capitalist was to offer up on the altar of art have been lost sight of, and Boston can only take pride in her ability to put fifty-two large and fashionable audiences into Music Hall every winter. Money has it as usual.

Inter-Ocean, Chicago, Ill.
Date 9/1

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 16.—Special Telegram—The demand for tickets this year to the symphony concerts is phenomenal. The auction sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals took place yesterday and the prices were far beyond those of previous years. For the first choice $150 premium was paid on each of four seats. The regular price for the seats was $12, which added to the premium makes a total of $162 for each seat, or about $7 per seat for each concert, while the regular price is only 50 cents. A new departure was made in the sale of the rehearsal and concert tickets. Last year the $12 and $7.50 seats were sold at auction, the lower priced seats being offered at the box office to the first comer without premium. This mode of sale led to such a demoralized condition of affairs about the box office by the employment of messenger boys and other representatives of the buyers for days previous to the sale, that it was determined this year to offer all the seats at auction. The attendance at to-day's sale was quite as large as at that of Monday, and the competition was quite as sharp. The sale began on the floor and the first lot of four seats brought $13 each, the bidding starting at a premium of $5. The prices quickly jumped to $13 and $20, and as the last seats on the floor were put up the bidding took a jump, so that the back rows of the side balconies sold at about an average of $20 premium, and a better figure was got for the back rows of the front balcony. In all 508 seats offered brought, it is estimated, over $10,000 in premiums, making a clear gain of that amount over last year's receipts, in addition to the increased prices paid for the $12 seats on Monday. The Saturday evening concerts will be sold Thursday and Friday.

POST, Hartford, Conn.
Date 9/19

Boston has invested $10,000 in tickets for the symphony concerts. Music reigns in that town of east winds.

Times, New York City.
Date 9/16

[10]

New-Milford [illegible] John P. Healy from Wm. [illegible] Locks.

BOSTON LOVES GOOD MUSIC,

AND SEEMS RIGHT WILLING TO PAY HANDSOMELY FOR IT.

BOSTON, Sept. 15.—The sale of season tickets for the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun in Music Hall to-day. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen, notwithstanding the storm. The bidding was very lively and the prices ranged very high—much higher, it was stated, than ever before. The highest premium at which seats were knocked down was $150 each for four seats in K—the tenth row—which were taken by Mr. C. J. Connelly of the Adams House newsstand. This was the first premium paid, and the bidding on these seats between Mr. Connelly and Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House was very spirited. The result was received with some applause. As usual, the premiums paid increased the further back the seats were situated, until the end of the first division, about the middle of the hall, was reached.

This year a change has been introduced in the manner of disposing of the tickets, both for the rehearsals and the concerts. The scale of prices of season tickets for each series was the same—$12 and $7.50, according to location—and there was no change in the divisions of the house, but the twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals were sold to-day, and the seven-dollar-and-fifty-cent seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place to-morrow.

Among the prominent bidders at to-day's sale were C. J. Connelly of the Adams House, Charles H. Thayer of the Parker House, Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, George F. Wadsworth, presumably representing Col. Henry L. Higginson; George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band; Arthur Foote, Frank Capen Herrick, Levi C. Wade, President Mexican Central Railway; Prof. Royce of Harvard University, and E. S. Davis of Worcester.

Clipping from Sentinel
Fitchburg Mass
Date 9/17

The Symphony Ticket Sale.

The auction sales of season tickets for the two series of performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Music hall, Boston, next Monday, when the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, respectively.

Clipping from Times, Philadelphia Pa.
Date 9/16

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

Special Telegram to THE TIMES.

BOSTON, September 15.—The auction sale of the seats for the matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day. The seats offered were those at $12 for the season of twenty-four matinees, the cheaper seats being kept till to-morrow. In spite of a driving rain-storm the sale was the most astonishing success ever known here. Every seat was sold. Last year the highest premium was $95, making $107 in all. This year many seats were sold at premiums ranging from $100 to $125, while four brought $150 premium, or $648 for four seats for twenty-five Friday afternoon concerts. The popularity of the orchestra and of Mr. Nikisch were never before so clearly manifested.

Clipping from Boston Herald
Date 9/16

BOSTON dotes on music. At the auction sale of symphony concert ticket the first four seat went for $162 each for the season's Friday afternoon rehearsals, or about $7 a seat for each performance, while the premiums for all the seats aggregated $10,000.

[illegible], Mass.
Date 9/16

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Large Premiums Paid for Seats on the First Day's Sale.

BOSTON, Sept. 15 [SPECIAL]—The auction sale of the seats for the matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day. The seats offered were those at $12 for the season of twenty-four matinees, the cheaper seats being kept till to-morrow. In spite of a driving rainstorm, the sale was the most astonishing success ever known here. Every seat was sold.

Last year the highest premium was $95, making $107 in all. This year many seats were sold at premiums ranging from $100 to $125, while four brought $150 premium. The immense popularity of the orchestra and of Mr. Nikisch were never before so clearly manifested.

Date 9/17

The symphony concerts will be the fashionable musical craze in Boston this season. Although the price of seats has been raised, the demand is greater than ever. New Bedford music lovers have reason for gratitude to the Young Men's Christian Association, whose enterprise will afford the opportunity of hearing the great orchestra in New Bedford at fair prices. We don't see why this is not a Christian work, and exactly in the line of what the association ought to do for New Bedford.

Union, Springfield Mass.

Date 9/17

The Boston symphony concerts are to this fall more than ever the fashionable musical craze. There is to be a very lively competition for seats at the sale next week, although the price has been raised. No other city in the country supports such a series of concerts or is blessed with a better orchestra.

Clipping from Standard New Bedford Mass

Date 9/

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The sale of tickets to the Symphony Concerts has reached 958, leaving but 42 to get to make the concerts certainty. These will no doubt be secured very soon. A meeting of the committee to complete arrangements will be held Thursday even-

Clipping from Bee Lynn Mass

Date 9/16

The sale of Symphony rehearsal or Friday afternoon tickets, at auction, occurred Monday in Boston. The prices realized higher than ever before. The highest premium paid per seat was $150.

GAZETTE, Worcester Mass.

Date 9/17

At the auction of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals in Music Hall, Boston, yesterday, Hon. Edward L. Pierce bought four seats at a premium of $9

Clipping from Bee Lynn Mass

Date 9/17

About $10,000 was realized in premiums Tuesday on the sale of the $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 23, 1890.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Bostonians' Triumph in "Robin Hood."

"A Night Off," "Faust up to Date," "The Soudan," "City Directory," "The Two Orphans," "Castles in the Air," "The English Rose" and "Shamus O'Brien."

THE BOSTONIANS—"ROBIN HOOD."

The Bostonians were welcomed to their new operatic home in Music Hall last evening by an audience well calculated to remove any possible doubts as to the success of the new departure made by the company, or the value of the new opera of "Robin Hood."

The taking of this favorite auditorium for operatic uses was certainly a bold action on the part of Messrs. Karl, Macdonald and Barnabee, but if the opinions of their patrons of last evening rightly represent those of the musical public at large, the ventures of these artist managers will prove profitable alike to their own financial resources and to the standard entertainments of the city.

It is not likely that the three gentlemen who have thus added to the musical attractions of the city in a line that has been sadly neglected feel entirely satisfied with last night's fitting of the hall for its new uses; but they have to be congratulated upon the large measure of success that has attended the artists employed in preparing the stage settings, and with some slight additions the hall will prove a most acceptable home for presenting a repertoire of what is best in foreign cities as the opera comique

The familiar lines of the hall have been but little changed by the work done in preparation for the use of the Bostonians, as, if the ceiling has been lowered somewhat, the height of the auditorium has much of the appearance of a solidly constructed prosperity with a stage opening 34 feet in width, 27 feet in height, or similar in size to the openings of the Museum, Globe and Howard Athenæum theatres. This wall, which is of canvas screen, is decorated in a harmonious and appropriate design, the prevailing colors have been chosen with a view to harmonizing

The story of "Robin Hood" and that of the "Forty Thieves" were more familiar oftentimes than far more important matters, but it is possible that the generation of today does not concern itself with such frivolous subjects as the life of an outlaw whose existence is now denied, and of whom tradition only speaks. It may be well, therefore, to say that the plot concerns the efforts made by Robin Hood to claim, early in the 13th century, the title and estates of the earldom of Huntington, a claim to which, according to tradition, he had no small pretensions. The sheriff, who is custodian of the estates, endeavors to substitute as the earl a young country lout named Guy of Gisborne. Robin Hood makes the life of the sheriff miserable by rallying a hundred men about him in Sherwood Forest, from which retreat they make expeditions for booty throughout the country, robbing the rich and helping the poor, defrauding some and defending others. Of course, Robin Hood comes to his own, and his "merrie men" become good citizens in the finale of the opera, to finish up the story pleasantly.

Mr. Smith has certainly shown much skill in treating this romantic story, and he has used the characters of the Sheriff and Friar Tuck with admirable tact to enhance the humorous situation of his work. His lines are bright, and he has the knack of writing singable words in his lyrics. He has planned some mirth provoking situations, and the hand of a clever stage manager is shown in the business incidental to the leading scenes.

The music has been claimed to be the best yet written by an American musician for the comic opera stage, and last evening's hearing of the work amply justified the claim. Mr. De Koven proved himself a scholarly musician in his "Don Quixote," but in his "Robin Hood" he has shown himself to be possessed of a fertility of musical thought, a fund of tuneful themes and an originality in their treatment that stamps him as a peer of the world's composers in this line. "Robin Hood" overflows with good things musical, and though the limits of the usual hours of such performances were exceeded last evening it would be hard to say what should be sacrificed to reduce the performing time.

Mr. De Koven has produced an opera of the first merit, and has fitted the Bostonians to a nicety in all the work he has done. To recall the numbers which proved enjoyable even at this first hearing would be to give a catalogue of the several numbers of the work, and the fact that a round dozen of repetitions were imperatively demanded best stamps the value of the composer's labors. It is all good music, and the forms are so admirably varied that each number finds a happy contrast, and thus the interest is maintained continuously. The vocal and instrumental parts alike show the hand of a master, and, while the composer has made use of the variety end of the orchestra at times, he has done even this part of his work with skill and taste.

It is a credit to any company to place such an opera in its repertoire, but it is also a credit to any composer to have his opera produced by such a company. The Bostonians, as organized for this season, need not fear criticism in "Robin Hood," and the composer need have no fears of adverse criticism while the opera is given as it was last evening; for it was a source of enjoyment from overture to finale, and the big audience in attendance left no opportunity for doubt upon this question.

The title role is a very grateful one for a tenor, and Mr. Hoff has never been heard to better advantage than last evening. He has a particularly pretty serenade in the second act, which he sang with admirable effect, and necessarily repeated it. In the role of the Sheriff Mr. Barnabee is fitted to a nicety, and his entrance in his robes of office gained him a true Boston welcome, a hearty, spontaneous greeting to the scene of so many of his former triumphs that spoke volumes for the friendly feeling toward this artist in Boston. The role would fall far short of its full value in the hands of a comedian merely; it demands a most capable singer, and these demands were fully met by Mr. Barnabee. The sheriff's song of the first act is a gem in its way, and its singing was quickly redemanded, while his ditty in the disguise of a tinker, in the second act, with its ear-tickling refrain, made one of the notable successes of the evening.

Mr. Macdonald's figure suits the role of Little John capitally, and he made a most admirable success in his impersonation of the fellow-outlaw of Robin Hood, particularly in his scenes in the disguise of the mendicant friar. His song in praise of "Brown October Ale," a delightful piece of vocal writing, was sung as this artist has seldom sung before. It is exactly suited to him, and he gained a well deserved recall for his spirited and artistic interpretation of the number.

Mr. Cowles as Will Scarlet finds his best opportunity in the smith's song of the last act, which well deserved the hearty recognition of its merits shown by the audience. Mr. Frothingham is a veritable Friar Tuck who has stepped out of the story book to help out the company in this production. A better artist for the role could not be had, and the unctuous humor of the part was delightfully given by Mr. Frothingham. Mr. Peter Lang's defiance of all the rules of the Delsartian system of pose and gestures, as the country lout, Sir Guy, was deliciously funny, and he added a capital voice in many of the concerted numbers.

To come to the ladies, it may be said that it was a well contested effort for leading honors between Marie Stone as Maid Marion and Jessie Bartlett Davis as Allan-a-Dale. Both dazzled the audience by the brilliant vocal work they gave to the performance, and both made charming figures in the beautiful stage pictures of the production. Marie Stone never sung better than last evening, and the faultless method, the absolute trueness of her voice and her own exquisite taste as a singer were never more prominently shown. Her duet with Robin Hood in the first act created a sensation, and her beautiful Ida in the second act was a triumph of vocalization seldom surpassed by even this great artist. Jessie Bartlett Davis was a very manly Allan-a-Dale, and her lively song in the last act gained her a double encore. Grace Reals, the Annabel of the cast, showed no traces of being a debutante; and the company has gained an artist of high promise in her engagement. She has a singularly pleasing stage presence, is graceful and natural in all her movements, and uses a voice of lovely quality, with fine skill and effect. The minor role of Dame Durden was most acceptably filled by Josephine Bartlett. It is not alone as solo singers that talent is demanded in Robin Hood, for Mr. De Koven has written some concerted numbers that would go for little save in the hands of the best ensemble singers. An old English round in burlesque form for male voices and a madrigal are some of the best bits in this class of work done by the composer, and both these were [illegible] song. There were half a dozen other [illegible] good successes, of which it is [illegible] this morning. There [illegible] book of voices

The opera will be continued through the week, with evening performances and a matinee on Saturday. In accordance with the custom of this organization, where an opera is announced for a number of consecutive performances, the leading soprano, contralto and tenor roles will be shared by the different artists, and the arrangements for the week provide that Juliette Cordon shall sing "Maid Marion" tonight and Thursday and Saturday evenings. Flora Finlayson sings "Allan-a-Dale" on Thursday evening and at the Saturday matinee, and Ferdinand Schutz sings "Robin Hood" on Wednesday and Saturday evenings.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1890

MUSIC.

"ROBIN HOOD" IN MUSIC HALL.

The Bostonians began their season of '90-91 in Music Hall auspiciously last evening with a first performance here of "Robin Hood," a comic opera written and composed especially for them by Messrs. Harry B. Smith and Reginald DeKoven. There was a large audience present, and the stamp of approval was marked deep by the many encores and recalls. Less than a year ago, it will be remembered, the same company gave successfully another joint work by these gentlemen—"Don Quixote." This was hampered by a book not well adapted to the stage, but in "Robin Hood" Mr. Smith has acquitted himself much better, Mr. DeKoven showed then that he could make tuneful music, but he has improved over his former effort. Music Hall has never before had so good adjuncts in the matter of proscenium and stage settings for opera, while the company showed unusual care in training, both under Mr. S. L. Studley and the stage manager, Fred Dixon. Everything lent to the success of the following cast of characters:

Robin Hood	Edwin W. Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. MacDonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George B. Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Annabel	Grace Reals
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

The plot and text are much better than either of Mr. Smith's former efforts—"The Begum" and "Don Quixote." The story lends itself more readily for stage purposes than the latter, while experience has done something. The words of the lyrics are pleasing as well as singable, and though neither the jests, dialogue nor situations are strikingly novel, there is something of a dash and go that help to carry the burden of the composer more easily.

Mr. Reginald DeKoven has made an advance on his previous labors, too, and has shown more restraint in overcrowding his ideas. His orchestration is always pleasing and wonderfully well done for the smaller orchestra of comic opera. His melodies are bright and catchy, though at times a trifle reminiscent, and he has cleverly followed some of the old English forms. The Milkmaid's Chorus and Robin Hood's solo, "So gayly the days pass by," the Sheriff's entrance song, the duet of Maid Marion and Robin Hood of the first act were all encored, while the quartette, "All is fair in love and war," is a dainty gem that deserved to be. Will Scarlet's solo, the Tinker's Chorus with accompaniment on pans and bells, the sextette, "See the merry lambkins play," and Maid Marion's song, were redemanded in the second act, as well as the lovely quartette and the spirited finale with its sensuous waltz theme. The third act has an armorer's song with the anvil that Will Scarlet was obliged to repeat, while Allan-a-Dale's solo, with chorus, "In olden times St. Swithin's chimes," proved the most popular number of the last act and was twice recalled. Mr. DeKoven has a slight tendency to recur to the waltz time, but it is only what many others have done before him. Much of his music is so much better than is usual—in fact, almost above the comic opera standard—that it is hardly fair to cavil.

To the performers high praise may be given and the ensemble, both in acting and singing. The single week that the opera was given in Chicago last season seemed to have removed any of the difficulties. Mr. Hoff was manly and strong as the gallant outlaw, ably seconded by Messrs. Cowles and MacDonald as Will Scarlet and Little John, the latter lending much spirit to the "Song of Brown October Ale." Mr. Barnabee's High Sheriff was very funny, as well as the Friar Tuck of Mr. Frothingham. Of the ladies, Miss Reals is the only new comer, and she sings prettily, with a sweet voice not over strong. Miss Stone renewed her former pleasing impressions. The Allan-a-Dale of Miss Davis was a picture fair to look upon, and was both sung and acted with much verve.

The opera will be continued through the week, but with several changes in the cast, Miss Corden replacing Miss Stone on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, while the new tenor, Mr. Ferdinand Schulz, does Robin Hood Wednesday, Friday and Saturday. Miss Flora Finlayson will be heard as Allan-a-Dale Thursday and at the matinee. It is safe to predict a very successful season here that should not require any further call on the repertory than "Robin Hood."

Clipping from Union Springfield Mass

Date 9/23

The assured receipts for the Boston symphony concerts and rehearsals, the coming season, amount to nearly $108,000. The ticket sale last week was without precedent in the history of similar concert enterprises, and there is very little grumbling over the grabbing of tickets by rich people and speculators. There is no mistake about it—both in the tastes of the people and in the development of numbers, Boston is the musical center of the

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1890.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood."

There has been much interest in the opening performance of the Bostonians this year, partly because of their appearance in a new opera and partly because of the venture in occupying Music Hall for the operatic performance instead of one of the theatres, as has formerly been the case. The use of Music Hall made an additional attraction for the city, and there were several very strong attractions at the theatres—notably at the theatre at which the Bostonians have usually appeared. Nevertheless there was a good audience present, as would naturally be the case from the favor which has always been extended this company—always a favorite here.

The stage of Music Hall was very attractive. The proscenium looks better in the evening than it appeared by daylight, and the scenery was well put on, the entire front of the hall looking as if it had always been arranged for theatrical or operatic performances. The seats in the hall being on a level prevented a good view from the rear of the hall, after footlights had been put in the front of the stage, and it was not always easy to hear all that was said or sung. Whether or not Music Hall is a success as a place of operatic venture can perhaps be better determined later in the week.

The opera itself was certainly a success. It is too long and will stand considerable judicious pruning. The waits were somewhat long, but not more so than is usual on first nights. Yet it was considerably after 11 o'clock before the final drop of the curtain. The plot of the opera is founded on the old story of "Robin Hood," but concerns principally the efforts of Robin Hood to claim the titles and estates of the Earl of Huntington, which are disputed by the Sheriff, who was the custodian of the estate. In order to enrich himself he attempts to substitute the Guy of Gisborne, who is to marry the Maid Marion. She, however, is in love with Robin Hood, who proves in the end to be the real Earl.

There can be little but praise accorded to Mr. De Koven for the music. The concerted numbers, both quartette and chorus, are real musical gems. The finales to the second and third act are grand. Some of them remind one of Arthur Sullivan's music, but it is all bright, sparkling and melodious. The harmony in the concerted numbers is very beautiful, particularly the chorus of journeymen tinkers, the bell song with chorus, the market scene at the opening and the chorus of milkmaids. The orchestration is well adapted, and as a whole there is much pleasure in listening to the work. There is no burlesque, no topical song, but all is legitimate opera, appealing to musical taste and feeling, and as such, very creditable to the composer.

The cast of the opera was as follows:

Robin Hood	Edwin W. Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. MacDonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George B. Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Annabel	Grace Reals
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

In the part of Sheriff, Barnabee has a role particularly well adapted to him, and it was especially pleasing to note how well preserved is his voice after all the singing he has done in these last few years. It is apparently as strong and rich as it was when he delighted everybody on the concert stage with his humorous songs, and that same distinct articulation was apparent that always characterized Barnabee's impersonations. In this respect many other members of the company could well take pattern from him. There are many amusing situations, which he makes the best of, and the libretto is very funny. His song in the first act is a good one, and with the milkmaids he has a very effective number. Mr. Hoff was in good voice and made the part of Robin Hood one of the best of the evening. He was encored after his entrance song, and his duet with Miss Stone was well sung, and this is true to a large extent of all his numbers. Mr. Frothingham was very witty as the Friar, and after luring recreant Robin from prison by an exchange of garments, and being threatened with instant execution on being discovered by the Sheriff, his imitation of Cardinal Richelieu in threatening the excommunication of all who came within the sacred circle was very amusing and provoked peals of laughter. Messrs. MacDonald and Cowles were in excellent voice, and MacDonald's song of the "Brown October Ale," and the song of Cowles with anvil accompaniment, were both very effective.

Miss Stone was in excellent voice, and the opera did not make extravagant demands upon her. She displayed some excellent costumes, was equally good in songs or ensemble, and received several bouquets. In fact, there were flowers galore all the evening, and the members of the company who did not receive them were the exception. Jessie Bartlett Davis was charming, as usual. She is always an artist; her bell song was one of the best things in the opera, and her rendition of it the most artistic thing of the evening. Miss Grace Reals made her first appearance as Annabel. There was not much for her to do. She has a pleasing stage presence and, with experience and a better opportunity to display her ability than was afforded in this opera, will make a desirable accession to the company. There will be some changes in the cast during the week. Schutz, the new tenor, appears in place of Hoff Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings. Juliette Cordon appears this evening, Thursday and Saturday evenings in place of Miss Stone, and Flora Finlayson Thursday evening and Saturday matinee instead of Jessie Bartlett Davis.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1890.

—BOSTON, September 15, 1890.—The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals was not so well attended as last year, but prices were higher. Two seats sold at $115 premium for each, and Mr. Charles H. Thayer bid off two seats at $125 each, making $137 for a seat, which is the highest price ever paid at the auction sales. Later in the day $150 premium was paid for each of four end seats in the tenth row.

Clipping from Standard New Bedford Mass

Date 9/23

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—A series of concerts by the justly celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an assured thing in this city, and two concerts will be given as previously announced. Something over 735 tickets have been subscribed for, and those who have not already done so, but intend to, would do well to consult the advertisement in another column, and subscribe at once.

[11]

[11]

Clipping from Courier, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/17

The symphony concerts will be the fashionable musical craze in Boston this season. Although the price of seats has been raised, the demand is greater than ever. New Bedford music lovers have reason for gratitude to the Young Men's Christian Association, whose enterprise will afford the opportunity of hearing the great orchestra in New Bedford at fair prices. We don't see why this is not a Christian work, and exactly in the line of what the association ought to do for New Bedford.

Clipping from Union, Springfield Mass.

Date 9/17

The Boston symphony concerts are this fall more than ever the fashionable musical craze. There is to be a very lively competition for seats at the sale next week, although the price has been raised. No other city in the country supports such a series of concerts or is blessed with a better orchestra.

Clipping from Standard New Bedford Mass

Date 9/

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The sale of tickets to the Symphony Concerts has reached 858, leaving but 42 to get to make the concerts a certainty. These will no doubt be secured very soon. A meeting of the committee to complete arrangements will be held Thursday evening.

Clipping from Bee Lynn Mass

Date 9/16

The sale of Symphony rehearsal or Friday afternoon tickets, at auction, occurred Monday in Boston. The prices averaged higher than ever before. The highest premium paid per seat was $150.

Clipping from GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 9/17

At the auction of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals in Music Hall, Boston, yesterday, Hon. Edward L. Davis bought four seats at a premium of $9

Clipping from Bee Lynn Mass

Date 9/17

About $10,000 was realized in premiums Tuesday on the sale of the $7.50 seats for Boston Symphony concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 23, 1890.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Bostonians' Triumph in "Robin Hood."

"A Night Off," "Faust up to Date," "The Soudan," "City Directory," "The Two Orphans," "Castles in the Air," "The English Rose" and "Shamus O'Brien."

THE BOSTONIANS—"ROBIN HOOD."

The Bostonians were welcomed to their new operatic home in Music Hall last evening by an audience well calculated to remove any possible doubts as to the success of the new departure made by the company, or the value of the new opera of "Robin Hood."

The taking of this favorite auditorium for operatic uses was certainly a bold action on the part of Messrs. Karl, Macdonald and Barnabee, but if the opinions of their patrons of last evening rightly represent those of the musical public at large, the venture of these artist managers will prove profitable alike to their own financial resources and to the standard entertainments of the city.

It is not likely that the three gentlemen who have thus added to the musical attractions of the city in a line that has been sadly neglected feel entirely satisfied with last evening's fitting of the hall for its new uses; but they are to be congratulated upon the very large measure of success that has attended the artists employed in preparing the new stage settings, and with some slight additions the hall will prove a most acceptable place for presenting a repertoire of what is known in foreign cities as the opera comique school.

The familiar lines of the hall have been greatly changed by the work done in preparing it for the use of the Bostonians, as, if the eye does not wander too far skyward, the stage end of the auditorium has much of the appearance of a solidly constructed proscenium wall, with a stage opening 34 feet in width by 28 feet in height, or similar in size to the stage openings of the Museum, Globe and Hollis Street theatres. This wall, which is but a vast canvas screen, is decorated in a well worked out and appropriate design, in which the prevailing colors have been [illegible] with a view to harmonizing with the general scheme of color of the auditorium. The proscenium boxes have been removed, and the space occupied by them filled in with a solid wall, which adds greatly to the appearance of the stage. The auditorium is well lighted by an increased number of incandescent electric lamps, and is stocked with scenery suited to the opera of last evening; the mechanical appliances appearing to be calculated to meet all the demands of such performances.

The attraction of the opening night, the comic opera "Robin Hood," written and composed for the company by Harry B. Smith and Reginald DeKoven, proved to be altogether worthy the high praise given it by those who heard its original production in Chicago last June, and the great reception it got last evening settled its popularity with Boston audiences. The cast given the opera last evening was as follows: High sheriff of Nottingham, H. C. Barnabee; Robin Hood, Edwin Hoff; Little John, W. H. Macdonald; Will Scarlet, Eugene Cowles; Friar Tuck, George Frothingham; Sir Guy of Gisborne, Peter Lang; Allan-a-Dale, Jessie Bartlett Davis; Annabel, Grace Reals; Dame Durden, Josephine Davis; Maid Marion, Marie Stone.

To the boys and girls of a half-century ago the story of "Robin Hood" and that of the "Forty Thieves" were more familiar oftentimes than far more important matters, but it is possible that the generation of today does not concern itself with such frivolous subjects as the life of an outlaw whose existence is now denied, and of whom tradition only speaks. It may be well, therefore, to say that the plot concerns the efforts made by Robin Hood to claim, early in the 13th century, the title and estates of the earldom of Huntington, a claim to which, according to tradition, he had no small pretensions. The sheriff, who is custodian of the estates, endeavors to substitute as the earl a young country lout named Guy of Gisborne. Robin Hood makes the life of the sheriff miserable by rallying a hundred men about him in Sherwood Forest, from which retreat they make expeditions for booty throughout the country, robbing the rich and helping the poor, defrauding some and defending others. Of course, Robin Hood comes to his own, and his "merrie men" become good citizens in the finale of the opera, to finish up the story pleasantly.

Mr. Smith has certainly shown much skill in treating this romantic story, and he has used the characters of the Sheriff and Friar Tuck with admirable tact to enhance the humorous situation of his work. His lines are bright, and he has the knack of writing singable words in his lyrics. He has planned some mirth provoking situations, and the hand of a clever stage manager is shown in the business incidental to the leading scenes.

The music has been claimed to be the best yet written by an American musician for the comic opera stage, and last evening's hearing of the work amply justified the claim. Mr. De Koven proved himself a scholarly musician in his "Don Quixote," but in his "Robin Hood" he has shown himself to be possessed of a fertility of musical thought, a fund of tuneful themes and an originality in their treatment that stamps him as a peer of the world's composers in this line. "Robin Hood" overflows with good things musical, and though the limits of the usual hours of such performances were exceeded last evening it would be hard to say what should be sacrificed to reduce the performing time.

Mr. De Koven has produced an opera of the first merit, and has fitted the Bostonians to a nicety in all the work he has done. To recall the numbers which proved enjoyable even at this first hearing would be to give a catalogue of the several numbers of the work, and the fact that a round dozen of repetitions were imperatively demanded best stamps the value of the composer's labors. It is all good music, and the forms are so admirably varied that each number finds a happy contrast, and thus the interest is maintained continuously. The vocal and instrumental parts alike show the hand of a master, and, while the composer has made use of the variety end of the orchestra at times, he has done even this part of his work with skill and taste.

It is a credit to any company to place such an opera in its repertoire, but it is also a credit to any composer to have his opera produced by such a company. The Bostonians, as organized for this season, need not fear criticism in "Robin Hood," and the composer need have no fears of adverse criticism while the opera is given as it was last evening; for it was a source of enjoyment from overture to finale, and the big audience in attendance left no opportunity for doubt upon this question.

The title role is a very grateful one for a tenor, and Mr. Hoff has never been heard to better advantage than last evening. He has a particularly pretty serenade in the second act, which he sang with admirable effect, and necessarily repeated it. In the role of the Sheriff Mr. Barnabee is fitted to a nicety, and his entrance in his robes of office gained him a true Boston welcome, a hearty, spontaneous greeting to the scene of so many of his former triumphs that spoke volumes for the friendly feeling toward this artist in Boston. The role would fall far short of its full value in the hands of a comedian merely; it demands a most capable singer, and these demands were fully met by Mr. Barnabee. The sheriff's song of the first act is a gem in its way, and its singing was quickly redemanded, while his ditty in the disguise of a tinker, in the second act, with its ear-tickling refrain, made one of the notable successes of the evening.

Mr. Macdonald's figure suits the role of Little John capitally, and he made a most admirable success in his impersonation of the fellow-outlaw of Robin Hood, particularly in his scenes in the disguise of the mendicant friar. His song in praise of "Brown October Ale," a delightful piece of vocal writing, was sung as this artist has seldom sung before. It is exactly suited to him, and he gained a well deserved recall for his spirited and artistic interpretation of the number.

Mr. Cowles as Will Scarlet finds his best opportunity in the smith's song of the last act, which well deserved the hearty recognition of its merits shown by the audience. Mr. Frothingham is a veritable Friar Tuck who has stepped out of the story book to help out the company in this production. A better artist for the role could not be had, and the unctuous humor of the part was delightfully given by Mr. Frothingham. Mr. Peter Lang's defiance of all the rules of the Delsartian system of pose and gestures, as the country lout, Sir Guy, was deliciously funny, and he added a capital voice in many of the concerted numbers.

To come to the ladies, it may be said that it was a well contested effort for leading honors between Marie Stone as Maid Marion and Jessie Bartlett Davis as Allan-a-Dale. Both dazzled the audience by the brilliant vocal work they gave to the performance, and both made charming figures in the beautiful stage pictures of the production. Marie Stone never sung better than last evening, and the faultless method, the absolute trueness of her voice and her own exquisite taste as a singer were never more prominently shown. Her duet with Robin Hood in the first act created a sensation, and her beautiful Ida in the second act was a triumph of vocalization seldom surpassed by even this great artist. Jessie Bartlett Davis was a very manly Allan-a-Dale, and her lively song in the last act gained her a double encore. Grace Reals, the Annabel of the cast, showed no traces of being a debutante; and the company has gained an artist of high promise in her engagement. She has a singularly pleasing stage presence, is graceful and natural in all her movements, and uses a voice of lovely quality, with fine skill and effect. The minor role of Dame Durden was most acceptably filled by Josephine Bartlett. It is not alone as solo singers that talent is demanded in Robin Hood, for Mr. De Koven has written some concerted numbers that would go for little save in the hands of the best ensemble singers. An old English round in burlesque form for male voices and a madrigal are some of the best bits in this class of work done by the composer, and both these were splendidly sung. There were half a dozen other equally good successes, of which it is impossible to speak this morning. There has not been so good a body of voices in an English opera chorus for many seasons as that got together for last night's production and their contribution to the success of the evening was fully appreciated. Mr. [illegible] has given his careful, intelligent and conscientious labors with the company as its musical director.

All in all "Robin Hood," as given by the Bostonians, is opera by an American which should be heard by all Americans who are willing to recognize merit whenever and wherever they find it. The story is good, bright and clean, the music is such that it can be listened to again and again with growing respect and admiration for the composer, and the whole opera is put upon the stage with a degree of skill, taste and judgment highly creditable to Stage Manager Fred Dixon.

"Robin Hood" is announced as the bill of the present week, with evening performances and a matinee on Saturday. In accordance with the custom of this organization, where an opera is announced for a number of consecutive performances, the leading soprano, contralto and tenor roles will be shared by the different artists, and the arrangements for the week provide that Juliette Cordon shall sing "Maid Marion" tonight and Thursday and Saturday evenings. Flora Finlayson sings "Allan-a-Dale" on Thursday evening and at the Saturday matinee, and Ferdinand Schutz sings "Robin Hood" on Wednesday and Saturday evenings.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1890

MUSIC.

"ROBIN HOOD" IN MUSIC HALL.

The Bostonians began their season of '90-91 in Music Hall auspiciously last evening with a first performance here of "Robin Hood," a comic opera written and composed especially for them by Messrs. Harry B. Smith and Reginald DeKoven. There was a large audience present, and the stamp of approval was marked deep by the many encores and recalls. Less than a year ago, it will be remembered, the same company gave successfully another joint work by these gentlemen—"Don Quixote." This was hampered by a book not well adapted to the stage, but in "Robin Hood" Mr. Smith has acquitted himself much better. Mr. DeKoven showed then that he could make tuneful music, but he has improved over his former effort. Music Hall has never before had so good adjuncts in the matter of proscenium and stage settings for opera, while the company showed unusual care in training, both under Mr. S. L. Studley and the stage manager, Fred Dixon. Everything lent to the success of the following cast of characters:

Robin Hood	Edwin W. Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. MacDonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George B. Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Annabel	Grace Reals
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

The plot and text are much better than either of Mr. Smith's former efforts—"The Begum" and "Don Quixote." The story lends itself more readily for stage purposes than the latter, while experience has done something. The words of the lyrics are pleasing as well as singable, and though neither the jests, dialogue nor situations are strikingly novel, there is something of a dash and go that help to carry the burden of the composer more easily.

Mr. Reginald DeKoven has made an advance on his previous labors, too, and has shown more restraint in overcrowding his ideas. His orchestration is always pleasing and wonderfully well done for the smaller orchestra of comic opera. His melodies are bright and catchy, though at times a trifle reminiscent, and he has cleverly followed some of the old English forms. The Milkmaid's Chorus and Robin Hood's solo, "So gayly the days pass by," the Sheriff's entrance song, the duet of Maid Marion and Robin Hood of the first act were all encored, while the quartette, "All is fair in love and war," is a dainty gem that deserved to be. Will Scarlet's solo, the Tinker's Chorus with accompaniment on pans and bells, the sextette, "See the merry lambkins play," and Maid Marion's song, were redemanded in the second act, as well as the lovely quartette and the spirited finale with its sensuous waltz theme. The third act has an armorer's song with the anvil that Will Scarlet was obliged to repeat, while Allan-a-Dale's solo, with chorus, "In olden times St. Swithin's chimes," proved the most popular number of the last act and was twice recalled. Mr. DeKoven has a slight tendency to recur to the waltz time, but it is only what many others have done before him. Much of his music is so much better than is usual—in fact, almost above the comic opera standard—that it is hardly fair to cavil.

To the performers high praise may be given and the ensemble, both in acting and singing. The single week that the opera was given in Chicago last season seemed to have removed any of the difficulties. Mr. Hoff was manly and strong as the gallant outlaw, ably seconded by Messrs. Cowles and MacDonald as Will Scarlet and Little John, the latter lending much spirit to the "Song of Brown October Ale." Mr. Barnabee's High Sheriff was very funny, as well as the Friar Tuck of Mr. Frothingham. Of the ladies, Miss Reals is the only new comer, and she sings prettily, with a sweet voice not over strong. Miss Stone renewed her former pleasing impressions. The Allan-a-Dale of Miss Davis was a picture fair to look upon, and was both sung and acted with much verve.

The opera will be continued through the week, but with several changes in the cast, Miss Corden replacing Miss Stone on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, while the new tener, Mr. Ferdinand Schulz, does Robin Hood Wednesday, Friday and Saturday. Miss Flora Finlayson will be heard as Allan-a-Dale Thursday and at the matinee. It is safe to predict a very successful season here that should not require any further call on the repertory than "Robin Hood."

Clipping from Union Springfield Mass

Date 9/23

The assured receipts for the Boston symphony concerts and rehearsals, the coming season, amount to nearly $108,000. The ticket sale last week was without precedent in the history of similar concert enterprises, and there is very little grumbling over the grabbing of tickets by rich people and speculators. There is no mistake about it—both in the tastes of the people and in the development of musicians, Boston is the musical center of the country.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1890.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood."

There has been much interest in the opening performance of the Bostonians this year, partly because of their appearance in a new opera and partly because of the venture in occupying Music Hall for the operatic performance instead of one of the theatres, as has formerly been the case. The use of Music Hall made an additional attraction for the city, and there were several very strong attractions at the theatres—notably at the theatre at which the Bostonians have usually appeared. Nevertheless there was a good audience present, as would naturally be the case from the favor which has always been extended this company—always a favorite here.

The stage of Music Hall was very attractive. The proscenium looks better in the evening than it appeared by daylight, and the scenery was well put on, the entire front of the hall looking as if it had always been arranged for theatrical or operatic performances. The seats in the hall being on a level prevented a good view from the rear of the hall, after footlights had been put in the front of the stage, and it was not always easy to hear all that was said or sung. Whether or not Music Hall is a success as a place of operatic venture can perhaps be better determined later in the week.

The opera itself was certainly a success. It is too long and will stand considerable judicious pruning. The waits were somewhat long, but not more so than is usual on first nights. Yet it was considerably after 11 o'clock before the final drop of the curtain. The plot of the opera is founded on the old story of "Robin Hood," but concerns principally the efforts of Robin Hood to claim the titles and estates of the Earl of Huntington, which are disputed by the Sheriff, who was the custodian of the estate. In order to enrich himself he attempts to substitute the Guy of Gisborne, who is to marry the Maid Marion. She, however, is in love with Robin Hood, who proves in the end to be the real Earl.

There can be little but praise accorded to Mr. De Koven for the music. The concerted numbers, both quartette and chorus, are real musical gems. The finales to the second and third act are grand. Some of them remind one of Arthur Sullivan's music, but it is all bright, sparkling and melodious. The harmony in the concerted numbers is very beautiful, particularly the chorus of journeymen tinkers, the bell song with chorus, the market scene at the opening and the chorus of milkmaids. The orchestration is well adapted, and as a whole there is much pleasure in listening to the work. There is no burlesque, no topical song, but all is legitimate opera, appealing to musical taste and feeling, and as such, very creditable to the composer.

The cast of the opera was as follows:

Robin Hood	Edwin W. Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. MacDonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George B. Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Annabel	Grace Reals
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

In the part of Sheriff, Barnabee has a role particularly well adapted to him, and it was especially pleasing to note how well preserved is his voice after all the singing he has done in these last few years. It is apparently as strong and rich as it was when he delighted everybody on the concert stage with his humorous songs, and that same distinct articulation was apparent that always characterized Barnabee's impersonations. In this respect many other members of the company could well take pattern from him. There are many amusing situations, which he makes the best of, and the libretto is very funny. His song in the first act is a good one, and with the milkmaids he has a very effective number. Mr. Hoff was in good voice and made the part of Robin Hood one of the best of the evening. He was encored after his entrance song, and his duet with Miss Stone was well sung, and this is true to a large extent of all his numbers. Mr. Frothingham was very witty as the Friar, and after luring recreant Robin from prison by an exchange of garments, and being threatened with instant execution on being discovered by the Sheriff, his imitation of Cardinal Richelieu in threatening the excommunication of all who came within the sacred circle was very amusing and provoked peals of laughter. Messrs. MacDonald and Cowles were in excellent voice, and MacDonald's song of the "Brown October Ale," and the song of Cowles with anvil accompaniment, were both very effective.

Miss Stone was in excellent voice, and the opera did not make extravagant demands upon her. She displayed some excellent costumes, was equally good in songs or ensemble, and received several bouquets. In fact, there were flowers galore all the evening, and the members of the company who did not receive them were the exception. Jessie Bartlett Davis was charming, as usual. She is always an artist; her bell song was one of the best things in the opera, and her rendition of it the most artistic thing of the evening. Miss Grace Reals made her first appearance as Annabel. There was not much for her to do. She has a pleasing stage presence and, with experience and a better opportunity to display her ability than was afforded in this opera, will make a desirable accession to the company. There will be some changes in the cast during the week. Schutz, the new tenor, appears in place of Hoff Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings. Juliette Cordon appears this evening, Thursday and Saturday evenings in place of Miss Stone, and Flora Finlayson Thursday evening and Saturday matinee instead of Jessie Bartlett Davis.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1890.

——BOSTON, September 15, 1890.—The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals was not so well attended as last year, but prices were higher. Two seats sold at $115 premium for each, and Mr. Charles H. Thayer bid off two seats at $125 each, making $137 for a seat, which is the highest price ever paid at the auction sales. Later in the day $150 premium was paid for each of four end seats in the tenth row.

Clipping from Standard New Bedford Mass

Date 9/23

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—A series of concerts by the justly celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an assured thing in this city, and two concerts will be given as previously announced. Something over 735 tickets have been subscribed for, and those who have not already done so but intend to, would do well to consult the advertisement in another column, and subscribe at once.

[12]

Boston Daily Globe.

"ROBIN HOOD" IN OPERA.

Opera in Music Hall is not an absolute novelty. Parepa Rosa and Patti, at the head of lyric companies, have warbled to delighted multitudes within its walls. But not until the present time has there been any adequate endeavor to gain there the stage effects and accessories that add so much to the significance of a theatre's offering. It has been reserved for the Bostonians to make, so far as footlight space and appliances are concerned, a remarkably well equipped lyric temple.

A lofty proscenium, to all appearance solid and substantial, and by no means unattractive, sets apart the singers from the auditors. A handsome garnet curtain, drawn together from the sides as at the Tremont, is brought into requisition. The stage is almost as large as that of the Boston Museum, and there seems to be nothing to prevent as elaborate a scenic display as any opera in the Bostonians' repertory can need.

The English opera season of four weeks began yesterday evening with the first production in this city of a new lyric work, devised by two young Americans. It is called, "Robin Hood," and Mr. Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith, who devised "The Begum" and "Don Quixote," are its authors. It may certainly be said that the Bostonians made a most pronounced success in the new opera, and that the opera itself merits very high praise.

"Robin Hood" is a great lyric achievement. It is hardly too much to say that it is the best American opera that has yet found a hearing. "Don Quixote" was a very great advance on "The Begum," and "Robin Hood" is very decidedly superior to "Don Quixote" The story is more continuously interesting, the scene more varied, characteristic and appropriate. Not that the composer always seems original. There are hints of in the finales, and more than suggestions of other things here and there—in one chorus for instance, the first strain is absolutely identical with Bunthorne's ditty in "Patience," beginning "Now go to him and say to him."

German Waltz Rhythms

But for all this there is made glorious amends. From the chorus of May-day dancers, which gayly begins the scene, until the finale of the closing act, "Robin Hood" is rich in well contrasted melody. Old English madrigals and glees have evidently been carefully studied by Mr. De Koven, and he has gained in this delightful line of composition many a charming effect. The very spirit of the time is caught, also, in Little John's song in praise of "brown October ale"; there is a yeoman's chorus, with its "zoum-zoum" accompaniment in simulation of twanging bowstring that is uniquely effective; and another chorus, with "chime" accompaniment, in the closing act quite worthy to rank with it in excellence. A droll "round" in the second act also merits special mention and praise. Of course the principals all have their vocal opportunities, and these are very good. But for the most part the great, the characteristic excellence of "Robin Hood" is to be found in its concerted music.

Harry Smith has managed to utilize in a clever way incidents from the ballad and legend story of the adventures of the bold Robin Hood and his merry men. Perhaps Guy of Gisborne is a trifle inconsistent, but most of the personages are cleverly drawn and very well sustained.

The scene takes one to Sherwood forest and Nottingham. Robin Hood is here seen as no mere outlaw, but as the rightful claimant to the title of Earl of Huntingdon, and the estates thereto appertaining. A sly sheriff, who is custodian of the estates, endeavors to substitute as the earl a young country lad named Guy of Gisborne. The gallant yeomen trick the sheriff, but are tricked in their turn, through "love and jealousy." However, a mandate from his majesty home from the crusades, sets matters right, and the curtain falls on the "proper picture." The dialogue is generally bright and to the point, and Barnabee brings it very decidedly "up to date" by certain sayings designed to amuse a latter-day audience, and that certainly succeed in so doing. Once in a while a modern-looking costume is to be noted, very pretty, always; but for the most part the attire is entirely and decidedly picturesque are many of the groupings.

In Keeping with the Time,

Perhaps it was the presence of a large company of friends—perhaps it was the feeling of buoyancy and spirit incident upon a "first night" at home with a new opera which the singers believed to be assured of success. Whatever the cause, it is certain that the Bostonians never sang better nor acted with more life and "go." Mr. Hoff, as Robin Hood, was animated to a degree; Mr. Barnabee's drollery, as the Sheriff, was uncommonly mirth-provoking. Marie Stone was in excellent voice, and Maid Marian in her hands counted for its full value in the opera. The skill and vocal endowments of Jesse Bartlett Davis were effectively illustrated in her Allan-a-dale—a handsome yeoman indeed she made him. A very agreeable impression was made by one of the new "Bostonians," Miss Grace Reals, who took the part of Annabel. The lady comes from the capital of Ohio. She has made herself well liked in several of the larger cities of the West, and with her handsome face and figure, graceful manner and clear, rich voice, is certainly a notable acquisition to the forces of the company. Mr. McDonald, as Little John and Mr. Cowles, were excellent both. Mr. Frothingham proved a capital Friar Tuck; and Peter Lang's Guy of Gisborne was very well conceived and well costumed.

Chorus as well as principals seemed to be nerved to do "the best possible." There was not a hitch nor a halt in all their work, and some of it was decidedly difficult—the finale of the second act, for instance, with its oddly effective "break." Mr. Studley's orchestra was never heard to finer advantage.

Tonight "Robin Hood" again, and this time Miss Corden as Maid Marian. The new tenor, Ferdinand Schutz, is to sing the title role on Wednesday evening. The opera is to be sung all the week. Its reception last night was extremely cordial; rededemands were the order of the evening, and there was a double encore for the bell song after 11 o'clock. If these things do not imply continued great success for "Robin Hood" in Boston then indeed will all signs fail in the lyric world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1890.

THE NEW OPERA "ROBIN HOOD" AT MUSIC HALL.

Again the muse of opera has sought refuge in Music Hall, where so many Italian prime donne have dismembered "Trovatore," "Lucia," and other tonal masterworks, that could be compressed into one garden and one chamber scene in seasons gone by. One can sincerely compliment the Bostonians on being far more thorough in their accessaries than their fragment-giving predecessors. The new American opera was given with good setting, and of course regarding the quality of the vocal work of this company there is no longer any question.

The subject of "Robin Hood" although so old, is quite new to the modern operatic repertoire, and yields material enough for vivacity as well as for more serious treatment. It has taken so many shapes in literature, from chapters in Kingsley's "Hereward, the Wake" to the popular old ballads, that it might be given in almost as many phases of musical treatment as "Faust" has been. Mr. de Koven has given both a bright and an earnest side to his work, and has produced an opera not unworthy to succeed his previous two, and one which causes the reviewer to hope for a characteristically American work from his hand eventually. "The Courtship of Myles Standish," for example, would yield more humor than the subject of "Robin Hood" has done to the pen of the librettist, and would be more truly American. Mr. Harry B. Smith has not been so uniformly successful in this as in his previous works; a rightful and a wrongful heir, a sweetheart disguised in male attire, and a troubadour serenading the wrong lady and thereby causing jealousy to the wrong man, are not incidents which charm by any inherent novelty, and the only excuse for their introduction is that the public have become addicted to them by long use.

Nevertheless, the action was pleasing, if not original, and Mr. Smith's verses flowed as fluently as ever. The stage was at times a trifle overcrowded, and occasionally a performer would attach himself involuntarily to some of the scenic properties, but it was by all odds the finest setting of opera that Music Hall has yet held within its classic walls.

In the music Mr. de Koven has excelled himself. Solomon's ancient saying (probably occasioned by his long attendance on comic opera in Jerusalem), "There is no new thing under the sun," must always be borne in mind in speaking of the music of this school. The music of Audran is reminiscent, Strauss' works bear family resemblances to others, and Suppé has not opened a new musical mine recently, therefore we need not mind the fact that the finale of the third act of "Robin Hood" is cousin german to "Faust," that Frederic Clay's ghost hovered over some measures of the second act, or that Wagner himself appeared with his "Waldesweben" (in a thin solution) in the prelude to the second act; suffice it to say that it was all very delicate, graceful and charmingly put together, and the orchestration (which, of course, lost nothing at the hands of Mr. S. L. Studley) was throughout musicianly. In this last matter, however, one may complain of a slight excess in the matter of fanfares; Mr. de Koven seems to have altered a well-known whist rule into "When in doubt play trumpets," and these instruments are constantly giving or answering signals. Next in the affections of the composer is the glockenspiel (the bell-chime), but as this is sugary and attractive the public will not quarrel with it, and indeed the two chief successes of the evening were in choruses with bell attachment, the first of which, the "Tinker's Chorus," reminded of Suppe's "Cooper's Chorus" in "Boccaccio."

The composer has succeeded admirably in catching the old English style and the pastoral ease—"Oh see the lambkins play," thanks both to librettist and composer, was as witty a "catch" as has been written in America, and the quartette following the serenade, "A Troubadour Sang to His Love," may hold its own beside anything of the kind in the Sullivan light operas. It is such numbers as these that lead me to class Mr. de Koven as the best of the native composers of comic opera.

Naturally some of the enthusiasm which bubbled over all through the opera, was of a personal nature, and floral tributes fell like leaves on Vallombrosa. Mr. Barnabee-Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Cowles, Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Hoff, Mrs. Davis, Miss Bartlett, and Miss Stone, were all pressed to the Bostonians heart with fervor, and Mr. Lang and Miss Reals were not forgotten either. It would be prolix to speak of all of the attractive numbers they sang; a few examples may suffice, and Mr. Cowles "Armorers Song," Miss Stone's "Neath Greenwood Trees," and Mr. MacDonald's "Nut brown Ale," were all worthy compositions and splendidly sung. Mr. Barnabee unfortunately did not have any very telling numbers in his part, nor any great chance to be humorous either, unless singing with a halter around his neck he considered humorous. Altogether the opera is likely to be a success, but it will not be because of any mirth-provoking qualities which it possesses, but rather because it has plenty of very graceful music, all of it thorough enough to win the critic, and most of it tuneful enough to please even the auditor who desires to whistle his reminiscences on his homeward way.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Bostonians: "Robin Hood."

In the Music Hall, on Monday night, the Bostonians began a season of four weeks with the new operetta in three acts, written for them by Messrs. Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith, entitled "Robin Hood." Some remarks on the attempted transformation of the hall into a theatre are in order. Scene painters, gas and electric light fitters and stage carpenters have apparently done all that was possible in the way of theatric equipment. A neatly devised and skilfuly executed proscenium frame has been set up, with working pieces carried out so as to make a sure screen on the sides. The top reaches to the sounding board, the presence of which prevents the erection of that great convenience in regular theatres, the fly gallery. A divided curtain which draws together is hung in the frame. For lighting, there are footlights and calcium and electric apparatus in the wings. The orchestra is on the floor. If it were possible to set the floor seats on an inclined plane, the spectators seated beyond the tenth row would doubtless be better satisfied. But such a contrivance would be very awkward, and, perhaps, might not be permitted by the authorities. There is more than compensation for these slight deficiencies in the admirable acoustic properties of the hall. It was apparent on Monday night that the performers, as a rule, failed to appreciate the perfection of the apartment, large as it is, as a place for hearing. They exerted themselves to sing as though they were in a great theatre, with all the disadvantages of an immense space behind and overhead to fill as well as that on the other side of the footlights. Perhaps some of this unnecessary stress was due to Mr. Studley, who, in his direction of the orchestra, seemed to know but two dynamic degrees—mezzo forte and forte.

"Robin Hood" shows the qualities which entitled "Don Quixote," by the same authors, to favorable consideration. The story is good, to begin with. The famous man, Robin Hood, has long been the joy not only of English ballad singers, according to the familiar couplet, but of every English-speaking child who has not yet been subjected to the literary discipline which places all romance on an Index Expurgatorius. Mr. Smith has wrought a pretty story from the materials of the legend, and has decorated it with much clever versifying. His wit may not daze with its brightness, nor his humor drive one into hysterics by its exuberance, but in both elements it is neat and clean, and brevity is a specially commendable feature.

Mr. De Koven's music is throughout full of pleasing qualities. It is tuneful, agreeable and expressively harmonized and effectively instrumented. A distinguishing merit of his coloring is its transparency. He is economic of his resources, which are about the same as are employed by modern French comic opera writers, whose methods, in fact, he has seemed to follow. The music includes many bits of imitation of forms largely affected by English composers of the last century, the madrigal and the glee for examples. In deference to the fashion of these days, he often deserts the polyphonic for the homophonic style, and to a neat bit of part-writing will succeed a movement in galop or waltz form. At this moment it is impossible to select portions for special mention.

The performance on Monday night was with this cast:

Robin Hood	Edwin Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. Macdonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Annabel	Grace Reals
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

The several ladies and gentlemen named are already so well known here (with a single exception) that the bare record is about all that is needed to convey to the connoisseur an idea of the performers. At any rate, beyond a general statement that the performers acquitted themselves of their tasks according to their individual powers, creditably and with satisfaction, comment is out of the question. The exception is Miss Reals, who is brand-new to the stage. She has every reason to feel encouraged to continue the career on which she has entered. Her voice is light but of very sweet quality, and her appearance is very pleasing. There is a chorus of fresh and well trained voices, and the physical eye is pleased, though the archæological mind is shocked by a large assortment of pretty, spick span, picturesque dresses.

"Robin Hood" will be repeated every night and on Saturday afternoon of this week. The following changes in the cast are announced: For tonight and Thursday and Saturday nights, Miss Juliette Corden as Maid Marion; for tomorrow, Friday and Saturday nights, Ferdinand Schutz as Robin Hood; for Thursday night and Saturday afternoon Miss Flora Finlayson as Allan-a-Dale.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Worcester Mass

Date 9/2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Boston today, but Mr. Frank Kneisel, the leader, will meet Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, here this morning, and they will go to New York together.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, SEPT. 30, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The first programme the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this season is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; double concerto for two violins, Bach (Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler); Symphony, No. 3 (Heroic) Beethoven. This programme is chosen out of respect to the memory of Otto Dresil.

THE BOSTON FIELD.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 28, 1890.

MR. NIKISCH ARRIVES.

Mr. Nikisch has arrived; now let the band play. The successful and popular leader of the Symphony orchestra has returned to the scenes of last season's triumphs, and will soon have his trained musicians rehearsing those selections which will be the joy of the music-lover and "the thing" for the society belle and her mamma to praise and converse about during the winter, as they (the selections, not the music-lover or the belle) are bowed and blown from the instruments in front of Beethoven on the Music hall stage.

MUSIC HALL OF THE FUTURE.

Will It Be a Permanent Temple of Opera and Look Like a Theatre?

A contemporary yesterday spoke of the remored plan to turn Music hall into an Academy of Music, and frowned upon it.

The rumor in full, if it be true, is something as follows: It was neither denied nor affirmed by those who were yesterday interrogated in the matter. It seems to be pretty well-grounded, in any event, and this is what it sounds like.

It is said that the Bostonians will next season give a season of operas in Music hall lasting forty weeks; that next summer the hall will be remodelled by putting the stage at the other end, by raising the floor like that of a theatre and by giving a "pitch" to the balconies; that Mr. Higginson is being urged to further the plan.

Those whom the rumor has reached naturally wonder what will become of the Symphony concerts if opera reigns on Saturday evening, and if Boston would brook the transformation of its hallowed Music hall into the form of an opera house.

This remains to be seen.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 28, 1890.

The following suggestion is submitted to Mr. Nikisch's consideration by "A believer in American music": We have some excellent American composers, and the cause of American music would be greatly helped by planning one programme containing works by American musicians only. There are a number of good overtures and symphonies that could be played, and there is a large list of classical songs to choose from. The latter should be sung by a singer of our own nationality. Mr. Calixa Lavallee of this city has a list of most of the principal orchestral works by American musicians.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 28, 1890.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their first out-of-town concert at Lowell some time in November. The pretty opera house there, where the concerts are given, will celebrate the first anniversary of its opening at that time. This theatre is built on the same plans as the Tremont Theatre.

—The first concert in the Kneisel quartet course, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, will take place Oct. 20.

—Mr. Adamowski and Mr. R. C. Dixey of Beacon st.—one as a professional and the other now an amateur—upheld Boston's reputation as a musical centre in the best possible manner at Lenox last week. The violin of Mr. Adamowski seemed freshly inspired since its owner's return from Europe, and his solos were played as few other men can play. Mr. Dixey at the piano did some admirable work, and altogether their part in the week's entertainment and pleasure was very great. The Dixeys will remain through part of October, but Mr. Adamowski will shortly return to Boston to prepare for the Symphony concerts, where—next to Mr. Nikisch—he is the bright particular star.

Gazette SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 28, 1890.

—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and family arrived in this city yesterday afternoon.

Clipping from Standard, New Bedford, M

Date 9/2

SALE OF SYMPHONY [illegible]

tickets for the Symphony concerts, Oct. 27, 1890, and March 10, 1891, was opened at the Opera House this morning at 10 o'clock. As early as yesterday afternoon George Lobdell, the ticket operator, took up his position at the door with nine assistants, and by remaining there all night and this morning secured the first ten positions. When the office opened today there was a line of about 40 persons in waiting, extending nearly to Sixth street, and at no time up to nearly 11 o'clock were there less than 25 in line. The receipts from sales up to this noon were over $1300, and still there are many more subscribers to come. The plat is open to subscribers three days longer.

[12]

Boston Daily Globe.

"ROBIN HOOD" IN OPERA.

Opera in Music Hall is not an absolute novelty. Parepa Rosa and Patti, at the head of lyric companies, have warbled to delighted multitudes within its walls. But not until the present time has there been any adequate endeavor to gain there the stage effects and accessories that add so much to the significance of a theatre's offering. It has been reserved for the Bostonians to make, so far as footlight space and appliances are concerned, a remarkably well equipped lyric temple.

A lofty proscenium, to all appearance solid and substantial, and by no means unattractive, sets apart the singers from the auditors. A handsome garnet curtain, drawn together from the sides as at the Tremont, is brought into requisition. The stage is almost as large as that of the Boston Museum, and there seems to be nothing to prevent as elaborate a scenic display as any opera in the Bostonians' repertory can need.

The English opera season of four weeks began yesterday evening with the first production in this city of a new lyric work, devised by two young Americans. It is called, "Robin Hood," and Mr. Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith, who devised "The Begum" and "Don Quixote," are its authors. It may certainly be said that the Bostonians made a most pronounced success in the new opera, and that the opera itself merits very high praise.

"Robin Hood" is a great lyric achievement. It is hardly too much to say that it is the best American opera that has yet found a hearing. "Don Quixote" was a very great advance on "The Begum," and "Robin Hood" is very decidedly superior to "Don Quixote" The story is more continuously interesting, the scene more varied, characteristic and appropriate. Not that the composer always seems original. There are hints of in the finales, and more than suggestions of other things here and there—in one chorus for instance, the first strain is absolutely identical with Bunthorne's ditty in "Patience," beginning "Now go to him and say to him."

German Waltz Rhythms

But for all this there is made glorious amends. From the chorus of May-day dancers, which gayly begins the scene, until the finale of the closing act, "Robin Hood" is rich in well contrasted melody. Old English madrigals and glees have evidently been carefully studied by Mr. De Koven, and he has gained in this delightful line of composition many a charming effect. The very spirit of the time is caught, also, in Little John's song in praise of "brown October ale"; there is a yeoman's chorus, with its "zoum-zoum" accompaniment in simulation of twanging bowstring that is uniquely effective; and another chorus, with "chime" accompaniment, in the closing act quite worthy to rank with it in excellence. A droll "round" in the second act also merits special mention and praise. Of course the principals all have their vocal opportunities, and these are very good. But for the most part the great, the characteristic excellence of "Robin Hood" is to be found in its concerted music.

Harry Smith has managed to utilize in a clever way incidents from the ballad and legend story of the adventures of the bold Robin Hood and his merry men. Perhaps Guy of Gisborne is a trifle inconsistent, but most of the personages are cleverly drawn and very well sustained.

The scene takes one to Sherwood forest and Nottingham. Robin Hood is here seen as no mere outlaw, but as the rightful claimant to the title of Earl of Huntingdon, and the estates thereto appertaining. A sly sheriff, who is custodian of the estates, endeavors to substitute as the earl a young country lad named Guy of Gisborne. The gallant yeomen trick the sheriff, but are tricked in their turn, through "love and jealousy." However, a mandate from his majesty home from the crusades, sets matters right, and the curtain falls on the "proper picture." The dialogue is generally bright and to the point, and Barnabee brings it very decidedly "up to date" by certain sayings designed to amuse a latter-day audience, and that certainly succeed in so doing. Once in a while a modern-looking costume is to be noted, very pretty, always; but for the most part the attire is entirely and decidedly picturesque are many of the groupings.

In Keeping with the Time,

Perhaps it was the presence of a large company of friends—perhaps it was the feeling of buoyancy and spirit incident upon a "first night" at home with a new opera which the singers believed to be assured of success. Whatever the cause, it is certain that the Bostonians never sang better nor acted with more life and "go." Mr. Hoff, as Robin Hood, was animated to a degree; Mr. Barnabee's drollery, as the Sheriff, was uncommonly mirth-provoking. Marie Stone was in excellent voice, and Maid Marian in her hands counted for its full value in the opera. The skill and vocal endowments of Jesse Bartlett Davis were effectively illustrated in her Allan-a-dale—a handsome yeoman indeed she made him. A very agreeable impression was made by one of the new "Bostonians," Miss Grace Reals, who took the part of Annabel. The lady comes from the capital of Ohio. She has made herself well liked in several of the larger cities of the West, and with her handsome face and figure, graceful manner and clear, rich voice, is certainly a notable acquisition to the forces of the company. Mr. McDonald, as Little John and Mr. Cowles, were excellent both. Mr. Frothingham proved a capital Friar Tuck; and Peter Lang's Guy of Gisborne was very well conceived and well costumed.

Chorus as well as principals seemed to be nerved to do "the best possible." There was not a hitch nor a halt in all their work, and some of it was decidedly difficult—the finale of the second act, for instance, with its oddly effective "break." Mr. Studley's orchestra was never heard to finer advantage.

Tonight "Robin Hood" again, and this time Miss Corden as Maid Marian. The new tenor, Ferdinand Schutz, is to sing the title role on Wednesday evening. The opera is to be sung all the week. Its reception last night was extremely cordial; rededemands were the order of the evening, and there was a double encore for the bell song after 11 o'clock. If these things do not imply continued great success for "Robin Hood" in Boston then indeed will all signs fail in the lyric world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1890.

THE NEW OPERA "ROBIN HOOD" AT MUSIC HALL.

Again the muse of opera has sought refuge in Music Hall, where so many Italian prime donne have dismembered "Trovatore," "Lucia," and other tonal masterworks, that could be compressed into one garden and one chamber scene in seasons gone by. One can sincerely compliment the Bostonians on being far more thorough in their accessaries than their fragment-giving predecessors. The new American opera was given with good setting, and of course regarding the quality of the vocal work of this company there is no longer any question.

The subject of "Robin Hood" although so old, is quite new to the modern operatic repertoire, and yields material enough for vivacity as well as for more serious treatment. It has taken so many shapes in literature, from chapters in Kingsley's "Hereward, the Wake" to the popular old ballads, that it might be given in almost as many phases of musical treatment as "Faust" has been. Mr. de Koven has given both a bright and an earnest side to his work, and has produced an opera not unworthy to succeed his previous two, and one which causes the reviewer to hope for a characteristically American work from his hand eventually. "The Courtship of Myles Standish," for example, would yield more humor than the subject of "Robin Hood" has done to the pen of the librettist, and would be more truly American. Mr. Harry B. Smith has not been so uniformly successful in this as in his previous works; a rightful and a wrongful heir, a sweetheart disguised in male attire, and a troubadour serenading the wrong lady and thereby causing jealousy to the wrong man, are not incidents which charm by any inherent novelty, and the only excuse for their introduction is that the public have become addicted to them by long use.

Nevertheless, the action was pleasing, if not original, and Mr. Smith's verses flowed as fluently as ever. The stage was at times a trifle overcrowded, and occasionally a performer would attach himself involuntarily to some of the scenic properties, but it was by all odds the finest setting of opera that Music Hall has yet held within its classic walls.

In the music Mr. de Koven has excelled himself. Solomon's ancient saying (probably occasioned by his long attendance on comic opera in Jerusalem), "There is no new thing under the sun," must always be borne in mind in speaking of the music of this school. The music of Audran is reminiscent, Strauss' works bear family resemblances to others, and Suppé has not opened a new musical mine recently, therefore we need not mind the fact that the finale of the third act of "Robin Hood" is cousin german to "Faust," that Frederic Clay's ghost hovered over some measures of the second act, or that Wagner himself appeared with his "Waldesweben" (in a thin solution) in the prelude to the second act; suffice it to say that it was all very delicate, graceful and charmingly put together, and the orchestration (which, of course, lost nothing at the hands of Mr. S. L. Studley) was throughout musicianly. In this last matter, however, one may complain of a slight excess in the matter of fanfares; Mr. de Koven seems to have altered a well-known whist rule into "When in doubt play trumpets," and these instruments are constantly giving or answering signals. Next in the affections of the composer is the glockenspiel (the bell-chime), but as this is sugary and attractive the public will not quarrel with it, and indeed the two chief successes of the evening were in choruses with bell attachment, the first of which, the "Tinker's Chorus," reminded of Suppe's "Cooper's Chorus" in "Boccaccio."

The composer has succeeded admirably in catching the old English style and the pastoral glee—"Oh see the lambkins play," thanks both to librettist and composer, was as witty a "catch" as has been written in America, and the quartette following the serenade, "A Troubadour Sang to His Love," may hold its own beside anything of the kind in the Sullivan light operas. It is such numbers as these that lead me to class Mr. de Koven as the best of the native composers of comic opera.

Naturally some of the enthusiasm which bubbled over all through the opera, was of a personal nature, and floral tributes fell like leaves on Vallombrosa. Mr. Barnabee-Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Cowles, Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Hoff, Mrs. Davis, Miss Bartlett, and Miss Stone, were all pressed to the Bostonians heart with fervor, and Mr. Lang and Miss Reals were not forgotten either. It would be prolix to speak of all of the attractive numbers they sang; a few examples may suffice, and Mr. Cowles "Armorers Song," Miss Stone's "Neath Greenwood Trees," and Mr. MacDonald's "Nut brown Ale," were all worthy compositions and splendidly sung. Mr. Barnabee unfortunately did not have any very telling numbers in his part, nor any great chance to be humorous either, unless singing with a halter around his neck he considered humorous. Altogether the opera is likely to be a success, but it will not be because of any mirth-provoking qualities which it possesses, but rather because it has plenty of very graceful music, all of it thorough enough to win the critic, and most of it tuneful enough to please even the auditor who desires to whistle his reminiscences on his homeward way.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1890.

The Bostonians: "Robin Hood."

In the Music Hall, on Monday night, the Bostonians began a season of four weeks with the new operetta in three acts, written for them by Messrs. Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith, entitled "Robin Hood." Some remarks on the attempted transformation of the hall into a theatre are in order. Scene painters, gas and electric light fitters and stage carpenters have apparently done all that was possible in the way of theatric equipment. A neatly devised and skilfuly executed proscenium frame has been set up, with working pieces carried out so as to make a sure screen on the sides. The top reaches to the sounding board, the presence of which prevents the erection of that great convenience in regular theatres, the fly gallery. A divided curtain which draws together is hung in the frame. For lighting, there are footlights and calcium and electric apparatus in the wings. The orchestra is on the floor. If it were possible to set the floor seats on an inclined plane, the spectators seated beyond the tenth row would doubtless be better satisfied. But such a contrivance would be very awkward, and, perhaps, might not be permitted by the authorities. There is more than compensation for these slight deficiencies in the admirable acoustic properties of the hall. It was apparent on Monday night that the performers, as a rule, failed to appreciate the perfection of the apartment, large as it is, as a place for hearing. They exerted themselves to sing as though they were in a great theatre, with all the disadvantages of an immense space behind and overhead to fill as well as that on the other side of the footlights. Perhaps some of this unnecessary stress was due to Mr. Studley, who, in his direction of the orchestra, seemed to know but two dynamic degrees — mezzo forte and forte.

"Robin Hood" shows the qualities which entitled "Don Quixote," by the same authors, to favorable consideration. The story is good, to begin with. The famous man, Robin Hood, has long been the joy not only of English ballad singers, according to the familiar couplet, but of every English-speaking child who has not yet been subjected to the literary discipline which places all romance on an Index Expurgatorius. Mr. Smith has wrought a pretty story from the materials of the legend, and has decorated it with much clever versifying. His wit may not daze with its brightness, nor his humor drive one into hysterics by its exuberance, but in both elements it is neat and clean, and brevity is a specially commendable feature.

Mr. De Koven's music is throughout full of pleasing qualities. It is tuneful, agreeable and expressively harmonized and effectively instrumented. A distinguishing merit of his coloring is its transparency. He is economic of his resources, which are about the same as are employed by modern French comic opera writers, whose methods, in fact, he has seemed to follow. The music includes many bits of imitation of forms largely affected by English composers of the last century, the madrigal and the glee for examples. In deference to the fashion of these days, he often deserts the polyphonic for the homophonic style, and to a neat bit of part-writing will succeed a movement in galop or waltz form. At this moment it is impossible to select portions for special mention.

The performance on Monday night was with this cast:

Robin Hood	Edwin Hoff
High Sheriff of Nottingham	H. C. Barnabee
Little John	W. H. Macdonald
Will Scarlet	Eugene Cowles
Friar Tuck	George Frothingham
Sir Guy of Gisborne	Peter Lang
Allan-a-Dale	Jessie Bartlett Davis
Annabel	Grace Reals
Dame Durden	Josephine Bartlett
Maid Marion	Marie Stone

The several ladies and gentlemen named are already so well known here (with a single exception) that the bare record is about all that is needed to convey to the connoisseur an idea of the performers. At any rate, beyond a general statement that the performers acquitted themselves of their tasks according to their individual powers, creditably and with satisfaction, comment is out of the question. The exception is Miss Reals, who is brand-new to the stage. She has every reason to feel encouraged to continue the career on which she has entered. Her voice is light but of very sweet quality, and her appearance is very pleasing. There is a chorus of fresh and well trained voices, and the physical eye is pleased, though the archæological mind is shocked by a large assortment of pretty, spick span, picturesque dresses.

"Robin Hood" will be repeated every night and on Saturday afternoon of this week. The following changes in the cast are announced: For tonight and Thursday and Saturday nights, Miss Juliette Corden as Maid Marion; for tomorrow, Friday and Saturday nights, Ferdinand Schutz as Robin Hood; for Thursday night and Saturday afternoon Miss Flora Finlayson as Allan-a-Dale.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Worcester Mass

Date 9/2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Boston today, but Mr. Frank Kneisel, the leader, will meet Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, here this morning, and they will go to New York together.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, SEPT. 30, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The first programme the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this season is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; double concerto for two violins, Bach (Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler); Symphony, No. 3 (Heroic) Beethoven. This programme is chosen out of respect to the memory of Otto Dresil.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 28, 1890.

MR. NIKISCH ARRIVES.

Mr. Nikisch has arrived; now let the band play. The successful and popular leader of the Symphony orchestra has returned to the scenes of last season's triumphs, and will soon have his trained musicians rehearsing those selections which will be the joy of the music-lover and "the thing" for the society belle and her mamma to praise and converse about during the winter, as they (the selections, not the music-lover or the belle) are bowed and blown from the instruments in front of Beethoven on the Music hall stage.

MUSIC HALL OF THE FUTURE.

Will It Be a Permanent Temple of Opera and Look Like a Theatre?

A contemporary yesterday spoke of the remored plan to turn Music hall into an Academy of Music, and frowned upon it.

The rumor in full, if it be true, is something as follows: It was neither denied nor affirmed by those who were yesterday interrogated in the matter. It seems to be pretty well-grounded, in any event, and this is what it sounds like.

It is said that the Bostonians will next season give a season of operas in Music hall lasting forty weeks; that next summer the hall will be remodelled by putting the stage at the other end, by raising the floor like that of a theatre and by giving a "pitch" to the balconies; that Mr. Higginson is being urged to further the plan.

Those whom the rumor has reached naturally wonder what will become of the Symphony concerts if opera reigns on Saturday evening, and if Boston would brook the transformation of its hallowed Music hall into the form of an opera house.

This remains to be seen.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 28, 1890.

The following suggestion is submitted to Mr. Nikisch's consideration by "A believer in American music": We have some excellent American composers, and the cause of American music would be greatly helped by planning one programme containing works by American musicians only. There are a number of good overtures and symphonies that could be played, and there is a large list of classical songs to choose from. The latter should be sung by a singer of our own nationality. Mr. Calixa Lavallee of this city has a list of most of the principal orchestral works by American musicians.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 28, 1890.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their first out-of-town concert at Lowell some time in November. The pretty opera house there, where the concerts are given, will celebrate the first anniversary of its opening at that time. This theatre is built on the same plans as the Tremont Theatre.

—The first concert in the Kneisel quartet course, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, will take place Oct. 20.

—Mr. Adamowski and Mr. R. C. Dixey of Beacon st. — one as a professional and the other now an amateur—upheld Boston's reputation as a musical centre in the best possible manner at Lenox last week. The violin of Mr. Adamowski seemed freshly inspired since its owner's return from Europe, and his solos were played as few other men can play. Mr. Dixey at the piano did some admirable work, and altogether their part in the week's entertainment and pleasure was very great. The Dixeys will remain through part of October, but Mr. Adamowski will shortly return to Boston to prepare for the Symphony concerts, where—next to Mr. Nikisch—he is the bright particular star.

Gazette SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 28, 1890.

— Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and family arrived in this city yesterday afternoon.

Clipping from New Bedford, Mass

Date 9/2

SALE OF SYMPHONY [illegible] tickets for the Symphony concerts, Oct. 27, 1890, and March 10, 1891, was opened at the Opera House this morning at 10 o'clock. As early as yesterday afternoon George Lobdell, the ticket operator, took up his position at the door with nine assistants, and by remaining there all night and this morning secured the first ten positions. When the office opened today there was a line of about 40 persons in waiting, extending nearly to Sixth street, and at no time up to nearly 11 o'clock were there less than 25 in line. The receipts from sales up to this noon were over $1300, and still there are many more subscribers to come. The plat is open to subscribers three days longer.

[13]

1/26

Symphony Concerts.

The subscribers' sale of tickets to the Symphony concerts opens tomorrow morning, at 9 o'clock. Not more than ten seats can be secured by subscribers on their own or others' certificate. The certificate must be presented at the box office at the Opera House, in order to secure tickets. Those who have not received cards may obtain them by calling at the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

...dard, New Bedford

9/25

...has been ... to all subscribers to the Symphony concerts, save a very few whose residence is unknown, setting forth that the owner has subscribed for course tickets, payment for which he may select reserved seats, without additional cost at the subscribers' sale, Sept. 27, 29, 30. The sale opens Saturday morning, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock. Not more than ten seats can be selected by subscribers on their own or others' certificate. The certificate must be presented at the box office at the Opera House, in order to secure tickets. Those who have not received cards may obtain them by calling at the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

...Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date.....

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony concerts subscription list closed last evening with about 800 tickets subscribed for.

Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/27

CONCERT SUBSCRIBERS.

The attention of subscribers to the Symphony concerts is called to the special notice. On Wednesday the sale opens to the public.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 30, 1890.

NOT TO BE REBUILT.

Music Hall Will Remain as at Present for Years to Come.

In a weekly paper of Sunday there appeared an editorial to the effect that Music Hall was to be remodelled inside so as to conform more nearly to the appearance of a theatre—that the stage was to be placed at the other end of the hall, that the floor was to be changed so as to slope toward the stage, and the pitch of the galleries also changed.

A reporter showed the clipping yesterday to C. A. Ellis, superintendent of the building, and he said it was news to him that any such change was in contemplation. It was true that the Bostonians intended to give a 20-weeks' season of English opera there next season, but there would be no difficulty in having the same temporary arrangements for scenery, etc., as those in use this season, which can be removed or put in place in a single day, so that the Symphony Orchestra can use it the day following its use by the Bostonians, or vice versa.

Tom Karl, manager of the Bostonians, said: "We have not fully decided on our plans for next season, but just now think of having a 20-weeks' season of English opera, four nights in the week. Of course we have no more to say about whether the hall shall be changed than any other lessee, but still we hope that the association will fit it up in the best possible style for our use, as we shall be here so long. There is nothing in the proposed theatre shape which would hinder its use by the Handel and Haydn Society or by the Symphony Orchestra. The latter organization will appear in the Chicago Auditorium this winter."

C. E. Cotting, the president of the Music Hall Association, said: "There has no such question of reconstructing Music Hall been expressed, as far as I know, for five years. Surely we have no such plans in view at present. Music Hall will probably remain as it is for years to come, and when it is changed the reconstruction will be on a very radical scale."

Clipping from Mercury New Bedford

Date 9/00 Mass

The Symphony Concerts.

There still remain for sale good seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts although the sales to date amount to about [illegible]. Subscribers should bear in mind that the sale will be opened to the public tomorrow.

The Worcester Spy.

DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.

WORCESTER, SEPT. 28, 1890.

One of the most absorbing events since my last Causerie has been the auction sale of the tickets for "the Symphonies." To be sure, the rain poured in torrents and the streets were slimy with a thick black paste, but musical enthusiasm donned storm-cloaks and was out in full force, touching high water mark at $150 premium for each of four seats in row O. This makes one seat for each rehearsal cost that buyer over $5. The Friday afternoon seats averaged much higher than those for Saturday evening, because the rehearsals are more fashionable. The upper gallery seats will still be sold, week by week, for 25 cents, and this is really the only hope of the poor student. But it's a grand scramble for seats when the doors are opened, and has been the ruin of many a pretty gown. It involves, also, a long waiting before the orchestra begins. I know of a "Tech" student who regularly utilized the time by learning the text of her Monday recitation. Personally, I am quite content with the concerts, for which I have excellent seats on the floor, and the premium was not large enough to make me feel impoverished all winter. The total of all the sales rolled up into a goodly sum, never before received in this country or Europe for any single series of musical entertainments. This fact may indicate a deep-seated and wide-spread enthusiasm, or it may reveal to what extremes conservative Boston goes, when once she seriously adopts a "fad."

Mr. Higginson has been urged to have another afternoon rehearsal each week, but probably this will not be effected before next year. I hear that Mr. Bernard Listemann is collecting an orchestra of 60 pieces, with the purpose of reviving the old "Philharmonics." The plan includes a series of concerts, Sunday evenings, in Boston Theatre, beginning late in October. The music is to be of a high order, with vocal and instrumental solos. I also heard that Mr. Giese had been engaged for a 'cello solo for the opening concert. I confess I have enough of my Puritan ancestors left in me to regret this secularizing of Boston's Sabbath day.

The classic walls of Music Hall have never seen a stage setting so complete, and withal so dignified and harmonious, as now greets the audience of the new opera — Robin Hood. The Bostonians have a well established reputation for excellent training, conscientious work and good taste, and these characteristics are well sustained in their latest effort. The opera plot is not novel. Mr. Smith has not kept to the old Robin Hood, half-mythic, half-historic, nor the Scottish outlaw of Percy's reliquies, but has cleverly constructed a Robin Hood of his own, who does duty well, and whose romance lends itself easily to an opera. Mr. De Koven's music is very pleasing. It does not annoy by the characterless work of the average comic opera, and my critic friend declares that the orchestra plays "really musicianly." The whole is marked by a sprightliness, a delicacy and grace that is delightful to hear. There are certain popular "catch" features; the chorus of milk-maids, with stools and pails, and the chorus of tinkers, with an accompaniment on pans and bells. The solo of Allen-a-Dale, with chorus, "In Olden Times St. Swithin's Chimes," also has a bell accompaniment and captured the audience. One of the brightest gems was a quartet, "All's Fair in Love and War." The troupe contains all the old favorites from Barnabee, down, and they are too well known to need comment of mine. Robin Hood is to run four weeks, and I can promise two most enjoyable hours to all who attend. The Bostonians then go on a long tour across the continent, but they have engaged Music Hall next year for four nights for 20 consecutive weeks.

Another new venture of the Bostonians is an operatic school in Music Hall building, under the management of Karl, McDonald and Barnabee. It is designed to prepare pupils for the operatic stage. This involves more than the development and cultivation of the voice. A knowledge of dramatic art, stage action and dancing is also essential. An aspirant, especially a young woman, should remember that the training is long and arduous. Even when a position is gained, the work is very exacting and the pay small, unless she has unusual ability and can take a leading role.

Music Hall is dear to the Boston heart. Tucked in among the surrounding buildings, the exterior is lost, but the interior, if severe, is rather elegant. In the days when the great organ graced the stage it was one of the sights to which the country cousins were always taken. The great sounding board is a blunder; sins may be forgiven, but blunders, never! Even the stately bronze of Beethoven cannot redeem it. This statue is one of the finest in town, and was the gift of the art critic—the late C. C. Perkins. I still grieve for the old organ and miss its massive carving and gilded pipes, upheld by grotesque giants. Alas! it is now packed in a wooden shanty behind the New England Conservatory of Music, and is as silent and neglected as the graves which surround it. The God of Music, at the rear of the hall, flings his scornful glance down on the superb orchestra of today, just as he did on the old Harvard Symphony. In those days symphony tickets went begging for buyers. The fine brackets and busts, on each side of Apollo, were the work of a Danish sculptor, and were among the few gifts of Charlotte Cushman to her native city.

For 40 years Music Hall has heard the superb oratorios given by the Handel and Haydn Society. Here, also, the Cecilia, Boylston and Apollo clubs scored their successes. Nearly every speaker of renown in America, and many from abroad, gained a proud recognition on this platform, and here the great pianists and violinists won fresh laurels. Here Theodore Parker stirred the zeal of a freer thinking; here Murray started his Metropolitan church; and here Fulton thundered against Romanism. Music Hall has been the scene of many a famous fair and many a brilliant ball. The generation that built it has nearly passed away, but the children's children who inherit it will love it for what it has known of Boston's best achievement.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1890.

——Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, is due here on September 28 on the Lahn from Bremen.

——Fred. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work.

——Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be at one of the first violin stands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

COMPOSITIONS TO BE PRODUCED SEASON 1890-1.

THE musical world of Boston will not be able to charge Mr. Arthur Nikisch with a lack of eclecticism in the construction of his programs for the approaching season of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under his direction, as a more varied, elaborate and attractive scheme than the one embraced within the scope of the following works cannot well be imagined. These, together with novelties not yet ready for announcement, will all be produced under Mr. Nikisch this season. He will organize a large choral body necessary for some of the works in the following list, published now for the first time:

BEETHOVEN—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish chorus and Priests' March, from the "Ruins of Athens."
SCHUMANN—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."
SCHUBERT—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished.
MENDELSSOHN—Scotch Symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas."
BRAHMS—Symphonies, D major and E minor. Academic overture, Hungarian Dances.
RAFF—Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods).
BERLIOZ—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
VOLKMANN—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III."
MOZART—"Jupiter" Symphony.
HAYDN—Symphonies, D major and E flat major.
DVORAK—Symphony, D minor. Scherzo cappriccioso, D major.
LISZT—"Dante" (with chorus). Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz." "Rackoczy March."
WAGNER—"Götterdämmerung"—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March." "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell." "Siegfried Idyll." "Faust Overture." "Kaiser March." Paris version of "Tannhäuser."
TSCHAIKOWSKY—Symphony, second and third movements of Fourth Symphony, F minor. Serenade for strings, C major. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
MOSZKOWSKI—Suite in F. major.
ROBERT FUCHS—Serenade for strings, D major.
CHERUBINI—"Abencerages" overture.
CHADWICK—Symphony, B flat.
RICHARD HEUBERGER—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.
GOLDMARK—Overture "Prometheus."
SVENDSEN—"Carnival in Paris."
ANTON BRUCKNER—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch pronounces the work of Bruckner as one of the most profound compositions he has ever studied. There will be, in addition to the above numbers, a series of novelties and compositions by Saint-Saëns, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

* * *

That extremely interesting and magnetic man Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Europe last Thursday and paid this office a friendly visit.

Nikisch is a personality that at once commands sympathy.

He is a force in music and you feel it instantly.

His face is an attractive one.

Full of power and softened by strong poetical feeling, it is both masculine and feminine in its characteristics.

It reveals both strength and tenderness. Mobile as an actor's, emotional as a woman's. A man who understands both Beethoven and Chopin, the opposite poles of art.

A rare power indeed!

Nikisch has been summering at Ischl and met there Paderewski, the pianist and composer (of some other compositions besides that menuet in G), and Anton Bruckner, the Viennese composer.

Paderewski will not come to America this season. He says he must work harder so that he will play better (for pianists work to play.)

Good for Paddy! One foreign artist, anyhow, who thinks the Yankees may be critical.

Nikisch tells me Bruckner played some motifs of his eighth symphony for him on the organ.

He thinks it a great work.

So do I. In fact, I have a dim recollection of fighting a royal battle in the behalf of Bruckner against great odds.

He is yet a composer of music for the future.

* * *

Nikisch met Rubinstein at Bartolph Senff's, in Leipsic, and the Ursine pianist said most emphatically that he would not be in America this or any season.

(This makes about twenty-seven times I have contradicted Rubinstein's intended visit to us.)

* * *

Eben D. Jordan, Jr.'s, Guests Enjoy "Robin Hood."

The largest opera party known in the annals of the Boston stage attended the performance of "Robin Hood" given at Music Hall, last evening, by the Bostonians. It was an event worthy of prominence in the record of public-spirited actions in the interest of good music by Boston merchants, and proved the value of the example of the father in influencing the action of the son. The audience filled the hall to overflowing, and of those present 2000 were the guests of Eben D. Jordan, Jr., who, by organizing this gigantic opera party, displayed his appreciation of the action of the Bostonians' managers, Messrs. Karl, Macdonald & Barnabee, in making "Robin Hood" the chief attraction of their Boston season.

Mr. Jordan's guests were the employes of the firm of Jordan, Marsh & Co., and his action in giving this enjoyment to the workpeople of his firm recalled many similar actions of his father, the senior member of the firm, in former years. Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., believes in the value of Mr. DeKoven as a representative American composer, and it is safe to say that no one has ever given a more practical demonstration of such a faith than that shown by his action in organizing last evening's opera party.

The company appeared to splendid advantage in the evening's performance, and the several numbers have never been better sung than on this occasion. The audience proved to be one worthy the good work and its excellent performance, and the artists, chorus, conductor and orchestra all gained an enthusiastic appreciation of their efforts.

The guests of the evening could not restrain their enthusiasm when their host made his way to his seat, and gave him a round of cheers, in spite of the action of the opera then occurring.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 5, 1890.

The Symphony orchestra will play in Chickering hall, New York, Tuesday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13 and Feb. 24.

Mr. Nikisch will live during the winter at Jamaica Plain.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 5.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Among the important works selected by Mr. Nikisch for this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Beethoven—Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9; Dervish Chorus and Priests' March from "The Ruins of Athens." Schumann — Symphonies D-minor and C-major; "Manfred" music. Schubert—Symphonies, C-major, and "Unfinished." Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony; Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Overture, "Ruy Blas." Brahms—Symphonies, D-major and E-minor; Academic Overture; Hungarian Dances. Raff—Symphony, "Im Walde." Berlioz—Symphony, "Fantastique"; Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Volkmann — Symphony, D-minor; Overture, "Richard III." Mozart — "Jupiter" Symphony. Haydn—Symphonies, D-major and E-flat-major. Dvorak—Symphony, D-minor; Scherzo cappriccioso, D-major. Liszt, "Dante" (with chorus), "Tasso"; Mephisto Waltz; Rakockzy March. Wagner, Götterdammerung, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn;" Terzett, "The Rhine Daughters;" "Funeral March; Vorspiel and Good Friday Spell, "Parsifal;" Siegfried Idyll, "Faust Overture," Kaiser Marsch, Paris version of "Tannhaeuser." Tschaikowsky—Two movements of Fourth Symphony, F-minor; Serenade for Strings, C-major; Overture, "Romeo and Juliet." Moszkowski—Suite in F major. Rob. Fuchs—Serenade for Strings, D-major. Cherubini—Overture, "Abencerages." Chadwick—Symphony, B-flat. R. Henburger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's. Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus." Svendsen—Carnival in Paris. A. Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra. Also representative compositions by Saint-Saëns, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston street.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET.

On MONDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.

Season tickets, with Reserved Seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

SANDERS THEATRE,
Cambridge.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS.

On Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. 5t oct6

UNION HALL.
(18 Boylston St.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET.

[13]

Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/26

Symphony Concerts.

The subscribers' sale of tickets to the Symphony concerts opens tomorrow morning, at 10 o'clock. Not more than ten seats can be selected by subscribers on their own or others' certificate. The certificate must be presented at the box office at the Opera House, in order to secure tickets. Those who have not received cards may obtain them by calling at the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

[illegible] Standard, New Bedford

9/25

[illegible] has been mailed, or delivered personally, to all subscribers to the symphony concerts, save a very few whose residence is unknown, setting forth that the owner has subscribed for course tickets upon payment for which he may select reserved seats without additional cost at the subscribers' sale, Sept, 27, 29, 30. The sale opens Saturday morning, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock. Not more than ten seats can be selected by subscribers on their own or others' certificate. The certificate must be presented at the box office at the Opera House, in order to secure tickets. Those who have not received cards may obtain them by calling at the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/5

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony concerts subscription list closed last evening with about 800 tickets subscribed for.

Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.

Date 9/27

Concert Subscribers.

The attention of subscribers to the Symphony concerts is called to the special notice. On Wednesday the sale opens to the public.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 30, 1890.

NOT TO BE REBUILT.

Music Hall Will Remain as at Present for Years to Come.

In a weekly paper of Sunday there appeared an editorial to the effect that Music Hall was to be remodelled inside so as to conform more nearly to the appearance of a theatre—that the stage was to be placed at the other end of the hall, that the floor was to be changed so as to slope toward the stage, and the pitch of the galleries also changed.

A reporter showed the clipping yesterday to C. A. Ellis, superintendent of the building, and he said it was news to him that any such change was in contemplation. It was true that the Bostonians intended to give a 20-weeks' season of English opera there next season, but there would be no difficulty in having the same temporary arrangements for scenery, etc., as those in use this season, which can be removed or put in place in a single day, so that the Symphony Orchestra can use it the day following its use by the Bostonians, or vice versa.

Tom Karl, manager of the Bostonians, said: "We have not fully decided on our plans for next season, but just now think of having a 20-weeks' season of English opera, four nights in the week. Of course we have no more to say about whether the hall shall be changed than any other lessee, but still we hope that the association will fit it up in the best possible style for our use, as we shall be here so long. There is nothing in the proposed theatre shape which would hinder its use by the Handel and Haydn Society or by the Symphony Orchestra. The latter organization will appear in the Chicago Auditorium this winter."

C. E. Cotting, the president of the Music Hall Association, said: "There has no such intention of reconstructing Music Hall been expressed, as far as I know, for five years. Surely we have no such plans in view at present. Music Hall will probably remain as it is for years to come, and when it is changed the reconstruction will be on a very radical scale."

Clipping from Mercury New Bedford Mass.

Date 9/30/90

The Symphony Concerts.

There still remain for sale good seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts although the sales to date amount to about $1500. Subscribers should bear in mind that the sale will be opened to the public tomor-

The Sunday Spy.

The Worcester Spy.
DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.

WORCESTER, SEPT. 28, 1890.

One of the most absorbing events since my last Causerie has been the auction sale of the tickets for "the Symphonies." To be sure, the rain poured in torrents and the streets were slimy with a thick black paste, but musical enthusiasm donned storm-cloaks and was out in full force, touching high water mark at $150 premium for each of four seats in row O. This makes one seat for each rehearsal cost that buyer over $5. The Friday afternoon seats averaged much higher than those for Saturday evening, because the rehearsals are more fashionable. The upper gallery seats will still be sold, week by week, for 25 cents, and this is really the only hope of the poor student. But it's a grand scramble for seats when the doors are opened, and has been the ruin of many a pretty gown. It involves, also, a long waiting before the orchestra begins. I know of a "Tech" student who regularly utilized the time by learning the text of her Monday recitation. Personally, I am quite content with the concerts, for which I have excellent seats on the floor, and the premium was not large enough to make me feel impoverished all winter. The total of all the sales rolled up into a goodly sum, never before received in this country or Europe for any single series of musical entertainments. This fact may indicate a deep-seated and wide-spread enthusiasm, or it may reveal to what extremes conservative Boston goes, when once she seriously adopts a "fad."

Mr. Higginson has been urged to have another afternoon rehearsal each week, but probably this will not be effected before next year. I hear that Mr. Bernard Listemann is collecting an orchestra of 60 pieces, with the purpose of reviving the old "Philharmonics." The plan includes a series of concerts, Sunday evenings, in Boston Theatre, beginning late in October. The music is to be of a high order, with vocal and instrumental solos. I also heard that Mr. Giese had been engaged for a 'cello solo for the opening concert. I confess I have enough of my Puritan ancestors left in me to regret this secularizing of Boston's Sabbath day.

The classic walls of Music Hall have never seen a stage setting so complete, and withal so dignified and harmonious, as now greets the audience of the new opera — Robin Hood. The Bostonians have a well established reputation for excellent training, conscientious work and good taste, and these characteristics are well sustained in their latest effort. The opera plot is not novel. Mr. Smith has not kept to the old Robin Hood, half-mythic, half-historic, nor the Scottish outlaw of Percy's Reliquies, but has cleverly constructed a Robin Hood of his own, who does duty well, and where romance lends itself easily to an opera. Mr. De Koven's music is very pleasing. It does not annoy by the characterless work of the average comic opera; and my critic friend declares that the orchestra plays "really musicianly." The whole is marked by a sprightliness, a delicacy and grace that is delightful to hear. There are certain popular "catch" features; the chorus of milk-maids, with stools and pails, and the chorus of tinkers, with an accompaniment on pans and bells. The solo of Allen-a-Dale, with chorus, "In Olden Times St. Swithin's Chimes," also has a bell accompaniment and captured the audience. One of the brightest gems was a quartet, "All's Fair in Love and War." The troupe contains all the old favorites from Barnabee, down, and they are too well known to need comment of mine. Robin Hood is to run four weeks, and I can promise two most enjoyable hours to all who attend. The Bostonians then go on a long tour across the continent, but they have engaged Music Hall next year for four nights for 20 consecutive weeks.

Another new venture of the Bostonians is an operatic school in Music Hall building, under the management of Karl, McDonald and Barnabee. It is designed to prepare pupils for the operatic stage. This involves more than the development and cultivation of the voice. A knowledge of dramatic art, stage action and dancing is also essential. An aspirant, especially a young woman, should remember that the training is long and arduous. Even when a position is gained, the work is very exacting and the pay small, unless she has unusual ability and can take a leading role.

Music Hall is dear to the Boston heart. Tucked in among the surrounding buildings, the exterior is lost, but the interior, if severe, is rather elegant. In the days when the great organ graced the stage, it was one of the sights to which the country cousins were always taken. The great sounding board is a blunder; sins may be forgiven, but blunders, never! Even the stately bronze of Beethoven cannot redeem it. This statue is one of the finest in town, and was the gift of the art critic—the late C. C. Perkins. I still grieve for the old organ and miss its massive carving and gilded pipes, upheld by grotesque giants. Alas! it is now packed in a wooden shanty behind the New England Conservatory of Music, and is as silent and neglected as the graves which surround it. The God of Music, at the rear of the hall, flings his scornful glance down on the superb orchestra of today, just as he did on the old Harvard Symphony. In those days symphony tickets went begging for buyers. The fine brackets and busts, on each side of Apollo, were the work of a Danish sculptor, and were among the few gifts of Charlotte Cushman to her native city.

For 40 years Music Hall has heard the superb oratorios given by the Handel and Haydn Society. Here, also, the Cecilia, Boylston and Apollo clubs scored their successes. Nearly every speaker of renown in America, and many from abroad, gained a proud recognition on this platform, and here the great pianists and violinists won fresh laurels. Here Theodore Parker stirred the zeal of a freer thinking; here Murray started his Metropolitan church; and here Fulton thundered against Romanism. Music Hall has been the scene of many a famous fair and many a brilliant ball. The generation that built it has nearly passed away, but the children's children who inherit it will love it for what it has known of Boston's best achievement.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1890.

——Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, is due here on September 28 on the Lahn from Bremen.

——Fred. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Concerts, has returned from his annual vacation and is hard at work.

——Adamowski, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and will be at one of the first violin stands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

COMPOSITIONS TO BE PRODUCED SEASON 1890–1.

THE musical world of Boston will not be able to charge Mr. Arthur Nikisch with a lack of eclecticism in the construction of his programs for the approaching season of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under his direction, as a more varied, elaborate and attractive scheme than the one embraced within the scope of the following works cannot well be imagined. These, together with novelties not yet ready for announcement, will all be produced under Mr. Nikisch this season. He will organize a large choral body necessary for some of the works in the following list, published now for the first time:

BEETHOVEN—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish chorus and Priests' March, from the "Ruins of Athens."
SCHUMANN—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."
SCHUBERT—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished.
MENDELSSOHN—Scotch Symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas."
BRAHMS—Symphonies, D major and E minor. Academic overture, Hungarian Dances.
RAFF—Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods).
BERLIOZ—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
VOLKMANN—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III."
MOZART—"Jupiter" Symphony.
HAYDN—Symphonies, D major and E flat major.
DVORAK—Symphony, D minor. Scherzo cappriccioso, D major.
LISZT—"Dante" (with chorus). Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz." "Rackoczy March."
WAGNER—"Götterdämmerung"—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March."
"Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell." "Siegfried Idyll." "Faust Overture." "Kaiser March." Paris version of "Tannhäuser."
TSCHAIKOWSKY—Symphony, second and third movements of Fourth Symphony, F minor. Serenade for strings, C major. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
MOSZKOWSKI—Suite in F. major.
ROBERT FUCHS—Serenade for strings, D major.
CHERUBINI—"Abencerages" overture.
CHADWICK—Symphony, B flat.
RICHARD HEUBERGER—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.
GOLDMARK—Overture "Prometheus."
SVENDSEN—"Carnival in Paris."
ANTON BRUCKNER—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch pronounces the work of Bruckner as one of the most profound compositions he has ever studied. There will be, in addition to the above numbers, a series of novelties and compositions by Saint-Saëns, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

* * *

That extremely interesting and magnetic man Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Europe last Thursday and paid this office a friendly visit.

Nikisch is a personality that at once commands sympathy.

He is a force in music and you feel it instantly.

His face is an attractive one.

Full of power and softened by strong poetical feeling, it is both masculine and feminine in its characteristics.

It reveals both strength and tenderness. Mobile as an actor's, emotional as a woman's. A man who understands both Beethoven and Chopin, the opposite poles of art.

A rare power indeed!

Nikisch has been summering at Ischl and met there Paderewski, the pianist and composer (of some other compositions besides that menuet in G), and Anton Bruckner, the Viennese composer.

Paderewski will not come to America this season. He says he must work harder so that he will play better (for pianists work to play.)

Good for Paddy! One foreign artist, anyhow, who thinks the Yankees may be critical.

Nikisch tells me Bruckner played some motifs of his eighth symphony for him on the organ.

He thinks it a great work.

So do I. In fact, I have a dim recollection of fighting a royal battle in the behalf of Bruckner against great odds.

He is yet a composer of music for the future.

* * *

Nikisch met Rubinstein at Bartolph Senff's, in Leipsic, and the Ursine pianist said most emphatically that he would not be in America this or any season.

(This makes about twenty-seven times I have contradicted Rubinstein's intended visit to us.)

* * *

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1890.

Eben D. Jordan, Jr.'s, Guests Enjoy "Robin Hood."

The largest opera party known in the annals of the Boston stage attended the performance of "Robin Hood" given at Music Hall, last evening, by the Bostonians. It was an event worthy of prominence in the record of public-spirited actions in the interest of good music by Boston merchants, and proved the value of the example of the father in influencing the action of the son. The audience filled the hall to overflowing, and of those present 2000 were the guests of Eben D. Jordan, Jr., who, by organizing this gigantic opera party, displayed his appreciation of the action of the Bostonians' managers, Messrs. Karl, Macdonald & Barnabee, in making "Robin Hood" the chief attraction of their Boston season.

Mr. Jordan's guests were the employes of the firm of Jordan, Marsh & Co., and his action in giving this enjoyment to the workpeople of his firm recalled many similar actions of his father, the senior member of the firm, in former years. Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., believes in the value of Mr. DeKoven as a representative American composer, and it is safe to say that no one has ever given a more practical demonstration of such a faith than that shown by his action in organizing last evening's opera party.

The company appeared to splendid advantage in the evening's performance, and the several numbers have never been better sung than on this occasion. The audience proved to be one worthy the good work and its excellent performance, and the artists, chorus, conductor and orchestra all gained an enthusiastic appreciation of their efforts.

The guests of the evening could not restrain their enthusiasm when their host made his way to his seat, and gave him a round of cheers, in spite of the action of the opera then occurring.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 5, 1890.

The Symphony orchestra will play in Chickering hall, New York, Tuesday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13 and Feb. 24.

Mr. Nikisch will live during the winter at Jamaica Plain.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 5.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Among the important works selected by Mr. Nikisch for this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Beethoven—Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9; Dervish Chorus and Priests' March from "The Ruins of Athens." Schumann — Symphonies D-minor and C-major; "Manfred" music. Schubert—Symphonies, C-major, and "Unfinished." Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony; Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Overture, "Ruy Blas." Brahms—Symphonies, D-major and E-minor; Academic Overture; Hungarian Dances. Raff—Symphony, "Im Walde." Berlioz—Symphony, "Fantastique"; Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Volkmann — Symphony, D-minor; Overture, "Richard III." Mozart — "Jupiter" Symphony. Haydn—Symphonies, D-major and E-flat major. Dvorak—Symphony, D-minor; Scherzo cappriccioso, D-major. Liszt, "Dante" (with chorus), "Tasso"; Mephisto Waltz; Rakoczky March. Wagner, Götterdammerung, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn;" Terzett, "The Rhine Daughters;" "Funeral March; Vorspiel and Good Friday Spell, "Parsifal;" Siegfried Idyll, "Faust Overture," Kaiser Marsch, Paris version of "Tannhaeuser." Tschaikowsky—Two movements of Fourth Symphony, F-minor; Serenade for Strings, C-major; Overture, "Romeo and Juliet." Moszkowski—Suite in F major. Rob. Fuchs—Serenade for Strings, D-major. Cherubini—Overture, "Abenceerages." Chadwick—Symphony, B-flat. R. Henburger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's. Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus." Svendsen — Carnival in Paris. A. Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra. Also representative compositions by Saint-Saëns, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston street.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET.

On MONDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.

Season tickets, with Reserved Seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

SANDERS THEATRE,
Cambridge.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS.

On Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. 5t octo

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston St.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

On MONDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

[14]

THOUSANDS APPLAUD.

The Employes of the House of Jordan, Marsh & Co.

Enjoy the New American Opera, "Robin Hood," in Music Hall,

Through the Generosity of the Famous Firm—A Gala Night.

It was a generous tribute to the newest and most promising of American operas that filled Boston's Music Hall yesterday evening with an appreciative, delighted throng.

Two thousand strong, a regiment indeed of busy workers, witnessed the Bostonians' brilliant performance of "Robin Hood," through the liberality of the great business establishment which gives them employment—the house of Jordan, Marsh & Company.

In many ways, indeed, the cause of the best music has been befriended and advanced by this firm. The series of concert entertainments provided especially for employes in the hall of Messrs. Jordan, Marsh & Co.'s building was a unique offering, and greatly enjoyed.

If this was a high precedent for kindred establishments to follow, the world-famous firm has set the standard far higher by the great gathering which its generosity brought together last night.

American opera, interpreted by an American company! Surely such an enterprise merits the warmest encouragement; and it is to be hoped—although perhaps not to be confidently expected—that the example set so gloriously here in Boston will find followers and emulators elsewhere.

The field of native lyric works is not so well filled that a work like the "Robin Hood" of Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith should not find a warm welcome to our lyric stage. It is much to the credit of the Bostonians, and a signal proof of their enterprise, that this delightful opera should have found an honored place in their repertory. The score is a constant delight—the story full of interest, with the spirit of the days of glory of English yeomanry ever present. There is enough story to hold the auditor's interest, while wit and drollery enlivens its smooth and pleasant course throughout.

"Robin Hood" has been witnessed during the fortnight now closing by very appreciative audiences in Boston. But no higher compliment could be paid to its worth and (in the best sense of the phrase) its popular character than the

Enthusiastic Reception it Won

from the crowded assemblage—largely made up of the guests of Jordan, Marsh & Co.—last night. It was a triumph for the singers as well as the delightful opera—an occasion which will live long in the memory of all who participated, as well as in the recollection of those whose enterprise and liberality made this unique event possible.

"Where can one be happier than in the bosom of his family?" might well have been the gratifying reflection of Eben D. Jordan, as he sat surrounded by the other members of his firm, together with his most trusted lieutenants, upon the floor of the house, while all around the employes of his establishment, from cash boys up to the most trusted clerk were, saying complimentary things about his thoughtfulness of their pleasure, as well as his own interests.

At all events he looked remarkably contented throughout the evening, though something suspiciously like a blush mantled his cheek as he arose at the end of the first act for the purpose of taking a little trip around the hall and was greeted with something akin to a cyclone of applause.

He circulated about among the employes in the different departments, on the floor, and was greeted everywhere with a cordial "Good evening, Mr. Jordan," to which he responded to with a smile and a nod or a pleasant word, while here and there he sat down for a little chat with some especially respected member of the family.

When he returned to his seat, the orchestra had commenced the overture for the second act, but so great was the applause as his silvery head went down the aisle, that the music had to be interrupted for a few moments in order to give enthusiasm a chance to spend itself.

Of course one of the chief elements of delight to the heart of the masculine auditor was the presence of such an army of charming young women in the audience (for where can one find more pretty girls to the square yard than in the famous bazaar of Jordan, Marsh & Co.?), and they were all there—to the eye, at least, outnumbering the men about six to one, and altogether they helped to make as interesting an audience as one could wish to see. They came in squads of from one to a dozen, those with escorts as a rule arriving early, for as a place wherein to snuggle up close and whisper soft nothings the seats in Music Hall are not to be sneezed at.

Of course the little feminine groups who came unattended indulged in the inevitable gossip and chatter in the lobby before entering and created the usual little flurry upon reaching the patient ticket taker, when a fallen glove or a missing ticket or opera glass would create just flutter enough to keep up the character of the sex. Every one had on her and many of them would have done credit to the Back Bay for taste displayed in toilets. Those of limited means showed the girlish tact by the furbishing up of their house dresses with here and there a bit of lace or a colored ribbon, which has a wonderful effect when applied with a proper eye.

Best Bib and Tucker,

Of course their necks were like the swans', their hands like lilies, their eyes like diamonds. They gazed with wondering eyes, laughed their little gurgling laughs, and so on, just as bewitchingly as the country bud who only goes to the opera when she can hear "Varner."

The cash boys and girls were in the balconies, where they could see better and hear quite as well as in the more aristocratic seats, and the expression of appreciation on their faces was the best possible compliment, alike to the artists and the hosts of the evening.

[illegible] score, and it would be [illegible] Bostonians never played [illegible] which tucked their [illegible] more big means of calls [illegible] the most charming num[illegible] opera.

[illegible] in which the great audience [illegible]

[illegible] from the dismissal of a Sunday evening meeting.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 5, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts---Outline of the Programme.

The arrival of Mr. Arthur Nikisch upon the scene of his season's labors as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has made Music Hall again a busy place for all associated in the management of this great organization. The men of the orchestra were called together early in the week, and many hours of work have already been given to the preparation of the opening programmes. There have been very few changes in the make-up of the band since last season, and so the conductor has his orchestra well informed in regard to his methods, and fully prepared to accomplish the best results in their season's work. Mr. Nikisch returns to his duties in the best of health, full of enthusiasm, and well informed as to the demands of American audiences. During his vacation he has carefully considered his programmes for the season, and he has been kind enough to furnish the following list of compositions as making the basis of the season's concert scheme:

Bethoven—Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, Dervish Chorus and Priests. March from the "Ruins of Athens."

Schuman—Symphonies D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."

Schubert—Symphonies C major and the unfinished.

Mendelssohn—Scotch symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture "Ruy Blas."

Brahms—Symphonies D major and E minor. "Academic Overture," "Hungarian Dances."

Raff—Symphony "Im Walde" (in the woods).

Berlioz—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benevenuto Cellina."

Volkmann—Symphony D minor. Overture "Richard III."

Mozart—Jupiter Symphony.

Hayden—Symphonies D maj. and E flat major.

Dvorak—Symphony D minor. Scherzo capriccioso D major.

Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus), Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz," "Rakoczy March."

Wagner—"Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzett of the Rhine Daughters," "Funeral March," "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell," "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," "Kaiser March," Paris version of "Tannhauser."

Tschaikowsky—Symphonie, second and third movements of fourth symphony, F minor, serenade for strings, C major, "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

Moszkowski—Suite in F major.

Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major.

Cherubini—Abenierages overture.

Chadwick—Symphony B flat.

R. Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus."

Svendsen—"Carnival in Paris."

A. Bruckner—"Te Deum" for solo, chorus and orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch states that, in addition to the above list, he has in contemplation the production of several novelties by Saint-Saens, Villers Stanford, Mackenzie and others, all going to make a most attractive outlook for the season's concerts. He frankly admits the difficulty at present of securing solo artists suited to fill the demands of the symphony patrons, but anticipates being able to give satisfaction in this part of the concert scheme before the season is far advanced. Among the engagements of soloists now made are Mrs. Ciara Poole-King, Mr. William J. Winch, Theodore Reichmann and Mr. E. A. Macdowel, and negotiations are pending with a number of other singers and pianists. The first public rehearsal occurs next Friday afternoon, and, although every reserved seat was sold at the auction, the entire upper balcony and all available standing room will be free to holders of admission tickets, as usual. The first concert follows on Saturday evening, and for these occasions the programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Hebrides" ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for two violins ..... Bach
Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) ..... Beethoven

This programme has been selected to be played in memory of the late Otto Dresel.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders' Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

The Kneisel quartet give six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall, where subscribers can select their seats next Friday morning.

The sale of seats for Agnes Huntington's first week at the Broadway Theatre, New York, beginning tomorrow evening, is very large, and rapidly increasing. Every place

---

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 5, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston st.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

SOME SYMPHONY PROMISES.

Choral Work to Supplement Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Offerings.

A pleasant addition to the expected features of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the engagement of a large chorus to assist in the presentation of certain notable works on Mr. Nikisch's programme. The arrangements for the series provide for not a few novelties. Besides those mentioned in the following scheme there are to be expected a series of novelties and compositions by Saint-Saens, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

Beethoven—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish chorus and priests' march, from the "Ruins of Athens."

Schumann—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."

Schubert—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished.

Mendelssohn—Scotch symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas."

Brahms—Symphonies, D major and E minor. Academic overture, Hungarian dances.

Raff—Symphony (In the Woods).

Berlioz—Symphony fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Volkmann—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III."

Mozart—"Jupiter" symphony.

Haydn—Symphonies, D major and E flat major.

Dvorak—Symphony, D minor. Scherzo cappriccioso, D major.

Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus). Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz." "Rackoczy March."

Wagner—"Twilight of the Gods," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March."

"Parsifal," prelude, and "Good Friday Spell." "Siegfried Idyll." "Faust" overture. "Kaiser March." Paris version of "Tannhauser."

Tschaikowsky—Symphony, second and third movements of fourth symphony, F minor. Serenade for strings, C major. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

Moszkowski—Suite in F major.

Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major.

Cherubini—"Abencerages" overture.

Chadwick—Symphony, B flat.

Richard Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.

Goldmark—Overture "Prometheus."

Svendsen—"Carnival in Paris."

Anton Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

A series of six subscription concerts will be given in Union Hall, 18 Boylston st., by the Kneisel quartet on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 19 and March 9. The subscription is now open at Music Hall, where subscribers can secure their seats next Friday morning.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Arthur Nikisch, will give a series of eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets go on sale at the University book store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning at 8 o'clock.

---Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the Symphony orchestra conductor—and the most popular one, both with his men and the public, that Mr. Higginson has yet secured—arrived from his vacation in Europe last Saturday, and with Mrs. Nikisch and family is domiciled in a cosy house in Jamaica Plain, which he has rented for the winter. As the absence of his household last year seemed to be the one thing wanting in Mr. Nikisch's perfect satisfaction and content, we shall look for a very happy-faced Symphony conductor on the opening night.

The first of the Sunday night popular concerts at Music Hall is unavoidably postponed until the 19th inst., when a very attractive programme will be presented.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 a. m. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston St.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

On Monday Evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.

Season tickets, with Reserved Seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. Subscription now open at Music Hall. 1t

---

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet will give six concerts of chamber music in Union Hall on Monday nights, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Season tickets, with reserved seats, will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, on Friday morning. Subscription list now open at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday nights, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets will be for sale at the University Bookstore on Saturday morning.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun rehearsals for the season. There are a few changes in the membership. Among the first violins are two new men, Messrs. Straube and Hofman. The first horn player is A. Hackeboth, who has been in the New York Philharmonic and Thomas's Orchestra, and who replaces Mr. Reiter. A new drum player is Mr. Ludwig. At the first concert, next Saturday night, Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler will play a double concerto for violins, by Bach, and at the second Theodor Reichman of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing.

[illegible] final series of concerts by the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will consist of eight performances on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets for these concerts will go on sale at the University Book Store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 a. m. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL.
(18 Boylston Street.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTETTE

On Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

THE BOSTONIAN.

OCT. 3, 1890.

Arrangements have been made to resume the Sunday evening popular concerts at Music hall on October 12, and a strong list of attractions will be offered during the fall and winter months. The concerts will be maintained with a view to supplying the demand for pleasant Sunday evening musical entertainments at reasonable prices, which have found so much favor with Music Hall patrons in recent years.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their first out-of-town concert at Lowell some time in November. The pretty opera house there, where the concerts are given, will celebrate the first anniversary of its opening at that time. This theatre is built on the same plans as the Tremont Theatre.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the Symphony orchestra conductor,—and the most popular one, both with his men and the public, Mr. Higginson has yet secured—arrived from his vacation in Europe last Saturday, and with Mrs. Nikisch and family is domiciled in a cosy house in Jamaica Plain which he has rented for the winter. As the absence of his household last year seemed to be the one thing wanting to Mr. Nikisch's perfect satisfaction and content, we shall look for a very happy-faced Symphony conductor on the opening night.

Home from the air of the Berkshire Hills and Newport, where the past week of glorious weather has been a panacea for every ill—love, ennui, dyspepsia and Christian science,—have the greater part of the society set returned, to be on hand for the unusual number of weddings of interest to the Boston and New York 400. And by another week the Symphony concerts will have started on their musical way and they, as well as the weddings, mark the beginning of the season in town, being essentially fashionable in character. Those who really love the autumn in the country will not be drawn hither by either of these allurements, however, and for them the warm tints which dot the hills, and the bracing air, will be paramount in attraction for weeks to come.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. 5t o 6

UNION HALL
(18 Boylston Street).

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Season tickets, with reserved seats, $6. Will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscriptions now open at Music Hall. 4t o 6

[14]

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 4, 1890.

THOUSANDS APPLAUD.

The Employes of the House of Jordan, Marsh & Co.

Enjoy the New American Opera, "Robin Hood," in Music Hall,

Through the Generosity of the Famous Firm—A Gala Night.

It was a generous tribute to the newest and most promising of American operas that filled Boston's Music Hall yesterday evening with an appreciative, delighted throng.

Two thousand strong, a regiment indeed of busy workers, witnessed the Bostonians' brilliant performance of "Robin Hood," through the liberality of the great business establishment which gives them employment—the house of Jordan, Marsh & Company.

In many ways, indeed, the cause of the best music has been befriended and advanced by this firm. The series of concert entertainments provided especially for employes in the hall of Messrs. Jordan, Marsh & Co.'s building was a unique offering, and greatly enjoyed.

If this was a high precedent for kindred establishments to follow, the world-famous firm has set the standard far higher by the great gathering which its generosity brought together last night.

American opera, interpreted by an American company! Surely such an enterprise merits the warmest encouragement; and it is to be hoped—although perhaps not to be confidently expected—that the example set so gloriously here in Boston will find followers and emulators elsewhere.

The field of native lyric works is not so well filled that a work like the "Robin Hood" of Reginald De Koven and Harry B. Smith should not find a warm welcome to our lyric stage. It is much to the credit of the Bostonians, and a signal proof of their enterprise, that this delightful opera should have found an honored place in their repertory. The score is a constant delight—the story full of interest, with the spirit of the days of glory of English yeomanry ever present. There is enough story to hold the auditor's interest, while wit and drollery enlivens its smooth and pleasant course throughout.

"Robin Hood" has been witnessed during the fortnight now closing by very appreciative audiences in Boston. But no higher compliment could be paid to its worth and (in the best sense of the phrase) its popular character than the

Enthusiastic Reception it Won

from the crowded assemblage—largely made up of the guests of Jordan, Marsh & Co.—last night. It was a triumph for the singers as well as the delightful opera—an occasion which will live long in the memory of all who participated, as well as in the recollection of those whose enterprise and liberality made this unique event possible.

"Where can one be happier than in the bosom of his family?" might well have been the gratifying reflection of Eben D. Jordan, as he sat surrounded by the other members of his firm, together with his most trusted lieutenants, upon the floor of the house, while all around the employees of his establishment, from cash boys up to the most trusted clerk were, saying complimentary things about his thoughtfulness of their pleasure, as well as his own interests.

At all events he looked remarkably contented throughout the evening, though something suspiciously like a blush mantled his cheek as he arose at the end of the first act for the purpose of taking a little trip around the hall and was greeted with something akin to a cyclone of applause.

He circulated about among the employes in the different departments, on the floor, and was greeted everywhere with a cordial "Good evening, Mr. Jordan," to which he responded to with a smile and a nod or a pleasant word, while here and there he sat down for a little chat with some especially respected member of the family.

When he returned to his seat, the orchestra had commenced the overture for the second act, but so great was the applause as his silvery head went down the aisle, that the music had to be interrupted for a few moments in order to give enthusiasm a chance to spend itself.

Of course one of the chief elements of delight to the heart of the masculine auditor was the presence of such an army of charming young women in the audience (for where can one find more pretty girls to the square yard than in the famous bazaar of Jordan, Marsh & Co.?), and they were all there—to the eye, at least, outnumbering the men about six to one, and altogether they helped to make as interesting an audience as one could wish to see. They came in squads of from one to a dozen, those with escorts as a rule arriving early, for as a place wherein to snuggle up close and whisper soft nothings the seats in Music Hall are not to be sneezed at.

Of course the little feminine groups who came unattended indulged in the inevitable gossip and chatter in the lobby before entering and created the usual little flurry upon reaching the patient ticket taker, when a fallen glove or a missing ticket or opera glass would create just flutter enough to keep up the character of the sex. Every one had on her and many of them would have done credit to the Back Bay for taste displayed in toilets. Those of limited means showed the girlish tact by the furbishing up of their [illegible] dresses with here and there a bit of lace or a colored ribbon, which has a wonderful effect when applied with a proper eye.

Best Bib and Tucker,

Of course their necks were like the swans', their hands like lilies, their eyes like diamonds. They gazed with wondering eyes, laughed their little gurgling laughs, and so on, just as bewitchingly as the society bud who only goes to the opera when she can hear "Wagner."

The cash boys and girls were in the balconies, where they could see better and hear quite as well as in the more aristocratic seats, and the expression of appreciation on their faces was the best possible compliment, alike to the artists and the hosts of the evening. There were encores galore, and it would be safe to say that the Bostonians never played before an audience which tasked their powers of endurance more by means of calls for repetitions of the most charming numbers of the opera.

The manner in which the great audience retired to their homes was something that could not be seen in many cities, and was a gratifying compliment to the independence of Boston lady clerks and the [illegible] which they inspire; for [illegible]

[illegible] journey alone, with [illegible] they would show in making their [illegible] journey to business.

The mother, so conspicuous at the ordinary price of amusement, was entirely absent, and, so far as appearances indicated, it might have been the dismissal of a Sunday evening meeting.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 5, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts---Outline of the Programme.

The arrival of Mr. Arthur Nikisch upon the scene of his season's labors as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has made Music Hall again a busy place for all associated in the management of this great organization. The men of the orchestra were called together early in the week, and many hours of work have already been given to the preparation of the opening programmes. There have been very few changes in the make-up of the band since last season, and so the conductor has his orchestra well informed in regard to his methods, and fully prepared to accomplish the best results in their season's work. Mr. Nikisch returns to his duties in the best of health, full of enthusiasm, and well informed as to the demands of American audiences. During his vacation he has carefully considered his programmes for the season, and he has been kind enough to furnish the following list of compositions as making the basis of the season's concert scheme:

Bethoven—Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish Chorus and Priests. March from the "Ruins of Athens."
Schuman—Symphonies D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."
Schubert—Symphonies C major and the unfinished.
Mendelssohn—Scotch symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture "Ruy Blas."
Brahms—Symphonies D major and E minor. "Academic Overture," "Hungarian Dances."
Raff—Symphony "Im Walde" (in the woods).
Berlioz—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benevenuto Cellina."
Volkmann—Symphony D minor. Overture "Richard III."
Mozart—Jupiter Symphony.
Hayden—Symphonies D maj. and E flat major.
Dvorak—Symphony D minor. Scherzo capriccioso D major.
Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus), Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz," "Rakoczy March."
Wagner—"Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzett of the Rhine Daughters," "Funeral March," "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell," "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture." "Kaiser March," Paris version of "Tannhauser."
Tschaikowsky—Symphonic, second and third movements of fourth symphony. F minor, serenade for strings, C major, "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
Moszkowski—Suite in F major.
Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major.
Cherubini—Abenierages overture.
Chadwick—Symphony B flat.
R. Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.
Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus."
Svendsen—"Carnival in Paris."
A. Bruckner—"Te Deum" for solo, chorus and orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch states that, in addition to the above list, he has in contemplation the production of several novelties by Saint-Saens, Villers Stanford, Mackenzie and others, all going to make a most attractive outlook for the season's concerts. He frankly admits the difficulty at present of securing solo artists suited to fill the demands of the symphony patrons, but anticipates being able to give satisfaction in this part of the concert scheme before the season is far advanced. Among the engagements of soloists now made are Mrs. Clara Poole-King, Mr. William J. Winch, Theodore Reichmann and Mr. E. A. Macdowel, and negotiations are pending with a number of other singers and pianists. The first public rehearsal occurs next Friday afternoon, and, although every reserved seat was sold at the auction, the entire upper balcony and all available standing room will be free to holders of admission tickets, as usual. The first concert follows on Saturday evening, and for these occasions the programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Hebrides" ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for two violins ..... Bach
Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) ..... Beethoven

This programme has been selected to be played in memory of the late Otto Dresel.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders' Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

The Kneisel quartet give six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall, where subscribers can select their seats next Friday morning.

The sale of seats for Agnes Huntington's first week at the Broadway Theatre, New York, beginning tomorrow evening, is very large, and rapidly increasing. Every place

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 5, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.
Season tickets with reserved seats for the series $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL.
(18 Boylston st.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

On Monday Evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscription now open

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet will give six concerts of chamber music in Union Hall, on Monday nights, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Season tickets, with reserved seats, will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, on Friday morning. Subscription list now open at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday nights, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets will be for sale at the University Bookstore on Saturday morning.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun rehearsals for the season. There are a few changes in the membership. Among the first violins are two new men, Messrs. Straube and Hofman. The first horn player is A. Hackeboth, who has been in the New York Philharmonic and Thomas's Orchestra, and who replaces Mr. Reiter. A new drum player is Mr. Ludwig. At the first concert, next Saturday night, Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler will play a double concerto for violins, by Bach, and at the second Theodor Reichman of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 6, 1890.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1890.

SOME SYMPHONY PROMISES.

Choral Work to Supplement Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Offerings.

A pleasant addition to the expected features of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the engagement of a large chorus to assist in the presentation of certain notable works on Mr. Nikisch's programme. The arrangements for the series provide for not a few novelties. Besides those mentioned in the following scheme there are to be expected a series of novelties and compositions by Saint-Saens, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie and others.

Beethoven—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish chorus and priests' march, from the "Ruins of Athens."
Schumann—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred."
Schubert—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished.
Mendelssohn—Scotch symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas."
Brahms—Symphonies, D major and E minor. Academic overture, Hungarian dances.
Raff—Symphony (In the Woods).
Berlioz—Symphony fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Volkmann—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III."
Mozart—"Jupiter" symphony.
Haydn—Symphonies, D major and E flat major.
Dvorak—Symphony, D minor. Scherzo cappriccioso, D major.
Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus). Tasso. "Mephisto Waltz." "Rackoczy March."
Wagner—"Twilight of the Gods," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March."
"Parsifal," prelude, and "Good Friday Spell." "Siegfried Idyll." "Faust" overture. "Kaiser March." Paris version of "Tannhauser."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony, second and third movements of fourth symphony, F minor. Serenade for strings, C major. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
Moszkowski—Suite in F major.
Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major.
Cherubini—"Abencerages" overture.
Chadwick—Symphony, B flat.
Richard Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's.
Goldmark—Overture "Prometheus."
Svendsen—"Carnival in Paris."
Anton Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

A series of six subscription concerts will be given in Union Hall, 18 Boylston st., by the Kneisel quartet on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 19 and March 9. The subscription is now open at Music Hall, where subscribers can secure their seats next Friday morning.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Arthur Nikisch, will give a series of eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets go on sale at the University book store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning at 8 o'clock.

——Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the Symphony orchestra conductor—and the most popular one, both with his men and the public, that Mr. Higginson has yet secured—arrived from his vacation in Europe last Saturday, and with Mrs. Nikisch and family is domiciled in a cosy house in Jamaica Plain, which he has rented for the winter. As the absence of his household last year seemed to be the one thing wanting in Mr. Nikisch's perfect satisfaction and content, we shall look for a very happy-faced Symphony conductor on the opening night.

The first of the Sunday night popular concerts at Music Hall is unavoidably postponed until the 19th inst., when a very attractive programme will be presented.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.
Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 a. m. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL,
(18 Boylston St.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

On Monday Evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats, for the series, $6. Will be sold to Subscribers Only at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. Subscription now open at Music Hall. 4 1t

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will consist of eight performances on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets for these concerts will go on sale at the University Book Store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.
Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 a. m. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

UNION HALL.
(18 Boylston Street.)

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTETTE

On Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9.
Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

THE BOSTONIAN.

OCT. 3, 1890.

Arrangements have been made to resume the Sunday evening popular concerts at Music hall on October 12, and a strong list of attractions will be offered during the fall and winter months. The concerts will be maintained with a view to supplying the demand for pleasant Sunday evening musical entertainments at reasonable prices, which have found so much favor with Music Hall patrons in recent years.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their first out-of-town concert at Lowell some time in November. The pretty opera house there, where the concerts are given, will celebrate the first anniversary of its opening at that time. This theatre is built on the same plans as the Tremont Theatre.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the Symphony orchestra conductor,—and the most popular one, both with his men and the public, Mr. Higginson has yet secured — arrived from his vacation in Europe last Saturday, and with Mrs. Nikisch and family is domiciled in a cosy house in Jamaica Plain which he has rented for the winter. As the absence of his household last year seemed to be the one thing wanting to Mr. Nikisch's perfect satisfaction and content, we shall look for a very happy-faced Symphony conductor on the opening night.

Home from the air of the Berkshire Hills and Newport, where the past week of glorious weather has been a panacea for every ill — love, ennui, dyspepsia and Christian science, — have the greater part of the society set returned, to be on hand for the unusual number of weddings of interest to the Boston and New York 400. And by another week the Symphony concerts will have started on their musical way and they, as well as the weddings, mark the beginning of the season in town, being essentially fashionable in character. Those who really love the autumn in the country will not be drawn hither by either of these allurements, however, and for them the warm tints which dot the hills, and the bracing air, will be paramount in attraction for weeks to come.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE,
CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.
Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. 5t o 6

UNION HALL
(18 Boylston Street).

Six Subscription Concerts by the

KNEISEL QUARTET,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Season tickets, with reserved seats, $6. Will be sold to subscribers only, at Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. Subscriptions now open at Music Hall. 4t o 6

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

with assistance of

EMINENT SOLOISTS,

will give a series of

EIGHT CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 16th, November 6th, December 4th, 1890, January 8th and 29th, February 19th, March 19th and April 16th, 1891.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, October 11th.

Sale opens at eight A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

176 & 178 WESTMINSTER ST.

CARE M. STEINERT & SONS, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

1890.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the series of Six Concerts to be given by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in Infantry Hall, Providence, on the evenings of October 21, November 19, December 17, 1890, January 21, March 4, and April 7, 1891.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the six Concerts, $5.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

Plans of the Boston Symphony—Choral and Chamber Music.

New Philharmonic Orchestra—Last Word About Worcester.

The musical season of 1890-91 is big with promise. Mr. Nikisch states that, in addition to the list published in Saturday's Traveller, he has in contemplation the production of several novelties by Saint-Saëns, Villers Sanford and Mackenzie. He will also recognize the American composer. That Mr. Nikisch intends having a chorus is cause for pleasant anticipation. Among the engagements of soloists already made are Mrs. Clara Poole-King, Mr. William J. Winch, Theodor Reichmann and Mr. E. A. MacDowell; negotiations are pending with a number of other singers and artists. The first public rehearsal occurs next Friday afternoon, and, although every reserved seat was sold at the auction, the entire upper balcony and all available standing room will be given to holders of admission tickets, as usual. The first concert follows on Saturday evening; for these occasions the programme is:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for two violins.....Bach
Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven

This programme has been selected to be played in memory of the late Otto Dresel.

The Kneisel Quartet give six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be numbered among the soloists. Among the other artists already engaged for these concerts are Mrs. Julie Wyman, Theodor Reichmann, Ernst Perabo, Carl Faelten and Arthur Whiting.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19, and April 16. Season tickets will be held at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, next

---

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 7, 1890

HERE IN BOSTON.

I am glad to hear that the first Symphony concert of the season is to be dedicated by Mr. Higginson to the memory of Otto Dresel. This is a thoughtful and merited tribute to the services of that lamented artist to the higher musical culture of the city. Mr. Dresel himself cared little for fame; all his work was done from a sense of duty to himself and to the art of which he was such an earnest votary. But he had that appreciation of the good opinion of those whose opinion was worth having which made him pleased with the recognition that his labors had from the best authorities on music in this community. He would have been touched by the kindly tribute of Mr. Higginson.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON at 2:30, SATURDAY EVENING at 8.

SOLOISTS:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Programme—Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for two violins, J. S. Bach; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.

A limited number of admission tickets for both performances now on sale.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Subscribers to the series of six concerts at Union Hall can secure their season tickets at the Box Office, Music Hall, this (Friday) morning at 9 o'clock.

The Kneisel Quartet OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2nd Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

Season of 1890-91.

JOHN A. LOWELL & CO., BOSTON.

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

—IN—

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET,

—ON—

MONDAY EVENINGS,

October 20th, November 24th, December 29th, 1890,
January 26th, February 16th and March 9th, 1891.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MRS. JULIE E. WYMAN,
MR. THEODOR REICHMANN,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. CARL FAELTEN,
MR. ARTHUR WHITING.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, six dollars, will be sold to Subscribers Only, at the Box Office, Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10th, at 9 A. M.

Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

with assistance of

EMINENT SOLOISTS.

will give a series of

EIGHT CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 16th, November 6th, December 4th, 18th, January 8th and 29th, February 19th, March 19th and April 16th, 1891.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, October 11th.

Sale opens at eight A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

176 & 178 WESTMINSTER ST.

CARE M. STEINERT & SONS, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

1890.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the series of Six Concerts to be given by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in Infantry Hall, Providence, on the evenings of October 21, November 19, December 17, 1890, January 21, March 4, and April 7, 1891.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the six Concerts, $5.

Name.

Address.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1890.

Plans of the Boston Symphony—Choral and Chamber Music.

New Philharmonic Orchestra—Last Word About Worcester.

The musical season of 1890-91 is big with promise. Mr. Nikisch states that, in addition to the list published in Saturday's Traveller, he has in contemplation the production of several novelties by Saint-Saëns, Villers Sanford and Mackenzie. He will also recognize the American composer. That Mr. Nikisch intends having a chorus is cause for pleasant anticipation. Among the engagements of soloists already made are Mrs. Clara Poole-King, Mr. William J. Winch, Theodor Reichmann and Mr. E. A. MacDowell; negotiations are pending with a number of other singers and pianists. The first public rehearsal occurs next Friday afternoon, and, although every reserved seat was sold at the auction, the entire upper balcony and all available standing room will be free to holders of admission tickets, as usual. The first concert follows on Saturday evening; for these occasions the programme is:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for two violins.....Bach
Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven

This programme has been selected to be played in memory of the late Otto Dresel.

The Kneisel Quartet give six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be numbered among the soloists. Among the other artists already engaged for these concerts are Julie Wyman, Theodor Reichmann, Ernst Perabo, Carl Faelten and Arthur Whiting.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19, and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 7, 1890

HERE IN BOSTON.

I am glad to hear that the first Symphony concert of the season is to be dedicated by Mr. Higginson to the memory of Otto Dresel. This is a thoughtful and merited tribute to the services of that lamented artist to the higher musical culture of the city. Mr. Dresel himself cared little for fame; all his work was done from a sense of duty to himself and to the art of which he was such an earnest votary. But he had that appreciation of the good opinion of those whose opinion was worth having which made him pleased with the recognition that his labors had from the best authorities on music in this community. He would have been touched by the kindly tribute of Mr. Higginson.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1890.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS,

On Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.
Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $6, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 11. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
FRIDAY AFTERNOON at 2:30, SATURDAY EVENING at 8.
SOLOISTS:
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.
Programme—Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for two violins, J. S. Bach; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.
A limited number of admission tickets for both performances now on sale.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Subscribers to the series of six concerts at Union Hall can secure their season tickets at the Box Office, Music Hall, this (Friday) morning at 9 o'clock.

The Kneisel Quartet OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2nd Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

Season of 1890-91.

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

—IN—

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET,

—ON—

MONDAY EVENINGS,

October 20th, November 24th, December 29th, 1890,
January 26th, February 16th and March 9th, 1891.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MRS. JULIE E. WYMAN,
MR. THEODOR REICHMANN,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. CARL FAELTEN,
MR. ARTHUR WHITING.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, six dollars, will be sold to Subscribers Only, at the Box Office, Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10th, at 9 A. M.

Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tuesday Evening, Oct. 21,
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 19, 1890
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 17,
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 21,
1891 Wednesday Evening, Mar. 4,
Tuesday Evening, April 7.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 9, 1890.

The Symphony concerts begin this week, the first rehearsal being appointed for Friday afternoon, the first concert for Saturday evening. The programme Mr. Nikisch finally selected is arranged as a memorial of Otto Dresel. It is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for two Violins, in D minor, Bach (Messrs. Franz Kneisel and C. M. Loeffler); Symphony No. 3 (Heroic) Beethoven.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning. Mr. Franz Rummel, pianist, will be the soloist at the first concert.

Subscribers for Kneisel Quartet tickets should enter their names this week at Music Hall. The concerts will be given in Union Hall, with a strong corps of soloists, including Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LET us hope that Herr Nikisch will have his symphony orchestra play the Kreutzer Sonata at one of this winter's concerts, if for nothing else than to show these people who say to you, jokingly, "O, by the way, can you play the Kreutzer Sonata"? that they are not so smart as they think they are.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 10, 1890

FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give its first performance of the season at Music Hall this afternoon. The programme includes the overture "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; concerto for two violins, Bach, and the "Ervica" Symphony, Beethoven. Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler are the soloists.

The Cambridge Tribune

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890.

The sale of tickets for the eight symphony concerts to be given at Sanders theatre will open this morning at Sever's bookstore, at 8 o'clock. Persons desiring a choice of seats will do well to be on hand early.

Home Journal.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890

To-night the musical season opens in earnest, and all Boston will look its best as it sits up very straight and applauds Mr. NIKISCH, and looks intense and wise. Society has had a long rest from its duty to music. But Boston society seems always able to get up the proper amount of excitement about classical music when the cues are given in a sufficiently fashionable tone.

Boston Post

SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 11, 1890

The second regular Sunday night concert by the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann's direction will take place tomorrow evening at the Boston Theatre. The programme includes Adamé's delightful overture to "Si j'étais roi," Moszkowski's "Cortege," Grieg's favorite string suite "Peer Gynt," and selections from Gounod, Strauss, Steck and Langey. Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing arias from operas of Gretry and Herold. Mr. Felix Winternitz will play Ernst's "Otello" Fantasie. The concert begins promptly at 7:45.

.....

The first of the eight concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place Thursday evening, Oct. 16. The programme is as follows: Mezart's G minor symphony, Paganini's "Perpetuum Mobile" (played by all the violins), and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Franz Rummel will play Beethoven's E flat pianoforte concerto.

.....

Season tickets for the six subscription concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartette on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9, are now for sale at Music Hall. Mr. Theodore Reichmann will be the soloist at the first concert, and he will sing songs by Schumann.

.....

The Adamowski Quartette will give three concerts on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
FRIDAY AFTERNOON at 2:30,
SATURDAY EVENING at 8.
SOLOISTS:
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.
Programme—Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Two Violins, J. S. Bach; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.
A limited number of admission tickets for both performances now on sale.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Cambridge Concerts.
Sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Book store, Cambridge, this (Saturday) morning, at 8 o'clock.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE!
SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—IN—
UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET
On Monday evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, February 16, and March 9, 1891.
Assisting Artists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Arthur Whiting.
Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, six dollars, now on sale at Music Hall.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11TH, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIRST CONCERT.

The musicians' new-year, so far as Boston and vicinity is concerned, may not inappropriately be regarded as commencing last evening when the tenth series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra opened in Music hall. The concert, which was in memoriam of Otto Dresel, had for its programme the following classics:

Mendelssohn—Overture "Fingal's Cave."

Bach—Concerto in D minor for two violins, orchestra and strings.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat.

Arthur Nikisch, conductor. Soloists: Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

It seemed somewhat dolefully true that the above selection would have been one of the late Mr. Dresel's own choice, not that we simply bear in mind what a loyal devotee he was of the ultra-classic in musical art, but that he was never so fond of the ultra-classics as when they were in a minor key. He was a musical pessimist of the most pronounced type, an artist, 'tis true, and one who would have especially enjoyed just such a programme as last evening's. Not a single item of it was in itself below the highest artistic standard, and yet because of an unfortunate association as regards keys a needless amount of monotony was engendered and this was all the more intensified by the general slowness and excessive sentimentality of the conductor's readings.

In this respect the entire overture and the first two movements of the Symphony were tortuously exaggerated. If the reading of the Marcia funerbe of the Symphony had been intended as a mere mockery or a serio-comic travesty of sorrow and lamentation, it could not have been more successful. Nor did the orchestra play well together as regards unanimity of attack, etc., although such shortcomings might naturally have been anticipated for the first concert of a new season.

The very best feature of the occasion was with the masterly, refined and artistic playing of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler in the magnificent Bach concerto; otherwise the entire concert was an exceptionally monotonous affair and could not have honestly been enjoyed by the audience at large, although the plaudits were often loud and as may not untruthfully be added must have been quite as often insincere.

Buffalo wants to hold a music festival and Mr. Nikisch is mentioned as the probable conductor thereof.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick-Walker is to appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra at New Bedford, Oct. 27th. Mrs. Walker's dates are being rapidly filled for concert and oratorio work, and the season promises a busy one for this talented artist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch are temporarily at the United States hotel, awaiting the preparation of their Brookline house.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890.

What the Boston Symphony Orchestra will Play during the Coming Season.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has chosen the following works for production during the season of 1890–91:

Beethoven—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish Chorus and Priests' March, from the "Ruins of Athens;" Schumann—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred:" Schubert—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished; Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas;" Brahms—Symphonies, D major and E minor Academic overture, Hungarian Dances; Raff—Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods); Berlioz—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellina;" Volkman—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III.;" Mozart—"Jupiter" Symphony; Haydn—Symphonies, D major and E flat major; Dvorak—Symphony, D minor Scherzo cappriccioso, D major; Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus), Tasso, "Mephisto Waltz," "Rackoczy March; Wagner—"Götterdämmerung"—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March," "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell," "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," "Kaiser March," Paris version of "Tannhäuser;" Tschaikowsky—Symphony, second and third movements of Fourth Symphony, F minor, Serenade for strings, C major, Romeo and Juliet" overture; Moszkowski—Suite in F major; Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major; Cherubini—"Abencerages" overture; Chadwick—Symphony, B flat; Richard Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's; Goldmark—Overture "Prometheus;" Svendson—"Carnival in Paris;" and Anton Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11TH, 1890.

The season in Boston begins with the symphony concert of next week. Mr. Nikisch enters upon his second year as conductor of the orchestra with a very ambition to extend its influence and further its prestige. His programmes will be more eclectic than was the case last season; the classic Germans, of course, will not be forgotten. Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Mendelssohn are still the corner stone of our musical temple; but our twenty-four concerts admit a hearing of the world and its youth, its gay and severe. To continue the simile: We shall find this season, among the gay youth, Liszt, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Moszkowski, Goldmark, Svendsen and others; among the severe, Wagner, Dvorak, Bruckner, Chadwick, Stanford and Mackenzie. The Wagner list is especially attractive, while the proportion of novelties of all schools is strong. A choral adjunct will be provided for the performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer night's Dream" music, Schumann's "Manfred," Liszt's "Dante," Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a Te Deum of large dimensions by Anton Bruckner. As conductor of the opera at Leipzig, Mr. Nikisch wrought great things through his choristers, while his career as director of the Liszt Society was marked by extraordinary choral successes.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY.

A MEMORIAL CONCERT TO OTTO DRESEL—OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

How time flies! A few months ago probably a large majority of the attendants of the Symphony concerts were struggling bravely to maintain to the end of the season the same keen interest that its eventful opening had inspired, but with heavy odds against them, in the shape of the mental and physical fatigue incident to a winter of music in Boston, and the longings, provoked by a few of those glorious days of spring, for a change to the out-door life that warm weather makes possible. It is a matter of wonderment, when one stops to think of it, how easily the seasons work their will with us, so to say, forcing us, as they do, gently but irresistibly into a proper state of mind for the enjoyment of each as it comes around. This is plainly to be felt in connection with the Symphony concerts, since their long continuance and never-falling regularity enable us to gauge our feelings regarding them with far greater accuracy than would be possible if they came more desultorily. As has been said, last April—now seemingly yesterday—probably found most of us eager for the end of the season to come. Last evening, however, one had but to glance at the two thousand or more happy individuals, whose faces as a rule, bore the imprint of cheerful anticipation, to realize that no recollections of a summer in the country, however delightful, or of an autumn, however gorgeous, could detract in the least from their interest in what was to come to their ears and understanding in the course of the coming twenty odd Saturday nights to be devoted to the "Symphonies." Comment on the especial character of this opening concert is first due. Needless to say that it was of the kind that we are all willing should occur as seldom as possible. For, although we are all glad to do honor to the memory of a genius who has lived among us and who is now with us no longer, still we do not like to lose our strong men, however little we may sometimes show our appreciation of them, before they are taken away. Otto Dresel, for whom the programme was in memoriam, was one who had succeeded so well in keeping himself outside the knowledge of the youngest generation of musical Boston, that a perusal of the able and beautifully written article concerning him, by Mr. John S. Dwight,—that true-lover of his friends, as well as of art—must cause them at once, surprise and keen regret that so noble a disciple of music should have lived and died here, comparatively unknown to them. Older music-lovers will have the aid of many personal recollections as they read this tribute; and all our youngest musicians in particular, will without doubt receive from it the impression that such a life is well worth living and emulating. The programme, in accordance with the conservative spirit that Mr. Dresel ever maintained, included Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," a concerto in D minor for two violins, by Bach, and Beethoven's "Eroeia" symphony.

For various reasons, extended comment on its performance is unnecessary. While in the purely orchestral numbers there was ample evidence that our orchestra was still our orchestra, and that Mr. Nikisch was still Mr. Nikisch, there were also not infrequent indications that the temporary separation of the men during the summer had worked its "baleful spell," and that another week must elapse before the orchestra, as a whole, should get once more thoroughly into harness. Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler played the concerto, which was given for the first time in these concerts, with all the finish and comprehension that almost invariably characterize the work of these true artists, and their efforts were received with much applause. Mr. Nikisch, too, was greeted in the sincerest and heartiest fashion; and so the season has opened in earnest. T. P. CURRIER.

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tuesday Evening, Oct. 21,
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 19, 1890
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 17,
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 21,
1891 Wednesday Evening, Mar. 4,
Tuesday Evening, April 7.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 9, 1890.

The Symphony concerts begin this week, the first rehearsal being appointed for Friday afternoon, the first concert for Saturday evening. The programme Mr. Nikisch finally selected is arranged as a memorial of Otto Dresel. It is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for two Violins, in D minor, Bach (Messrs. Franz Kneisel and C. W. Loeffler); Symphony No. 3 (Heroic) Beethoven.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning. Mr. Franz Rummel, pianist, will be the soloist at the first concert.

Subscribers for Kneisel Quartet tickets should enter their names this week at Music Hall. The concerts will be given in Union Hall, with a strong corps of soloists, including Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LET us hope that Herr Nikisch will have his symphony orchestra play the Kreutzer Sonata at one of this winter's concerts, if for nothing else than to show these people who say to you, jokingly, "O, by the way, can you play the Kreutzer Sonata"? that they are not so smart as they think they are.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 10, 1890

FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give its first performance of the season at Music Hall this afternoon. The programme includes the overture "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; concerto for two violins, Bach, and the "Ervica" Symphony, Beethoven. Messrs. Kneisel and Laeffler are the soloists.

THE CAMBRIDGE-TRIBUNE

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890.

The sale of tickets for the eight symphony concerts to be given at Sanders theatre will open this morning at Sever's bookstore, at 8 o'clock. Persons desiring a choice of seats will do well to be on hand early.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890

To-night the musical season opens in earnest, and all Boston will look its best as it sits up very straight and applauds Mr. NIKISCH, and looks intense and wise. Society has had a long rest from its duty to music. But Boston society seems always able to get up the proper amount of excitement about classical music when the cues are given in a sufficiently fashionable tone.

Boston Post

SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 11, 1890

The second regular Sunday night concert by the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann's direction will take place tomorrow evening at the Boston Theatre. The programme includes Adams's delightful overture to "Si j'étais roi," Moszkowski's "Cortege," Grieg's favorite string suite "Peer Gynt," and selections from Gounod, Strauss, Steck and Langey. Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing arias from operas of Gretry and Herold. Mr. Felix Winternitz will play Ernst's "Otello" Fantasie. The concert begins promptly at 7:45.

.....

The first of the eight concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place Thursday evening, Oct. 16. The programme is as follows: Mezart's G minor symphony, Paganini's "Perpetuum Mobile" (played by all the violins), and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Franz Rummel will play Beethoven's E flat pianoforte concerto.

.....

Season tickets for the six subscription concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartette on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9, are now for sale at Music Hall. Mr. Theodore Reichmann will be the soloist at the first concert, and he will sing songs by Schumann.

.....

The Adamowski Quartette will give three concerts on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
FRIDAY AFTERNOON at 2:30,
SATURDAY EVENING at 8.
SOLOISTS:
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.
Programme—Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Two Violins, J. S. Bach; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.
A limited number of admission tickets for both performances now on sale.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Cambridge Concerts.

Sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Book store, Cambridge, this (Saturday) morning, at 8 o'clock.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—IN—
UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET

On Monday evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, February 16, and March 9, 1891.
Assisting Artists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Arthur Whiting.
Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, six dollars, now on sale at Music Hall.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIRST CONCERT.

The musicians' new-year, so far as Boston and vicinity is concerned, may not inappropriately be regarded as commencing last evening when the tenth series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra opened in Music hall. The concert, which was in memoriam of Otto Dresel, had for its programme the following classics:

Mendelssohn—Overture "Fingal's Cave."

Bach—Concerto in D minor for two violins, orchestra and strings.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat.

Arthur Nikisch, conductor. Soloists: Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

It seemed somewhat dolefully true that the above selection would have been one of the late Mr. Dresel's own choice, not that we simply bear in mind what a loyal devotee he was of the ultra-classic in musical art, but that he was never so fond of the ultra-classics as when they were in a minor key. He was a musical pessimist of the most pronounced type, an artist, 'tis true, and one who would have especially enjoyed just such a programme as last evening's. Not a single item of it was in itself below the highest artistic standard, and yet because of an unfortunate association as regards keys a needless amount of monotony was engendered and this was all the more intensified by the general slowness and excessive sentimentality of the conductor's readings.

In this respect the entire overture and the first two movements of the Symphony were tortuously exaggerated. If the reading of the Marcia funerbe of the Symphony had been intended as a mere mockery or a serio-comic travesty of sorrow and lamentation, it could not have been more successful. Nor did the orchestra play well together as regards unanimity of attack, letc., although such shortcomings might naturally have been anticipated for the first concert of a new season.

The very best feature of the occasion was with the masterly, refined and artistic playing of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler in the magnificent Bach concerto; otherwise the entire concert was an exceptionally monotonous affair and could not have honestly been enjoyed by the audience at large, although the plaudits were often loud and as may not untruthfully be added must have been quite as often insincere.

Buffalo wants to hold a music festival and Mr. Nikisch is mentioned as the probable conductor thereof.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick-Walker is to appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra at New Bedford, Oct. 27th. Mrs. Walker's dates are being rapidly filled for concert and oratorio work, and the season promises a busy one for this talented artist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch are temporarily at the United States hotel, awaiting the preparation of their Brookline house.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890.

What the Boston Symphony Orchestra will Play during the Coming Season.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has chosen the following works for production during the season of 1890–91:

Beethoven—Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. Dervish Chorus and Priests' March, from the "Ruins of Athens;" Schumann—Symphonies, D minor and C major. Music to "Manfred:" Schubert—Symphonies, C major and the unfinished; Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas;" Brahms—Symphonies, D major and E minor Academic overture, Hungarian Dances; Raff—Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods); Berlioz—Symphony Fantastique. Overture, "Benvenuto Cellina;" Volkman—Symphony, D minor. Overture, "Richard III.;" Mozart—"Jupiter" Symphony; Haydn—Symphonies, D major and E flat major; Dvorak—Symphony, D minor Scherzo cappriccioso, D major; Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus), Tasso, "Mephisto Waltz," "Rackoczy March; Wagner—"Götterdämmerung"—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," "Terzet of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral March," "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Friday Spell," "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," "Kaiser March," Paris version of "Tannhäuser;" Tschaikowsky—Symphony, second and third movements of Fourth Symphony, F minor, Serenade for strings, C major, Romeo and Juliet" overture; Moszkowski—Suite in F major; Robert Fuchs—Serenade for strings, D major; Cherubini—"Abencerages" overture; Chadwick—Symphony, B flat; Richard Heuberger—Variations on a theme of Schubert's; Goldmark—Overture "Prometheus;" Svendson—"Carnival in Paris;" and Anton Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, chorus and orchestra.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11TH, 1890.

The season in Boston begins with the symphony concert of next week. Mr. Nikisch enters upon his second year as conductor of the orchestra with every ambition to extend its influence and further its prestige. His programmes will be more eclectic than was the case last season; the classic Germans, of course, will not be forgotten. Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Mendelssohn are still the corner stone of our musical temple; but our twenty-four concerts admit a hearing of the world and its youth, its gay and severe. To continue the simile: We shall find this season, among the gay youth, Liszt, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Moszkowski, Goldmark, Svendsen and others; among the severe, Wagner, Dvorak, Bruckner, Chadwick, Stanford and Mackenzie. The Wagner list is especially attractive, while the proportion of novelties of all schools is strong. A choral adjunct will be provided for the performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer night's Dream" music, Schumann's "Manfred," Liszt's "Dante," Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a Te Deum of large dimensions by Anton Bruckner. As conductor of the opera at Leipzig, Mr. Nikisch wrought great things through his choristers, while his career as director of the Liszt Society was marked by extraordinary choral successes.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY.

A MEMORIAL CONCERT TO OTTO DRESEL—OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

How time flies! A few months ago probably a large majority of the attendants of the Symphony concerts were struggling bravely to maintain to the end of the season the same keen interest that its eventful opening had inspired, but with heavy odds against them, in the shape of the mental and physical fatigue incident to a winter of music in Boston, and the longings, provoked by a few of those glorious days of spring, for a change to the out-door life that warm weather makes possible. It is a matter of wonderment, when one stops to think of it, how easily the seasons work their will with us, so to say, forcing us, as they do, gently but irresistibly into a proper state of mind for the enjoyment of each as it comes around. This is plainly to be felt in connection with the Symphony concerts, since their long continuance and never-falling regularity enable us to gauge our feelings regarding them with far greater accuracy than would be possible if they came more desultorily. As has been said, last April—now seemingly yesterday—probably found most of us eager for the end of the season to come. Last evening, however, one had but to glance at the two thousand or more happy individuals, whose faces as a rule, bore the imprint of cheerful anticipation, to realize that no recollections of a summer in the country, however delightful, or of an autumn, however gorgeous, could detract in the least from their interest in what was to come to their ears and understanding in the course of the coming twenty odd Saturday nights to be devoted to the "Symphonies." Comment on the especial character of this opening concert is first due. Needless to say that it was of the kind that we are all willing should occur as seldom as possible. For, although we are all glad to do honor to the memory of a genius who has lived among us and who is now with us no longer, still we do not like to lose our strong men, however little we may sometimes show our appreciation of them, before they are taken away. Otto Dresel, for whom the programme was in memoriam, was one who had succeeded so well in keeping himself outside the knowledge of the youngest generation of musical Boston, that a perusal of the able and beautifully written article concerning him, by Mr. John S. Dwight,—that true-lover of his friends, as well as of art—must cause them at once, surprise and keen regret that so noble a disciple of music should have lived and died here, comparatively unknown to them. Older music-lovers will have the aid of many personal recollections as they read this tribute; and all our youngest musicians in particular, will without doubt receive from it the impression that such a life is well worth living and emulating. The programme, in accordance with the conservative spirit that Mr. Dresel ever maintained, included Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," a concerto in D minor for two violins, by Bach, and Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony.

For various reasons, extended comment on its performance is unnecessary. While in the purely orchestral numbers there was ample evidence that our orchestra was still our orchestra, and that Mr. Nikisch was still Mr. Nikisch, there were also not infrequent indications that the temporary separation of the men during the summer had worked its "baleful spell," and that another week must elapse before the orchestra, as a whole, should get once more thoroughly into harness. Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler played the concerto, which was given for the first time in these concerts, with all the finish and comprehension that almost invariably characterize the work of these true artists, and their efforts were received with much applause. Mr. Nikisch, too, was greeted in the sincerest and heartiest fashion; and so the season has opened in earnest. T. P. CURRIER.

[16]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

In Infantry Hall, Providence,

On the evenings of Tuesday, October 21st, Wednesday, November 19th, Wednesday, December 17th, 1890, Wednesday, January 21st, Wednesday, March 4th, and Tuesday, April 7th, 1891.

Mr. THEODOR REICHMANN and other eminent soloists will assist.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, Five Dollars.

Subscription now open at M. STEINERT & SONS, Piano Warerooms, 176 and 178 Westminster Street.

Subscription closes Tuesday evening, October 14th. Tickets will be delivered to subscribers only on Wednesday and Thursday, October 15th and 16th.

CHAS. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
OCTOBER 7, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become so well and favorably known in Providence that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

The management beg to renew the assurance that, as in the past, performances may be expected in every way worthy the attention and support of the musical public.

The best available soloists will appear at each concert, and sterling programmes will be presented.

As an aid to a complete understanding of the works to be performed, and to add to the enjoyment of patrons, analytical programmes in book form will be mailed in advance of each concert to subscribers for season tickets.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 9, 1890.

The Symphony concerts begin this week, the first rehearsal being appointed for Friday afternoon, the first concert for Saturday evening. The programme Mr. Nikisch finally selected is arranged as a memorial of Otto Dresel. It is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for two Violins, in D minor, Bach (Messrs. Franz Kneisel and C. W. Loeffler); Symphony No. 3 (Heroic) Beethoven.

The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will consist of eight performances, to be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. The sale of season tickets will be held at University bookstore, Cambridge, next Saturday morning. Mr. Franz Rummel, pianist, will be the soloist at the first concert.

Subscribers for Kneisel Quartet tickets should enter their names this week at Music Hall. The concerts will be given in Union Hall, with a strong corps of soloists, including Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LET us hope that Herr Nikisch will have his symphony orchestra play the Kreutzer Sonata at one of this winter's concerts, if for nothing else than to show these people who say to you, jokingly, "O, by the way, can you play the Kreutzer Sonata"? that they are not so smart as they think they are.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 10, 1890

FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give its first performance of the season at Music Hall this afternoon. The programme includes the overture "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; concerto for two violins, Bach, and the "Ervica" Symphony, Beethoven. Messrs. Kneisel and Laeffler are the soloists.

The Cambridge Tribune

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890.

The sale of tickets for the eight symphony concerts to be given at Sanders theatre will open this morning at Sever's bookstore, at 8 o'clock. Persons desiring a choice of seats will do well to be on hand early.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1890

To-night the musical season opens in earnest, and all Boston will look its best as it sits up very straight and applauds Mr. NIKISCH, and looks intense and wise. Society has had a long rest from its duty to music. But Boston society seems always able to get up the proper amount of excitement about classical music when the cues are given in a sufficiently fashionable tone.

Boston Post

SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 11, 1890

The second regular Sunday night concert by the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann's direction will take place tomorrow evening at the Boston Theatre. The programme includes Adams's delightful overture to "Si j'étais roi," Moszkowski's "Cortege," Grieg's favorite string suite "Peer Gynt," and selections from Gounod, Strauss, Steck and Langey. Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing arias from operas of Gretry and Herold. Mr. Felix Winternitz will play Ernst's "Otello" Fantasie. The concert begins promptly at 7:45.

.....

The first of the eight concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place Thursday evening, Oct. 16. The programme is as follows: Mezart's G minor symphony, Paganini's "Perpetuum Mobile" (played by all the violins), and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Franz Rummel will play Beethoven's E flat pianoforte concerto.

.....

Season tickets for the six subscription concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartette on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9, are now for sale at Music Hall. Mr. Theodore Reichmann will be the soloist at the first concert, and he will sing songs by Schumann.

.....

The Adamowski Quartette will give three concerts on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
FRIDAY AFTERNOON at 2:30,
SATURDAY EVENING at 8.
SOLOISTS:
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.
Programme—Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Two Violins, J. S. Bach; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.
A limited number of admission tickets for both performances now on sale.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Cambridge Concerts.

Sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Book store, Cambridge, this (Saturday) morning at 8 o'clock.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE!

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—IN—
UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET

On Monday evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, February 16, and March 9, 1891.
Assisting Artists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Arthur Whiting.
Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, six dollars, now on sale at Music Hall.

THE SYMPHONIES

FIRST CONCERT.

The musicians' new-year, so far as vicinity is concerned, may not inap be regarded as commencing last eve the tenth series of concerts by t Symphony orchestra opened in N The concert, which was in memoria Dresel, had for its programme the classics:

Mendelssohn—Overture "Fingal's

Bach—Concerto in D minor for t orchestra and strings.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E

Arthur Nikisch, conductor. Sol Franz Kneisel, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

It seemed somewhat dolefully tru above selection would have been late Mr. Dresel's own choice, not th ply bear in mind what a loyal devo of the ultra-classic in musical art, was never so fond of the ultra-classi they were in a minor key. He was pessimist of the most pronounce artist," 'tis true, and one who would ially enjoyed just such a program evening's. Not a single item of it w below the highest artistic standar because of an unfortunate asso regards keys a needless amount of was engendered and this was all th tensified by the general slowness an sentimentality of the conductor's

In this respect the entire overtu first two movements of the Symp tortuously exaggerated. If the rea Marcia funerbe of the Symphony ha tended as a mere mockery or a travesty of sorrow and lamentatio not have been more successful. N orchestra play well together as reg mity of attack, etc., although such mgs might naturally have been for the first concert of a new season

The very best feature of the o with the masterly, refined and artis of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler in t cent Bach concerto; otherwise the cert was an exceptionally monot and could not have honestly been the audience at large, although were often loud and as may not u be added must have been quite as cere.

Buffalo wants to hold a music f Mr. Nikisch is mentioned as the pr ductor thereof.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick-Walker is to the Boston Symphony orchestra a ford, Oct. 27th. Mrs. Walker's da rapidly filled for concert and ora and the season promises a busy talented artist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch are tempor United States hotel, awaiting the of their Brookline house.

AMERICAN ART JOU

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBE

What the Boston Symphony Orch Play during the Coming Sea

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has chosen lowing works for production during son of 1890–91:

Beethoven—Symphonies, Nos. 1, Dervish Chorus and Priests' Ma the "Ruins of Athens;" Schuman phonies, D minor and C major. "Manfred;" Schubert—Symphonies, and the unfinished; Mendelssohn Symphony. Music to "Midsumme Dream." Overture, "Ruy Blas;" B Symphonies, D major and E mino demic overture, Hungarian Dances; Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Berlioz—Symphony Fantastique. "Benvenuto Cellina;" Volkman—Sy D minor. Overture, "Richard Mozart—"Jupiter" Symphony; Hayd phonies, D major and E flat major; Symphony, D minor Scherzo capri major; Liszt—"Dante" (with chorus "Mephisto Waltz," "Rackoczy Wagner—"Götterdämmerung"—"S Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn," of the Rhinedaughters," "Funeral "Parsifal Vorspiel" and "Good Spell," "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust O "Kaiser March," Paris version o häuser;" Tschaikowsky—Symphony and third movements of Fourth Sym minor, Serenade for strings, C majo and Juliet" overture; Moszkowski—S major; Robert Fuchs—Serenade fo D major; Cherubini—"Abencerage ture; Chadwick—Symphony, B flat; Heuberger—Variations on a theme bert's; Goldmark—Overture "Prom Svendson—"Carnival in Paris;" an Bruckner—"Te Deum" for soli, ch orchestra.

[16]

[17]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 12.

The first Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon brought Boston musical feminality out in full force, and took up the threads of the rapture that were severed in the spring. As the girl-worshipped favorites of the orchestra appeared, many a thrill of emotion caused hearts to beat more rapidly, and many a sigh of relief to float upon the air. It was difficult for some of the artists to appear unaware of the flutter they occasioned among their adorers, but they bore themselves as well as could be expected under an ordeal that tried their self-consciousness to the uttermost. Giridom was supremely happy, and chattered in whispers, and smiled, and felt too blissful to be jealous of each other for worshipping the same dearly-beloved. That, however, will be remedied later, when the novelty of the thing has lost its first bloom. In the overflow of feeling that attended seeing the cherished objects of their young hearts, they forgot all about that "dear delicious old Bach," and that "lovely old Beethoven," when the rehearsal was over and could only compare notes about the more popular violinists and other cherished ones among the players. They could only observe with a little tremulousness of voice and sadness of manner that one of the fondly loved had grown stouter, that another looked paler than usual, that another had parted with the melancholy splendor of his eyes, and that still another had gone and cut off "that fascinating beard." By and by they will come round to the music, but just now they are too excited to descend from heart throbbings and their delicious associations to bald matters of fact. It is a blessed privilege of girls to pass through a young and sweet-silly stage of existence in which they find nutriment in the outpourings of innocent gush and extract stimulating ambrosia from the depths of make-believe. Do they ever cast a passing thought upon Colonel Higginson, the founder of these concerts, who has given them twenty-four blissful opportunities, forming in all thirty-six "perfectly delicious" hours for rapture, and feel grateful to him? Probably not. He is not in the orchestra, and the premiums paid for season tickets perhaps enter into a consideration of this aspect of the matter. But the girls were happy, many of them carried scores with them, some pretended to read them, and a few really did so. Those who failed to open them are to be excused in view of the excited state of their emotions for reasons already suggested. The rehearsals have begun and girldom has something of undying interest to talk about. Let us all rejoice!

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The first of this season's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night was listened to by a brilliant audience. Every seat was occupied, and on the lower floor every available standing place was filled. There was much enthusiasm at every stage of the performances. Mr. Nikisch, when he appeared to take his place at the conductor's stand, was welcomed with great cordiality, the applause being both vigorous and prolonged. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's familiar "Fingal's Cave" overture, to which Mr. Nickisch gave a new reading in several respects, notably in the startlingly slow pace at which he began it. It was a thoughtful interpretation, and probably a justifiable one, but its chief characteristic seemed to be a straining after new effects, and was somewhat spasmodic and disjointed as a whole. The orchestra played well, but not with that finish we may expect from it later when it has worked itself thoroughly into harness again. The overture was followed by a Bach concerto in D-minor for two violins and string orchestra. It was given for the first time in these concerts, and is interesting as an example of a style of concerto music that has passed away, and to be honored for the sake of its composer; but otherwise it is not especially edifying. The independance with which the two violins are made to play against each other shows Bach's characteristic skill, but the work is dry generally, except in the beautiful slow movement, which has a wonderfully fine theme exquisitely treated. The first movement has much of the style of a long violin exercise, and might have been ended in the middle or carried out to double its length for all the injury that would have been done to its form. The same may be said of the finale. A cadenza by Helmsberger was introduced in this movement and a fine cadenza it is, using Bach's themes with great cleverness and imparting to them an interest and a life that is rather lacking in the original treatment of them. This is probably heresy of the worst kind, but it must go for what it is worth. The solo parts were played by M. Franz Kneisel and Mr C. M Loeffler who were vigorously applauded when they stood up at their desks. Their playing was delightful in its finish its purity of style and its freedom from affectation. A more powerful tone and a more energetic fire might perhaps have been more in keeping with the character of the first movement and the finale, but the largo was exquisitely read and performed. They were rewarded with a storm of applause, which was fairly won and wholly deserved. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended the concert. On the whole it was broadly interpreted and well played, though here and there, notably in the Adagio, there were occasionally lack of precision and roughness in style. In the opening movement, Mr. Nikisch made some innovations in respect to the time which were more novel than happy in effect, but elsewhere his reading did not depart from the accepted form. The scherzo was given with especial brilliancy and crispness, the horn solos in the trio coming out with splendid clearness. The drummer's enthusiasm through the whole symphony was of the most demonstrative description, and the violence of his playing often verged on the ridiculous. It would be well to curb it in future performances. The concert was directed throughout by Mr. Nikisch without scores. For the next concert the programme is: Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony (new), and Brahms's second symphony in D. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore Reichmann, who will be heard in an aria and a group of songs.

The concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, which will be given in Music Hall, are to be six in number, and will take place on Monday evenings Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, and March 9. These concerts are always potent elements in the musical season, and were never stronger in the esteem and favor of our concert goers than they are at present. The subscription for season tickets is now open at Music Hall, and that they will be in eager demand is a foregone conclusion.

There are to be eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this season. The dates are Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets can be now procured at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

The Adamowski Quartette will give three concerts on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert Season Opened—At Dresel Memorial.

The orchestral season began Saturday evening with a memorial service, for the funeral march of the symphony and the Bach concerto were upon the list as reminders of the death of that stanch Bach warrior, who has so recently passed away from us—Otto Dresel. The concert began with an overture, not the famous "Dedication of the House" with which Mr. Henschel used regularly to usher in the musical season, but that most spontaneous of compositions, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," the first 20 bars of which he wrote on the spot pictured, in full orchestral score, and sent to his sister these measures containing the famous wave figure which is the foundation of the work. This figure lost nothing in the performance; it was shaded to perfection, and the parts were so well balanced that it was easily followed as it threaded its way through the different instruments. Altogether, a fine beginning of what promises to be a very interesting season.

The most delightful number of the programme was Bach's concerto for two violins and orchestra, although it is possible that some parts of it soared over the heads of some of the auditors, and were callously received. It will be a good thing if Bach's works are frequently heard in the programmes, for, although the breadth of a modern grand orchestra is not precisely what the sedate composer had in mind when he created his concertos, there is as much bias in the matter of Bach as in the appreciation of Wagner. Many take Bach on faith, as part of a creed, and are ready to swear by any work to which his name is appended, even if it bore them to death. Others push him aside to make room for modern musical passion. As a matter of fact, there is not a Wagnerian progression so audacious but that it has been anticipated by the ancient composer. The Beethoven anecdote relative to consecutive fifths ("I allow them!") might as fittingly be told of Bach, and anything bolder than the progression of the leading tone to the tonic below, as in "My heart ever faithful" cannot be found in modern scores. The violin concerto that was given at this concert is as rich in modulation, in play of fancy and in melody, as any work of the present, although the shape does not appeal as effectively to the auditor as the sonata-forms afterwards used by Beethoven and Brahms. If we could only think polyphonically nowadays we would be able to give Bach his due credit of melody, but as Hauptmann expressed it, our music has become vertical, and we can no longer appreciate all the beauty of the horizontal treatment. It would be difficult to imagine anything more beautiful than the slow movement of this concerto. The performance of this was something long to be remembered. Two better artists for this kind of work than Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler could not have been chosen. It is impossible to speak of one apart from the other. Here, if ever, the par nobile fratrum principle must be applied, and surely both of them may take delight in the fact that they have worthily celebrated the memory of a lover of Bach, and have probably created many more. The performance of artists and orchestra may be summed up as throughout cultured and intellectual, free from any attempt at sensational contrasts or popular "effects."

Much the same may be said of the performance of the heroic symphony which followed and which ended the programme. The reading was majestic enough, yet straightforward and free from bizarrerie. The new kettle-drummer made himself quite audible, but this was permissible, at least in the first movement. In this movement, at the end of the development where the horn enters with its false harmony, Mr. Nikisch wisely softened the string parts to an almost inaudible point, and allowed the horn to dominate the phrase; it certainly seems unnecessary to make the the outre effect more prominent than this, and spite of the ecstacies of Sir George Grove, there are those who still think the phrase a blemish rather than an added beauty. The funeral march could perhaps have borne more of tenderness, but received a good conservative reading, and if there was a trifle of irregularity here or there, it was no more than could have been expected in a first concert. The oboe was very effective in this, and so was the cello. It is interesting to note the sparing use of the former instrument; it is a weeping woman, but Beethoven regarded such a Niobe a little askance, as Thackeray did his lachrymose heroines, and causes the masculine grief of the cello to come to the foreground right speedily.

The scherzo was very crisply played, especially in the trio, where the three horns did excellent work. The movement is practically the first scherzo ever written, for the scherzo of the second symphony has all the flavor of the minuet school about it (the minuet of the first symphony is more of a scherzo), but in this the chattering hilarity of the true scherzo is present, and if, as Berlioz suggests, it represents the flippancy of a careless world, forgetting its hero, the clash of swords is not altogether absent from it either.

The finale is also of especial interest in the history of form, for it was the first attempt to do away with the joviality of the old symphonic ending, which was a weak heritage from the Gigue which ended the old Suite, and the use of grand variations as a counterpoise to the development of the first movement, also began with this work. The drummer again gave evidence that he was determined to fully earn his salary, but on the whole the movement was creditable enough for the beginning of the season. Mr. Nikisch was cordially welcomed both with plaudits and flowers.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

First Symphony Concert of the Season.

The 10th season of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was duly begun at Music Hall last evening, and again the well filled auditorium proved the strong hold these events have upon the Boston public of today. As a matter of record it may be well to re-state the fact that every seat in the hall, for the entire season of public rehearsals and concerts by this organization has been sold at the auction sale, or at the box office, so that the highest point of financial success for the enterprise has been reached. With the concert of last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch began his second season as conductor of the orchestra, and his entrance to take direction of the evening's programme called out a demonstration in his honor that proved beyond question his popularity with the patrons of these concerts. His greeting was a well merited tribute to the man who has so thoroughly identified himself with the interests of this Boston institution, and the courteous welcome was participated in by the musicians as well as the audience. In addition to the formal greeting thus extended, Mr. Nikisch received an elegant floral gift, in which his national colors found prominence.

The desire, on the part of the founder of the orchestra as well as of its conductor, to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of Mr. Otto Dresel, who was a warm personal friend of both these leaders in the Boston orchestra enterprise, caused the selection of a programme which hardly suited the occasion of such a musical reunion, but the gracious action in thus honoring such a champion of the cause of good music, can but be commended, however inappropriate a time was chosen for this event. A friendly hand added a beatiful tribute to the memory of Mr. Dresel by a floral decoration of the conductor's stand.

The programme book contained an admirable eulogy of the deceased, written by his friend and admirer, Mr. John S. Dwight, and his estimate of Mr. Dresel is worthy being quoted in connection with this record of the evening's event.

Otto Dresel, says Mr. Dwight, although he had his home among us almost 40 years, was not widely known. He was understood by very few. He was a man of genius. His devotion was to truth, to purity in art, to its divine ideals. He cared not much for popularity or fame. He sought the approbation of his own artistic conscience. He was unselfish and disinterested in the intensity of his aspiration and his striving after his ideal. His life in music became occupied more and more with the music of those masters who, in the nature of the case, never were and never can be popular. Especially his love of Bach and Handel grew year by year more absorbing and more satisfying and he has done more than any one else here to make others share it, always working in a private, unprofessing way. He was an artist of the finest temper, a teacher most inspiring, a loyal devotee to truth in musical art, uncompromisingly true himself to the highest ideal, a masterly interpreter of the best works of the greatest masters, an accompanist without equal, a leader in vocal as well as instrumental efforts, and a magnetic influence, winning all who came within his sphere to pure and noble heights in art. Music in Boston, in this country, is far more indebted to him than the mass of music-lovers are aware. He shrank from publicity and all self-advertisement. His work, his influence, was more and more confined to private select circles. He did not crave a public.

The selections made for the evening were Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingall's Cave"; Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica," all of which were favorite compositions with Mr. Dresel. The beauties of the Mendelssohn overture found a brilliant interpretation in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch, and all the strong contrasts were heightened with artistic results under his guidance. The Bach concerto is an unfamiliar work, which, however, shows the finest skill of this great master in all its movements, the second of which, the "largor," being a veritable musical gem, in which the two solo violins are made more prominent than in the opening "vivace" and final "allegro," the strings of the orchestra being used merely to supply the accompaniment. The solo parts were played by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, both of whom brought to this portion of the evening's work their most devoted and artistic efforts, giving a delightful hearing of the graceful movements. The great "Eroica" has rarely had a more satisfying performance than that given it last evening, and the audience was quick to appreciate at the good points made by Mr. Nikisch in his reading of this grand composition. For the concert of next Saturday evening the programme will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F (first time in Boston), Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, and an aria and songs by Mr. Theodor Reichmann.

The Boston Symphony orchestra loses the services of Mr. J. C. Mullaly in the first violin section this season, as Mr. Mullaly has been forced to resign his position by reason of the many calls upon his time by other professional duties.

The Kneisel quartet will give the usual series of six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, 1890, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9, 1891. The assisting artists will be: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, can be had at the box office, Music Hall.

Eight concerts are announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings during the season. The first of this series takes place next Thursday evening, when Mr. Franz Rummel, the distinguished pianist, will be heard for the first time in several years in this vicinity. The following is the programme: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; "Emperor" concerto for pianoforte, Beethoven; Perpetumon Mobile, Paganini (for all the violins); overture, "Oberon," Weber. Season tickets for these concerts are now on sale at the University bookstore, Cambridge.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1890.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of the series of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings.....Bach
Vivace. Largo. Finale (Allegro). Cadenza by Hellmesberger (first time in these concerts).
Symphony No. 3, in E flat, "Eroica".....Beethoven

This concert was dedicated to the memory of Otto Dresel, who, as Mr. Dwight says in his carefully considered sketch of the musician's life and works, was not widely known. For some time before his death he had lived in comparative retirement. He was seen at concerts; he was deeply interested in the "Bach Choir," and at the rehearsals he gave golden counsel to his singers. He was not before the public; he was not a public character; the careless concert-goer or the musician of the younger generation might then ask with reason why a Symphony concert should be devoted to his memory.

The peculiar influence he exerted can only be appreciated by those who knew him well. The public at large, even the so-called musical public, could not understand it. The reverential attention paid to the composer's text, the consideration of the proper reading of an antique appoggiatura, the proper beginning of an eighteenth century trill—what are these to your ordinary lover of music who applauds a virtuoso, although he may violate all rules, all traditions. The virtuoso startles the town, he bewilders the judgment, but only for an hour; if he exerts a real influence upon his hearers so that they are incited to imitate him, it is often to music's disadvantage. Mr. Dresel cared not for the applause of the crowd, for the fleeting reputation of a popular soloist. It was as though he had said with Walt Whitman, "Let who may exalt or startle or fascinate or soothe, I will have purposes as health or heat or snow has and be as regardless of observation." So he served his art and his city and well deserved the tribute paid his memory.

The programme chosen for the occasion was in nowise remarkable—it was a cut-and-dried, conventional obituary. In the Mendelssohn overture Mr Nikisch tried to gain effects by a novel reading of familiar passages; the composition, as a whole, lost thereby in symmetry, and it resembled more a potpourri than a coherent, well-proportioned work. The opening pages, on account of the slowness of the movement, became almost monotonous.

The concerto of Bach for two violins and string orchestra was exceedingly well played by the soloists, Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler. The concerto itself, with the exception of the charming largo and Heilmesberger's skilfully constructed cadenza, is tedious. Counterpoint is only interesting when the art with which it is written is concealed. Endless chains of passages in imitation soon become wearisome unless the attention is called away from the mere technical cunning of the composer. Dead men still rule us in the arts with imperious sway, and to even hint at the fact that the great masters were not always inspired seems to some as blasphemous as the conduct of Sydney Smith's friend, who ventured to speak disrespectfully of the equator. But the contrapuntal conventionalities of the past are as foreign to modern ears as the bravura airs of Händel. These men were great; they are still remembered in spite of the conventionalities of their time. Music changes with each generation, for it is subjective. The man of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is not the man of this nervous age, with its nervous diseases. The Bach of the concerto played Saturday evening is not the Bach of the "Passion," the "Well Tempered Clavichord," or the great compositions for the organ.

The symphony as a whole was well played, particularly the scherzo with its difficult horn passages. The liberties taken by the conductor in the first movement can easily be defended on musical grounds. Richard Wagner has written a long "explanation" of this symphony, in which he has succeeded in "darkening counsel by words." Such music as the "Heroic" symphony does not require explanation, and Wagner's attempt to explain what Beethoven meant is about as happy as that of the New York theatre manager who, about twenty years ago, "illustrated" the Pastoral Symphony by ballet girls and a real wheelbarrow. Hanslick said with truth that the real "hero" of the "Heroic Symphony" was Beethoven himself, and he is right in calling attention to the fact that this symphony as a whole does not express the heroic character as nobly as the C minor or the "Egmont" overture, in spite of its original dedication to Bonaparte. Let the reader of Wagner's description of the fourth movement note the fact that the varied theme of this movement was taken note for note from his ballet music to "Promotheus," and it also appears in his "contra dances"; what becomes of Wagner's description of the theme "as representing a firm, manly individuality, surrounded by all the softer and tenderer emotions," etc., ad nauseam?

Mr. Nikisch should moderate the rage of his fell drummer. In a well-balanced orchestra the kettledrums should not always force themselves upon the ear, nor should the personality of the player be the subject of general comment.

PHILIP HALE.

[17]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 12.

The first Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon brought Boston musical femininity ou in full force, and took up the threads of the rapture that were severed in the spring. As the girl-worshipped favorites of the orchestra appeared, many a thrill of emotion caused hearts to beat more rapidly, and many a sigh of relief to float upon the air. It was difficult for some of the artists to appear unaware of the flutter they occasioned among their adorers, but they bore themselves as well as could be expected under an ordeal that tried their self-consciousness to the uttermost. Girldom was supremely happy, and chattered in whispers, and smiled, and felt too blissful to be jealous of each other for worshipping the same dearly-beloved. That, however, will be remedied later, when the novelty of the thing has lost its first bloom. In the overflow of feeling that attended seeing the cherished objects of their young hearts, they forgot all about that "dear delicious old Bach," and that "lovely old Beethoven," when the rehearsal was over and could only compare notes about the more popular violinists and other cherished ones among the players. They could only observe with a little tremulousness of voice and sadness of manner that one of the fondly loved had grown stouter, that another looked paler than usual, that another had parted with the melancholy splendor of his eyes, and that still another had gone and cut off "that fascinating beard." By and by they will come round to the music, but just now they are too excited to descend from heart throbbings and their delicious associations to bald matters of fact. It is a blessed privilege of girls to pass through a young and sweet-silly stage of existence in which they find nutriment in the outpourings of innocent gush and extract stimulating ambrosia from the depths of make-believe. Do they ever cast a passing thought upon Colonel Higginson, the founder of these concerts, who has given them twenty-four blissful opportunities, forming in all thirty-six "perfectly 'licious" hours for rapture, and feel grateful to him? Probably not. He is not in the orchestra, and the premiums paid for season tickets perhaps enter into a consideration of this aspect of the matter. But the girls were happy, many of them carried scores with them, some pretended to read them, and a few really did so. Those who failed to open them are to be excused in view of the excited state of their emotions for reasons already suggested. The rehearsals have begun and girldom has something of undying interest to talk about. Let us all rejoice!

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The first of this season's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night was listened to by a brilliant audience. Every seat was occupied, and on the lower floor every available standing place was filled. There was much enthusiasm at every stage of the performances. Mr. Nikisch, when he appeared to take his place at the conductor's stand, was welcomed with great cordiality, the applause being both vigorous and prolonged. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's familiar "Fingal's Cave" overture, to which Mr. Nickisch gave a new reading in several respects, notably in the startlingly slow pace at which he began it. It was a thoughtful interpretation, and probably a justifiable one, but its chief characteristic seemed to be a straining after new effects, and was somewhat spasmodic and disjointed as a whole. The orchestra played well, but not with that finish we may expect from it later when it has worked itself thoroughly into harness again. The overture was followed by a Bach concerto in D-minor for two violins and string orchestra. It was given for the first time in these concerts, and is interesting as an example of a style of concerto music that has passed away, and to be honored for the sake of its composer; but otherwise it is not especially edifying. The independance with which the two violins are made to play against each other shows Bach's characteristic skill, but the work is dry generally, except in the beautiful slow movement, which has a wonderfully fine theme exquisitely treated. The first movement has much of the style of a long violin exercise, and might have been ended in the middle or carried out to double its length for all the injury that would have been done to its form. The same may be said of the finale. A cadenza by Helmsberger was introduced in this movement and a fine cadenza it is, using Bach's themes with great cleverness and imparting to them an interest and a life that is rather lacking in the original treatment of them. This is probably heresy of the worst kind, but it must go for what it is worth. The solo parts were played by M. Franz Kneisel and Mr C. M Loeller who were vigorously applauded when they stood up at their desks. Their playing was delightful in its finish its purity of style and its freedom from affectation. A more powerful tone and a more energetic fire might perhaps have been more in keeping with the character of the first movement and the finale, but the largo was exquisitely read and performed. They were rewarded with a storm of applause, which was fairly won and wholly deserved. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended the concert. On the whole it was broadly interpreten and well played, though here and there, notably in the Adagio, there were occasionally lack of precision and roughness in style. In the opening movement, Mr. Nikisch made some innovations in respect to the time which were more novel than happy in effect, but elsewhere his reading did not depart from the accepted form. The scherzo was given with especial brilliancy and crispness, the horn solos in the trio coming out with splendid clearness. The drummer's enthusiasm through the whole symphony was of the most demonstrative description, and the violence of his playing often verged on the ridiculous. It would be well to curb it in future performances. The concert was directed throughout by Mr. Nikisch without scores. For the next concert the programme is: Overture, "Richard III.,' Volkmann; two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony (new), and Brahms's second symphony in D. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore Reichmann, who will be heard in an aria and a group of songs.

The concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, which will be given in Music Hall, are to be six in number, and will take place on Monday evenings Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, and March 9. These concerts are always potent elements in the musical season, and were never stronger in the esteem and favor of our concert goers than they are at present. The subscription for season tickets is now open at Music Hall, and that they will be in eager demand is a foregone conclusion.

There are to be eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this season. The dates are Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16. Season tickets can be now procured at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

The Adamowski Quartette will give three concerts on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert Season Opened—At Dresel Memorial.

The orchestral season began Saturday evening with a memorial service, for the funeral march of the symphony and the Bach concerto were upon the list as reminders of the death of that stanch Bach warrior, who has so recently passed away from us—Otto Dresel. The concert began with an overture, not the famous "Dedication of the House" with which Mr. Henschel used regularly to usher in the musical season, but that most spontaneous of compositions, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," the first 20 bars of which he wrote on the spot pictured, in full orchestral score, and sent to his sister these measures containing the famous wave figure which is the foundation of the work. This figure lost nothing in the performance; it was shaded to perfection, and the parts were so well balanced that it was easily followed as it threaded its way through the different instruments. Altogether, a fine beginning of what promises to be a very interesting season.

The most delightful number of the programme was Bach's concerto for two violins and orchestra, although it is possible that some parts of it soared over the heads of some of the auditors, and were callously received. It will be a good thing if Bach's works are frequently heard in the programmes, for, although the breadth of a modern grand orchestra is not precisely what the sedate composer had in mind when he created his concertos, there is as much bias in the matter of Bach as in the appreciation of Wagner. Many take Bach on faith, as part of a creed, and are ready to swear by any work to which his name is appended, even if it bore them to death. Others push him aside to make room for modern musical passion. As a matter of fact, there is not a Wagnerian progression so audacious but that it has been anticipated by the ancient composer. The Beethoven anecdote relative to consecutive fifths ("I allow them!") might as fittingly be told of Bach, and anything bolder than the progression of the leading tone to the tonic below, as in "My heart ever faithful" cannot be found in modern scores. The violin concerto that was given at this concert is as rich in modulation, in play of fancy and in melody, as any work of the present, although the shape does not appeal as effectively to the auditor as the sonata-forms afterwards used by Beethoven and Brahms. If we could only think polyphonically nowadays we would be able to give Bach his due credit of melody, but as Hauptmann expressed it, our music has become vertical, and we can no longer appreciate all the beauty of the horizontal treatment. It would be difficult to imagine anything more beautiful than the slow movement of this concerto. The performance of this was something long to be remembered. Two better artists for this kind of work than Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler could not have been chosen. It is impossible to speak of one apart from the other. Here, if ever, the par nobile fratrum principle must be applied, and surely both of them may take delight in the fact that they have worthily celebrated the memory of a lover of Bach, and have probably created many more. The performance of artists and orchestra may be summed up as throughout cultured and intellectual, free from any attempt at sensational contrasts or popular "effects."

Much the same may be said of the performance of the heroic symphony which followed and which ended the programme. The reading was majestic enough, yet straightforward and free from bizarrerie. The new kettle-drummer made himself quite audible, but this was permissible, at least in the first movement. In this movement, at the end of the development where the horn enters with its false harmony, Mr. Nikisch wisely softened the string parts to an almost inaudible point, and allowed the horn to dominate the phrase; it certainly seems unnecessary to make the the outre effect more prominent than this, and spite of the ecstacies of Sir George Grove, there are those who still think the phrase a blemish rather than an added beauty. The funeral march could perhaps have borne more of tenderness, but received a good conservative reading, and if there was a trifle of irregularity here or there, it was no more than could have been expected in a first concert. The oboe was very effective in this, and so was the cello. It is interesting to note the sparing use of the former instrument; it is a weeping woman, but Beethoven regarded such a Niobe a little askance, as Thackeray did his lachrymose heroines, and causes the masculine grief of the cello to come to the foreground right speedily.

The scherzo was very crisply played, especially in the trio, where the three horns did excellent work. The movement is practically the first scherzo ever written, for the scherzo of the second symphony has all the flavor of the minuet school about it (the minuet of the first symphony is more of a scherzo), but in this the chattering hilarity of the true scherzo is present, and if, as Berlioz suggests, it represents the flippancy of a careless world, forgetting its hero, the clash of swords is not altogether absent from it either.

The finale is also of especial interest in the history of form, for it was the first attempt to do away with the joviality of the old symphonic ending, which was a weak heritage from the Gigue which ended the old Suite, and the use of grand variations as a counterpoise to the development of the first movement, also began with this work. The drummer again gave evidence that he was determined to fully earn his salary, but on the whole the movement was creditable enough for the beginning of the season. Mr. Nikisch was cordially welcomed both with plaudits and flowers.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

First Symphony Concert of the Season.

The 10th season of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was duly begun at Music Hall last evening, and again the well filled auditorium proved the strong hold these events have upon the Boston public of today. As a matter of record it may be well to re-state the fact that every seat in the hall, for the entire season of public rehearsals and concerts by this organization has been sold at the auction sale, or at the box office, so that the highest point of financial success for the enterprise has been reached. With the concert of last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch began his second season as conductor of the orchestra, and his entrance to take direction of the evening's programme called out a demonstration in his honor that proved beyond question his popularity with the patrons of these concerts. His greeting was a well merited tribute to the man who has so thoroughly identified himself with the interests of this Boston institution, and the courteous welcome was participated in by the musicians as well as the audience. In addition to the formal greeting thus extended, Mr. Nikisch received an elegant floral gift, in which his national colors found prominence.

The desire, on the part of the founder of the orchestra as well as of its conductor, to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of Mr. Otto Dresel, who was a warm personal friend of both these leaders in the Boston orchestra enterprise, caused the selection of a programme which hardly suited the occasion of such a musical reunion, but the gracious action in thus honoring such a champion of the cause of good music, can but be commended, however inappropriate a time was chosen for this event. A friendly hand added a beatiful tribute to the memory of Mr. Dresel by a floral decoration of the conductor's stand.

The programme book contained an admirable eulogy of the deceased, written by his friend and admirer, Mr. John S. Dwight, and his estimate of Mr. Dresel is worthy being quoted in connection with this record of the evening's event.

Otto Dresel, says Mr. Dwight, although he had his home among us almost 40 years, was not widely known. He was understood by very few. He was a man of genius. His devotion was to truth, to purity in art, to its divine ideals. He cared not much for popularity or fame. He sought the approbation of his own artistic conscience. He was unselfish and disinterested in the intensity of his aspiration and his striving after his ideal. His life in music became occupied more and more with the music of those masters who, in the nature of the case, never were and never can be popular. Especially his love of Bach and Handel grew year by year more absorbing and more satisfying and he has done more than any one else here to make others share it, always working in a private, unprofessing way. He was an artist of the finest temper, a teacher most inspiring, a loyal devotee to truth in musical art, uncompromisingly true himself to the highest ideal, a masterly interpreter of the best works of the greatest masters, an accompanist without equal, a leader in vocal as well as instrumental efforts, and a magnetic influence, winning all who came within his sphere to pure and noble heights in art. Music in Boston, in this country, is far more indebted to him than the mass of music-lovers are aware. He shrank from publicity and all self-advertisement. His work, his influence, was more and more confined to private select circles. He did not crave a public.

The selections made for the evening were Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingall's Cave"; Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica," all of which were favorite compositions with Mr. Dresel. The beauties of the Mendelssohn overture found a brilliant interpretation in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch, and all the strong contrasts were heightened with artistic results under his guidance. The Bach concerto is an unfamiliar work, which, however, shows the finest skill of this great master in all its movements, the second of which, the "largor," being a veritable musical gem, in which the two solo violins are made more prominent than in the opening "vivace" and final "allegro," the strings of the orchestra being used merely to supply the accompaniment. The solo parts were played by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, both of whom brought to this portion of the evening's work their most devoted and artistic efforts, giving a delightful hearing of the graceful movements. The great "Eroica" has rarely had a more satisfying performance than that given it last evening, and the audience was quick to appreciate at the good points made by Mr. Nikisch in his reading of this grand composition. For the concert of next Saturday evening the programme will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F (first time in Boston), Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, and an aria and songs by Mr. Theodor Reichmann.

The Boston Symphony orchestra loses the services of Mr. J. C. Mullaly in the first violin section this season, as Mr. Mullaly has been forced to resign his position by reason of the many calls upon his time by other professional duties.

The Kneisel quartet will give the usual series of six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, 1890, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9, 1891. The assisting artists will be: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, can be had at the box office, Music Hall.

Eight concerts are announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings during the season. The first of this series takes place next Thursday evening, when Mr. Franz Rummel, the distinguished pianist, will be heard for the first time in several years in this vicinity. The following is the programme: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; "Emperor" concerto for pianoforte, Beethoven; Perpetumon Mobile, Paganini (for all the violins); overture, "Oberon," Weber. Season tickets for these concerts are now on sale at the University bookstore, Cambridge.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1890.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of the series of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings.....Bach
Vivace. Largo. Finale (Allegro). Cadenza by Hellmesberger (first time in these concerts).
Symphony No. 3, in E flat, "Eroica".....Beethoven

This concert was dedicated to the memory of Otto Dresel, who, as Mr. Dwight says in his carefully considered sketch of the musician's life and works, was not widely known. For some time before his death he had lived in comparative retirement. He was seen at concerts; he was deeply interested in the "Bach Choir," and at the rehearsals he gave golden counsel to his singers. He was not before the public; he was not a public character; the careless concert-goer or the musician of the younger generation might then ask with reason why a Symphony concert should be devoted to his memory.

The peculiar influence he exerted can only be appreciated by those who knew him well. The public at large, even the so-called musical public, could not understand it. The reverential attention paid to the composer's text, the consideration of the proper reading of an antique appoggiatura, the proper beginning of an eighteenth century trill—what are these to your ordinary lover of music who applauds a virtuoso, although he may violate all rules, all traditions. The virtuoso startles the town, he bewilders the judgment, but only for an hour; if he exerts a real influence upon his hearers so that they are incited to imitate him, it is often to music's disadvantage. Mr. Dresel cared not for the applause of the crowd, for the fleeting reputation of a popular soloist. It was as though he had said with Walt Whitman, "Let who may exalt or startle or fascinate or soothe, I will have purposes as health or heat or snow has and be as regardless of observation." So he served his art and his city and well deserved the tribute paid his memory.

The programme chosen for the occasion was in nowise remarkable—it was a cut-and-dried, conventional obituary. In the Mendelssohn overture Mr. Nikisch tried to gain effects by a novel reading of familiar passages; the composition, as a whole, lost thereby in symmetry, and it resembled more a potpourri than a coherent, well-proportioned work. The opening pages, on account of the slowness of the movement, became almost monotonous.

The concerto of Bach for two violins and string orchestra was exceedingly well played by the soloists, Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler. The concerto itself, with the exception of the charming largo and Heilmesberger's skilfully constructed cadenza, is tedious. Counterpoint is only interesting when the art with which it is written is concealed. Endless chains of passages in imitation soon become wearisome unless the attention is called away from the mere technical cunning of the composer. Dead men still rule us in the arts with imperious sway, and to even hint at the fact that the great masters were not always inspired seems to some as blasphemous as the conduct of Sydney Smith's friend, who ventured to speak disrespectfully of the equator. But the contrapuntal conventionalities of the past are as foreign to modern ears as the bravura airs of Händel. These men were great; they are still remembered in spite of the conventionalities of their time. Music changes with each generation, for it is subjective. The man of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is not the man of this nervous age, with its nervous diseases. The Bach of the concerto played Saturday evening is not the Bach of the "Passion," the "Well Tempered Clavichord," or the great compositions for the organ.

The symphony as a whole was well played, particularly the scherzo with its difficult horn passages. The liberties taken by the conductor in the first movement can easily be defended on musical grounds. Richard Wagner has written a long "explanation" of this symphony, in which he has succeeded in "darkening counsel by words." Such music as the "Heroic" symphony does not require explanation, and Wagner's attempt to explain what Beethoven meant is about as happy as that of the New York theatre manager who, about twenty years ago, "illustrated" the Pastoral Symphony by ballet girls and a real wheelbarrow. Hanslick said with truth that the real "hero" of the "Heroic Symphony" was Beethoven himself, and he is right in calling attention to the fact that this symphony as a whole does not express the heroic character as nobly as the C minor or the "Egmont" overture, in spite of its original dedication to Bonaparte. Let the reader of Wagner's description of the fourth movement note the fact that the varied theme of this movement was taken note for note from his ballet music to "Promotheus," and it also appears in his "contra dances"; what becomes of Wagner's description of the theme "as representing a firm, manly individuality, surrounded by all the softer and tenderer emotions," etc., ad nauseam?

Mr. Nikisch should moderate the rage of his fell drummer. In a well-balanced orchestra the kettledrums should not always force themselves upon the ear, nor should the personality of the player be the subject of general comment.

PHILIP HALE.

TIGHT BINDING

[18]

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, OCT. 12, 1890.

CONCERT TRIUMPHS.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

A bright, gay throng filled Music Hall on Friday afternoon, when the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch was warmly welcomed back to his post as director. On this rehearsal occasion, as well as at the concert yesterday evening, there was no mistaking the friendliness of the reception. Orchestra and leader must have felt themselves to be emphatically in the house of their friends. There will be few to gainsay the statement that Mr. Nikisch has well earned the great personal popularity he enjoys in this city, as indeed wherever the Boston Symphony orchestra has found a hearing under his direction. He has been a leader in everything that the word implies. Essentially poetic in temperament, he has shown the gifted gift—rarely indeed is it bestowed—of being able not only to bring a great orchestra en rapport with his thought, but to lead them to express that thought. Quarrel who may with Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this or that composer, one thing is certain—he is a man of ideas, of individuality, and is, therefore, one whose views are to be followed with keen interest, whether or not one agrees with him in every detail of method or every point of shading or expression.

And, on the whole, what admirable results have been obtained. Granted that an important factor, not to be ignored, in Mr. Nikisch's success has been the admirable work of preparation under Wilhelm Gericke. Granted, also, that occasionally the leader has not secured—as in the case of the Christmas symphony, for instance—quite in sympathy with his work. For all this there has been ample recompense, not only in appreciative settings-forth of novelties in orchestral offerings, but in the disclosing of new beauties in Schumann and Beethoven, in Mozart and Mendelssohn.

Something of the promise of the present season has already been made known in these columns—enough to indicate wider achievements than this unique Boston musical enterprise has yet won. In all essentials the orchestra is the same as last season, and the results gained at the opening concert show that it is as wonderful an instrument of setting forth the director's mind and thought as when Mr. Nikisch bowed his adieux last spring.

It was to the memory of Otto Dresel that the first concert was dedicated. Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, interpreted with wonderful delicacy of effect, opened the programme, and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony closed it. The Bach concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra gave opportunities to Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who played together marvellously well, and were recalled with very hearty applause. The noble Beethoven symphony was given in a most impressive way—we do not recall any performance of the funeral march or of the finale quite so appreciative or so satisfying.

Volkmann's "Richard III." overture and Brahm's symphony No. 2, in D major, are assigned for this week's programme. Next to Boston will be the movements from Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony. Theodore Reichmann, the distinguished baritone of the German opera in New York, is to be the soloist.

Six subscription concerts will be given by the Kneisel quartet in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. The assisting artists include Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, will be sold to subscribers only, at the box office, Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

Cambridge music lovers are to be favored with eight concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Sanders Theatre, during the season. The first of the series will be given next Thursday evening, when Mr. Franz Rummel, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist. The programme is as follows: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; moto perpetuo (for all violins), Paganini; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Season tickets for the series are now on sale at the University book store, Cambridge.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch made his bow to the musical public of Boston for the second season Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when the first rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place. At the rehearsal there was a great crush. For popularity among the ladies and suburban patrons these Friday afternoon rehearsals are coming to be more of an event than the concert itself. This was evidenced at the auction sale, when the prices were seen to be far in advance of those obtained for the Saturday evening concerts.

The welcome which Mr. Nikisch received on both occasions was very flattering, and it was a spontaneous and hearty outburst of applause. There were large numbers standing around the sides of the hall Saturday evening, and the admission sale must have been a good one. It is well understood by the public that no seats are for sale. Every seat was sold at the auction, or at the box office immediately after, and as all that are reserved were offered at auction, it is evident that this year the management receives the largest income yet obtained by the sale of tickets. In fact, it can only be increased in future by an advance in the premiums obtained for the seats.

Mr. Nikisch's stand was handsomely decorated and the programme was dedicated to Otto Dresel, of whose life a brief sketch was incorporated in the book of notes prepared by John S. Dwight, and to them, the biographer says, Boston is more indebted for progress in music than the mass of music lovers are aware. The conductor began his season as he did that of last year—directing the orchestra from memory, except in the accompaniment for the solos. Familiar as this is to the frequenters of these concerts, it is an impressive spectacle. It makes Mr. Nikisch a part of the orchestra, and few can be found who do not look with admiration upon the man who can carry to such successful interpretation an entire evening's programme without a note of music before him.

It was a conservative programme which introduced the orchestra to the Music Hall audience. The information is vouchsafed by those familiar with Mr. Dresel and his musical tastes that it was just such an one as the late musician would have chosen, meaning, of course, the Mendelssohn overture, "Hebrides," and Beethoven's Third Symphony, the opening and closing numbers of the concert. Bach was also one of his favorite composers, and the intermediate number on the programme, a concerto in D minor for two violins, to the accompaniment of a string orchestra, was received with more applause than the other selections. It introduced Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, and the piece was not a double concerto, for the two violins only played together in the sense of playing against the rest of the orchestra. Both of the gentlemen rendered the parts with that artistic finish which the public has come to expect from them and the adagio movement was beautiful in conception and interpretation.

There have been so few changes in the personnel of the orchestra that it was to be expected that the work would be admirably taken up after the vacation, and this was true. While there was no excessive enthusiasm over the performance of the "Eroica" symphony or the Mendelssohn overture, close attention was paid to the renditions and few people left the hall until the last note had been heard. The orchestra was most certainly in good form and Mr. Nikisch's readings were expressive and artistic. The reputation which this body of musicians has attained was fully sustained by the performance and nothing but commendation is worthy or desirable. For the next concert we are to have as soloist Theodor Reichmann, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, whose appearance at these concerts last season was a genuine success, and who will be gladly welcomed.

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

MUSIC HALL,

BOSTON, MASS.

BOSTON, October , 1890.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts to be given by the KNEISEL QUARTET in Union Hall, (18 Boylston Street) on Monday Evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, Feb'y 16, and March 9, 1891. Season Tickets, with reserved seats, $6.

Name, ...

Address, ...

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1890.

Star Lecture Course.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The initial entertainment of the Star Lecture Course was given last evening in Infantry Hall before a very large audience—one, indeed, that completely filled the hall. Surely there could have been no more auspicious opening of such a course of entertainments than was given by the conjunction of the Kneisel String Quartet of Boston, an organization which holds perhaps the highest rank of any in this country in the practice of the difficult and delicate art of chamber music. Mr. Myron W. Whitney, the famous basso, and Miss Edith L. Meeks, reader. The management of the course did a service to the musical interests of the city in affording an opportunity to hear such quartet playing, for it is an opportunity that is all too seldom included in a season's music in Providence. The chief number of their programme was Svendsen's quartet in A minor, op. 1—that work which marked the composer for a distinguished career while he was still a student in the Leipzig Conservatory. It is a delightful composition, fresh and original in its themes, and showing in many traits that the composer has banded himself with those who find in the popular music of their native lands the most congenial sources of their inspiration; the Scandinavian spirit is constantly present, and delightfully so. Grace of invention and distinction in harmonic structure are the prevailing characteristics; they are especially present in the allegro scherzando, a true scherzo in all that that implies. More of the Scandinavian flavor was given to the programme by the passionate andante from Greig's fine quartet, a work which it must be confessed somewhat overshadows the previous one in the strength and spontaneity of its ideas. The playing of these movements (the Svendsen quartet was wisely divided) was well-nigh an epitome of all that is best in quartet playing, in perfection of finish and in that unanimity of purpose which gives the most artistic balance to the performance and the most lucid exposition of the composer's idea. In addition, both Mr. Hekking, 'cello, and Mr. Kneisel, violin, appeared as soloists, and won much deserved applause by their admirable work; Mr. Hekking played Servais's brilliant setting of "O Cara Memoria," and Mr. Kneisel Vieuxtemps's "Ballade and Polonaise."

Mr. Whitney appeared but once and sang Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." He was in exceptionally good voice, so soon after the summer's rest, and his fine organ had much of that resonance and rotund quality of years gone by; to the encore which he received he responded by singing "A Mariner's Home's the Sea." Miss Meek was very evidently high in popular favor, and her two selections both brought demands for her further appearance, to which she graciously acceded. She was presented with two very fine baskets of flowers. The accompaniments for the two singing pieces were beautifully given by Mr. [illegible], while Mr. Edward [illegible] accompanied Mr. Whitney. A [illegible] recital by O. L. Pratt occupied the [illegible]

World New York City.

Date 10-12

The reason why the seats on the [illegible] side of the Boston Music Hall floor for the symphony concerts sold more cheaply than those on the left has been discovered. Mrs. Gardner is expected to sit in the right balcony. Those who sit underneath cannot see her. It is worth the price of admission to watch Mrs. Gardner. She is the most conspicuous person at the concerts. She is more interesting to a large portion of the audience than the orchestra. Her poses, her costumes and her escorts always attract attention. She is always "chic." Not a pretty woman, she is, however, picturesque. She dresses exquisitely. She is never overdressed. The simplicity of her street costumes suggests a lesson to the vulgar. She does not disfigure her head with unbecoming hats and bonnets, as so many women do. She wears small and sensible head-gear. Her figure is exquisite. The world does not see that. She never wears evening dress to a public entertainment. If she does, she is sure to shroud it with a wrap. Mrs. Gardner does not take the interest in Nikisch she did in Gericke. Nikisch is married. He is not a parlor knight. He hates society. Gericke was much sought after. He went often to a few houses. Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. William F. Apthorp, and Mrs. Arthur Foote were his great friends. They would have extended as equal welcome to Nikisch. He did not respond. Nikisch is a bohemian. Gericke was a [illegible]

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1890

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS

ON THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

I. CONCERT THURSDAY, OCT. 16, AT 7:45 P. M.

SOLOIST:

Mr. FRANZ RUMMEL.

Programme: Symphony in G minor, Mozart. Concerto for pianoforte in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven. Moto de Concert, "Moto Perpetuo" (for all violins), Paganini. Overture, "Oberon," Weber.

Season tickets for the series of eight concerts, $6; [illegible] sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge. [illegible] ed number of admission tickets will be sold at [illegible] or on the evening of each concert.

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[70 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

"The only permanent Orchestra to appear in this city during the season organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

SIX GRAND CONCERTS

In Infantry Hall on the Evenings of Tuesday, Oct. 21, Wednesdays, Nov. 19, December 17, January 21, March 4, and Tuesday, April 7.

MR. THEODOR REICHMANN,

The Famous Baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and other Eminent Soloists, Will Appear.

SEASON TICKETS, WITH BEST RESERVED SEATS FOR THE SIX CONCERTS, $5.

Subscription now open at M. STEINERT & SONS' Piano Warerooms, 176 and 178 Westminster street.

SUBSCRIPTION CLOSES TUESDAY EVENING, OCT. 14.

Tickets will be delivered to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY on Wednesday and Thursday, Oct. 15 and 16.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

TIGHT BINDING

[18]

Boston Sunday Globe

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, OCT. 12, 1890.

CONCERT TRIUMPHS.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

A bright, gay throng filled Music Hall on Friday afternoon, when the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch was warmly welcomed back to his post as director. On this rehearsal occasion, as well as at the concert yesterday evening, there was no mistaking the friendliness of the reception. Orchestra and leader must have felt themselves to be emphatically in the house of their friends.

There will be few to gainsay the statement that Mr. Nikisch has well earned the great personal popularity he enjoys in this city, as indeed wherever the Boston Symphony orchestra has found a hearing under his direction. He has been a leader in everything that the word implies. Essentially poetic in temperament, he has shown the added gift—rarely indeed is it bestowed—of being able not only to bring a great orchestra en rapport with his thought, but to lead them to express that thought. Quarrel who may with Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this or that composer, one thing is certain—he is a man of ideas, of individuality, and is, therefore, one whose views are to be followed with keen interest, whether or not one agrees with him in every detail of method or every point of shading or expression.

And, on the whole, what admirable results have been obtained. Granted that an important factor, not to be ignored, in Mr. Nikisch's success has been the admirable work of preparation under Wilhelm Gericke. Granted, also, that occasionally the leader has not secured—as in the case of the Christmas symphony, for instance—quite in sympathy with his work. For all this there has been ample recompense, not only in appreciative settings-forth of novelties in orchestral offerings, but in the disclosing of new beauties in Schumann and Beethoven, in Mozart and Mendelssohn.

Something of the promise of the present season has already been made known in these columns—enough to indicate wider achievements than this unique Boston musical enterprise has yet won. In all essentials the orchestra is the same as last season, and the results gained at the opening concert show that it is as wonderful an instrument of setting forth the director's mind and thought as when Mr. Nikisch bowed his adieux last spring.

It was to the memory of Otto Dresel that the first concert was dedicated. Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, interpreted with wonderful delicacy of effect, opened the programme, and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony closed it. The Bach concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra gave opportunities to Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who played together marvellously well, and were recalled with very hearty applause. The noble Beethoven symphony was given in a most impressive way—we do not recall any performance of the funeral march or of the finale quite so appreciative or so satisfying. Volkmann's "Richard III." overture and Brahm's symphony No. 2, in D major, are assigned for this week's programme. Next to Boston will be the movements from Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony. Theodore Reichmann, the distinguished baritone of the German opera in New York, is to be the soloist.

Six subscription concerts will be given by the Kneisel quartet in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. The assisting artists include Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $6, will be sold to subscribers only, at the box office, Music Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, at 9 a. m. The subscription list is now open at Music Hall.

Cambridge music lovers are to be favored with eight concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Sanders Theatre, during the season. The first of the series will be given next Thursday evening, when Mr. Franz Rummel, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist. The programme is as follows: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; moto perpetuo (for all violins), Paganini; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Season tickets for the series are now on sale at the University book store, Cambridge.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1890

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

EIGHT CONCERTS

On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 19 and April 16.

I. CONCERT THURSDAY, OCT. 16, AT 7:45 P. M.

SOLOIST:

Mr. FRANZ RUMMEL.

Programme: Symphony in G minor, Mozart. Concerto for pianoforte in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven. Allegro de Concert, "Moto Perpetuo" (for all violins), Paganini. Overture, "Oberon," Weber.

Season tickets for the series of eight concerts, $6; now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold at the door on the evening of each concert.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, [illegible] 13, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch made his bow to the musical public of Boston for the second season Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when the first rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place. At the rehearsal there was a great crush. For popularity among the ladies and suburban patrons these Friday afternoon rehearsals are coming to be more of an event than the concert itself. This was evidenced at the auction sale, when the prices were seen to be far in advance of those obtained for the Saturday evening concerts.

The welcome which Mr. Nikisch received on both occasions was very flattering, and it was a spontaneous and hearty outburst of applause. There were large numbers standing around the sides of the hall Saturday evening, and the admission sale must have been a good one. It is well understood by the public that no seats are for sale. Every seat was sold at the auction, or at the box office immediately after, and as all that are reserved were offered at auction, it is evident that this year the management receives the largest income yet obtained by the sale of tickets. In fact, it can only be increased in future by an advance in the premiums obtained for the seats.

Mr. Nikisch's stand was handsomely decorated and the programme was dedicated to Otto Dresel, of whose life a brief sketch was incorporated in the book of notes prepared by John S. Dwight, and to them, the biographer says, Boston is more indebted for progress in music than the mass of music lovers are aware. The conductor began his season as he did that of last year—directing the orchestra from memory, except in the accompaniment for the solos. Familiar as this is to the frequenters of these concerts, it is an impressive spectacle. It makes Mr. Nikisch a part of the orchestra, and few can be found who do not look with admiration upon the man who can carry to such successful interpretation an entire evening's programme without a note of music before him.

It was a conservative programme which introduced the orchestra to the Music Hall audience. The information is vouchsafed by those familiar with Mr. Dresel and his musical tastes that it was just such an one as the late musician would have chosen, meaning, of course, the Mendelssohn overture, "Hebrides," and Beethoven's Third Symphony, the opening and closing numbers of the concert. Bach was also one of his favorite composers, and the intermediate number on the programme, a concerto in D minor for two violins, to the accompaniment of a string orchestra, was received with more applause than the other selections. It introduced Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, and the piece was not a double concerto, for the two violins only played together in the sense of playing against the rest of the orchestra. Both of the gentlemen rendered the parts with that artistic finish which the public has come to expect from them and the adagio movement was beautiful in conception and interpretation.

There have been so few changes in the personnel of the orchestra that it was to be expected that the work would be admirably taken up after the vacation, and this was true. While there was no excessive enthusiasm over the performance of the "Eroica" symphony or the Mendelssohn overture, close attention was paid to the renditions and few people left the hall until the last note had been heard. The orchestra was most certainly in good form and Mr. Nikisch's readings were expressive and artistic. The reputation which this body of musicians has attained was fully sustained by the performance and nothing but commendation is worthy or desirable. For the next concert we are to have as soloist Theodor Reichmann, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, whose appearance at these concerts last season was a genuine success, and who will be gladly welcomed.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1890.

Star Lecture Course.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The initial entertainment of the Star Lecture Course was given last evening in Infantry Hall before a very large audience—one, indeed, that completely filled the hall. Surely there could have been no more auspicious opening of such a course of entertainments than was given by the conjunction of the Kneisel String Quartet of Boston, an organization which holds perhaps the highest rank of any in this country in the practice of the difficult and delicate art of chamber music. Mr. Myron W. Whitney, the famous basso, and Miss Edith L. Meeks, reader. The management of the course did a service to the musical interests of the city in affording an opportunity to hear such quartet playing, for it is an opportunity that is all too seldom included in a season's music in Providence. The chief number of their programme was Svendsen's quartet in A minor, op. 1—that work which marked the composer for a distinguished career while he was still a student in the Leipzig Conservatory. It is a delightful composition, fresh and original in its themes, and showing in many traits that the composer has banded himself with those who find in the popular music of their native lands the most congenial sources of their inspiration; the Scandinavian spirit is constantly present, and delightfully so. Grace of invention and distinction in harmonic structure are the prevailing characteristics; they are especially present in the allegro scherzando, a true scherzo in all that that implies. More of the Scandinavian flavor was given to the programme by the passionate andante from Grieg's fine quartet, a work which it must be confessed somewhat overshadows the previous one in the strength and spontaneity of its ideas. The playing of these movements (the Svendsen quartet was wisely divided) was well-nigh an epitome of all that is best in quartet playing, in perfection of finish and in that unanimity of purpose which gives the most artistic balance to the performance and the most lucid exposition of the composer's idea. In addition, both Mr. Hekking, 'cello, and Mr. Kneisel, violin, appeared as soloists, and won much deserved applause by their admirable work; Mr. Hekking played Servais's brilliant setting of "O Cara Memoria," and Mr. Kneisel Vieuxtemps's "Ballade and Polonaise."

Mr. Whitney appeared but once and sang Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." He was in exceptionally good voice, so soon after the summer's rest, and his fine organ had much of that resonance and rotund quality of years gone by; to the encore which he received he responded by singing "A Mariner's Home's the Sea." Miss Meek was very evidently high in popular favor, and her two selections both brought demands for her further appearance, to which she graciously acceded. She was presented with two very fine baskets of flowers. The accompaniments for the two string players were beautifully given by Mr. Zach of Boston, while Mr. Edward Hoffman accompanied Mr. Whitney. A brief organ recital by O. L. Patt preceded the concert.

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

MUSIC HALL,

BOSTON, MASS.

BOSTON, October , 1890.

I hereby subscribe for Season Tickets for the Concerts to be given by the KNEISEL QUARTET in Union Hall, (18 Boylston Street) on Monday Evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, Feb'y 16, and March 9, 1891. Season Tickets, with reserved seats, $6.

Name,

Address,

World New York City

Date 10-12

The reason why the seats on the right side of the Boston Music Hall floor for the symphony concerts sold more cheaply than those on the left has been discovered. Mrs. Gardner is expected to sit in the right balcony. Those who sit underneath cannot see her. It is worth the price of admission to watch Mrs. Gardner. She is the most conspicuous person at the concerts. She is more interesting to a large portion of the audience than the orchestra. Her poses, her costumes and her escorts always attract attention. She is always "chic." Not a pretty woman, she is, however, picturesque. She dresses exquisitely. She is never overdressed. The simplicity of her street costumes suggests a lesson to the vulgar. She does not disfigure her head with unbecoming hats and bonnets, as so many women do. She wears small and sensible head-gear. Her figure is exquisite. The world does not see that. She never wears evening dress to a public entertainment. If she does, she is sure to shroud it with a wrap. Mrs. Gardner does not take the interest in Nikisch she did in Gericke. Nikisch is married. He is not a parlor knight. He hates society. Gericke was much sought after. He went often to a few houses. Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. William F. Apthorp, and Mrs. Arthur Foote were his great friends. They would have extended as equal welcome to Nikisch. He did not respond. Nikisch is a bohemian. Gericke was a [illegible]

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL,

OCTOBER 12, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[70 PERFORMERS.]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TENTH SEASON.

"The only permanent Orchestra to appear in this city during the season organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

SIX GRAND CONCERTS

In Infantry Hall on the Evenings of Tuesday, Oct. 21, Wednesdays, Nov. 19, December 17, January 21, March 4, and Tuesday, April 7.

MR. THEODOR REICHMANN,

The Famous Baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and other Eminent Soloists, Will Appear.

SEASON TICKETS, WITH BEST RESERVED SEATS FOR THE SIX CONCERTS, $5.

Subscription now open at M. STEINERT & SONS' Piano Warerooms, 176 and 178 Westminster street.

SUBSCRIPTION CLOSES TUESDAY EVENING, OCT. 14.

Tickets will be delivered to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY on Wednesday and Thursday, Oct. 15 and 16.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FADED TEXT

[19]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The tenth season (who can realize it?) of these noble concerts, for which Boston is so largely indebted to Henry L. Higginson, opened on Saturday evening with an audience and a programme altogether worthy of their high and purely musical idea. The Music Hall was filled, all looked deeply interested, listened with respectful, many with rapt attention, and scarcely a person left the hall until the Music was all over. "In Memoriam—Otto Dresel," stood at the head of the programme, and a memorial wreath had been placed by some pious hand about the stand of the conductor. The orchestra, with but two or three changes, was the same in its personnel and its proportions that it was last year. Conductor Nikisch, looking fresh and well and happy after his summer vacation abroad, was most cordially greeted as he advanced to take his stand. The programme was selected with one leading motive—to do honor to the memory, the noble life, the genius of the rare musician, called from his sphere so suddenly. It consisted of three noble works by three great masters, in good keeping and good contrast with each other. They were such works as Otto Dresel loved: 1. The "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn, his early friend and master. 2. The concerto in D minor for two violins, by Bach, his greater master and the model he revered. 3. The Heroic Symphony of Beethoven. It was no less a programme of rare excellence and interest in itself, a worthy type of programmes proper to this kind of concerts, true to their idea, a good kind of programme to begin with and to imitate repeatedly without any reference to a memorial; a programme beautiful, impressive, edifying in itself. It is so sweet to sit and hear good music undisturbed by restless clamor after novelties, idle shallow curiosity about modern fashions! Give us music that is real, that is genial (sprung from genius), and enduring—music that seems newer every time you hear it. We confess we should have been glad, from the memorial point of view, to have heard also some of Dresel's compositions, some of his songs, as well as one or two of Robert Franz. But that was hardly practicable under the circumstances, while the programme was already long, and surely nothing could be spared from such a perfect trifoil.

Mendelssohn's cool, breezy, seashore overture was beautifully rendered. It lost nothing of its atmosphere, nothing of its picturesqueness, nothing of its strange imaginativeness, by the unusually moderate, or say thoughtful, tempo at which the opening motive was taken. The whole character and spirit of the overture, we think, justifies it. It is contemplative, it is dreamy, full of reverie, as one feels while looking over the water. It gains fire and speed and wildness as it goes on; the thoughts are carried out over a wider and more stirring circle, over the "wide weltering waste," especially when the trumpet tones, at first held in abeyance, ring from afar with a weird ocean sound, and the waves rush and roar, and the vast sea swells and swings, until we reach the climax of the storm. It was all palpable and near, you felt the spray, you felt the poetic charm, the mildly melancholy Mendelssohnian mood of it, all the more because of that thoughtful and unhurried tempo of the introduction. And how those sotto voce echoes of the first theme come stealing back between the strong final chords, rounding it all into a sensitive live whole!

The one novelty of the evening was the Bach concerto, never presented here before. It is all melody, wrapping itself in melody, in that contrapuntal reflection or echoing of itself from all sides in the accompaniment which is a vital principle inherent in the inmost soul of all Bach's art. The two solo or concertante violin parts (admirably played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler) stand forth in friendly competition, distinctly individual while as intimately related as twin brothers can be. They are supported and accompanied by the quartet of all the strings. The tutti, solos and quartet, begin the vigorous vivace movement strongly altogether, the two violin parts of the quartet in unison with the two solo parts, the bass carrying on an independent but congenial melody of its own. This introduction carries the germ melody (if you will look at it and play or sing it over slowly you will see what exquisite melody it is)—the melody, we say, or the melodic material out of which the solo melodies evolve. How beautiful they are, with their wide intervals, first sung by one, then by the other, while the first keeps on in its own way, the quartet subsiding into chord accompaniment the while, but gradually catching the melodic impulse and contributing its own bits of sympathetic phrasing! The middle movement, Largo, ma non tanto, is as lovely a cantabile melody as can be imagined. It is in the relative major, F. The quartet sinks to mere accompaniment, while the two principals develop the witching, melodic motive, imitating yet contrasting one another with most subtle, fascinating art. The finale, Allegro, returns to the key D minor, and is full of life and brilliant play, of fresh, melodic figures, changeful as flickering sunbeams on the wall. The rippling triplets, which relieve the steady three-four rhythm; the high chord passages, in which the two violins seem to take rest, while the quartet supplies the active motion in little fragments of accompaniment, are among the points of interest. It might seem an o'er-bold undertaking for one of our day to interpolate an elaborate cadenza into this complete masterwork of Bach; but we must own that Hellmesberger's cadenza seemed to be entirely in the style and spirit of the work, made out of the same cloth, out of themes and motives of the movement and also from the Largo, while it furnished a new and conspicuous example of the finished and artistic execution of the two principal violinists. "Sweetness and light" you feel throughout the whole intertwining of Bach's melody. And what health, what peace, what cheerful resignation, what free, harmonious activity, as of a pure soul life! By the way, it is worth mentioning, as seeming to show that Bach was pleased with his own work, that he reproduced it later, all its motives, themes and movements, in the form of a concerto for two pianofortes, only in another key.

Can anything new be said of the Eroica, that first full revelation of Beethoven's mighty individuality and genius? How it must have startled and astonished the courtly, cultivated music-lovers in Vienna on its first production! Nothing like it had been heard before. It is so full of musical matter, so almost bursting with original and marvellous ideas, and yet so beautiful throughout, so noble, so magnificent, that [illegible] into one consistent, perfect whole, or rather to have grown so by the resistless fate of its first clear, pregnant inspiration; as out of the seed-germ stem and branches, leaves and flowers and fruit develop into the waving forest of a grand centennial oak. As we commented on Saturday upon the unsuggestiveness of dry technical analyses, we now have pleasure in recognizing that the analysis given in the Bulletin of this symphony is from the pen of Wagner, who, however one may feel about his music, was one of the most intelligent of critics, and that it is not technical at all, but wholly æsthetic and emotional. Sir George Grove's analysis, also, is excellent and really helpful, although he makes one mistake in calling that the "second subject" of the first movement which is only a wayside diversion; but Grove's analysis requires some musical notation to explain its meaning.

The wonderful first movement really expresses all the heroic aspirations, all the joys and sorrows, all the alternating and conflicting moods and passions, all the checkered but triumphant destiny of a great man. The Marcia funèbre is the most profound, the most impressive and sublime of all funereal marches ever written. What a great weight of woe it bears along; what depths of sorrow we look down into in some grand groping passages of double-bass! And how the living faith in good, the heavenly optimism, which burns in all Beethoven's music, hinted ever in its gloomiest transitions, speaks not only in the lovely episode in the major of the key, but really never deserts you in the return of the minor and the soft solemn dying out at the end! The irrepressible reaction from all this in the Scherzo is in utter contrast with it; freedom, life and merriment are in its swift staccato hunting movement; and the exhilarating, thrilling harmonies of the three horns in the trio, played to perfection that night, makes one long to hear them over and over all night long. The finale, with its simple but pregnant themes borrowed from his "Prometheus" ballet music, and his seemingly exhaustless inventiveness in variations, is all consistent, logical, in keeping with the rest of the symphony, full of charm and of surprise, and perhaps more than any other part exemplifies our analogy of the tree unfolding out of the minute seed-germ. As to the rendering by the orchestra, there may have been little flaws which Messrs. Fine-Ears could detect while we were absorbed in the general impression, in the delight of following such almost supernatural beauty, grandeur and significance; but we must frankly, gratefully, confess we never heard the Eroica sound more magnificently.

J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

MUSIC.

Season of 1890-91 Begun—First Symphony Concert.

Fine Performances by the Orchestra. The Audiences.

The scenes attending the opening of the season of symphony concerts for 1890-91 did not differ materially from those which have marked the inauguration of previous seasons by our orchestra. There was the same crowded hall on Friday afternoon, a lovely audience, representing the feminine element of the best culture hereabouts, while on Saturday evening came, as usual, the men with their wives and daughters, the musicians and the critics, in numbers far in extent of the seating capacity of the room. Mr. Nikisch was heartily, even enthusiastically, greeted on both occasions; the audiences were glad to reassemble for the tenth year and, as was the case with most of their number, for the tenth time, to enjoy what, through the patient labor of years, has become as fine, mobile, and moving interpretations as it is possible to hear from any orchestra in the world. People scanned their neighbors, and with manifest approval in most cases. The attachment naturally formed for a certain position leads regular patrons year after year to secure about the same positions, so the habitue of either the Friday rehearsal or the Saturday concert is usually to be located with ease. This is especially the case with the evening audience, which numbers the real connoisseurs of the town. "The throne" in the second gallery has been moved from the left to the right side, where its habitual occupants with their full scores can always be found. But Papa Dwight beams as usual from the middle of the left side of the first gallery, which section, more particularly the right side, boasts a galaxy of savants. Most of the critics are, as usual, near a door, which in some cases is used when the programme is too musty, and in others, sad to say, when it teems with the fresh youth of the modern set of writers,—impulsive, warm-blooded fellows, whose music sometimes sets at naught the teachings of the ancients, but it always stirs the emotions.

There are few changes in the make-up of the band, the most important being the new first horn, Mr. Hackerbarth, who comes from Mr. Seidl's and Mr. Thomas's orchestras, succeeding the famed poseur, Xaver Reiter. A new tympani player takes Mr. Simpson's place; the new man has a mighty beat joined to a flourish, which shall have its proper recognition later. There was one figure missing: "Nichols"—we do not use the expression inconsiderately—was withdrawn because of physical infirmity. More than one generation of concert-goers knew his face; for a leader of the orchestra, whilom agent of the Germanias, organizer and promoter, he has been an active factor in the musical life of the city. The first programme was:

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Fingal's Cave."
Bach—Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings.
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time in these concerts.)
Beethoven—Symphony in E flat (Heroic).

The violinists were Messrs. Franz Kneisel and C. M. Loeffler. This concert became a tribute to the memory of Otto Dresel, and the programme was chosen in accordance; a further memorial to the deceased musician was the sympathetic article contributed to the programme-book by John S. Dwight. This should be borne in mind by critics of the first concert of the season. The programme Mr. Nikisch had selected before the course of events caused a change is: Symphony in D, Haydn; "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Symphony in C, No. 9, Schubert. The playing of the orchestra was so generally fine that one could scarcely believe the band had been together but ten days since the summer interim; there were some features of the performance of the symphony notably well executed, with a sureness of attack and care in dynamic expression equalling the best moments in the history of the organization. The symphony was nobly interpreted. It is true Mr. Nikisch read some passages differently than his predecessors, but they were all enobled by his touch. The funeral march was most impressive, we do not recall a performance of greater breadth. The gayety of the scherzo and the power and freedom belonging to last movement were not wanting in the performance. As to tonality the voice of this orchestra is more musical than ever; the strings are a faultless unit in tone and movement; the wood-wind offers little to criticize; the horns, owing to the change of leader, know each other imperfectly as yet, but a perfect ensemble is only a matter of a week or two; their tone is resolute but not coarse. The trumpets and heavy brass are in safe hands. As to the tympani player in the third and last movements of the symphony, it did seem that the man was absorbed in the orgy he himself was making; his tone was too great for a proper balance while his Delsartian motions made him on more than one occasion an object of too particular interest.

The archaic piece by Bach was very well played by the two artists named. The middle movement has melodic interest, but, as a whole, the concerto is too unvital to interest. The cadenza is a good piece of writing; Bachish in spirit and musicianly. The players were warmly applauded. The programme for the second rehearsal and concert will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, (first time in Boston,) Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major, and an aria and songs by Mr. Theodor Reichmann.

The significant fact that 6000 of the seditious Boston Symphony programme books are eagerly sought for and taken away from the Music Hall each week is a great stimulant to the "industrious investigator and purveyor" to continue to furnish the historical, biographical and analytical notes which really seem to fill a want.

Probable scene in Music Hall lobbies this season; time 7.50 Saturday evening:

Stranger, to boy with books—What are these books?

Boy—Programmes with notes about the works to be performed.

Stranger—May I have two?

Agent for the Society for the Prevention of Education, standing near—Beg pardon, sir, but our society has taken a stand against—

Stranger, turning to boy—Can I pay you for five copies?

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 15, 1890.

MUSIC HALL NEXT SUNDAY.

MISS MARION MANOLA,
MR. TIMOTHIE ADAMOWSKY,
THE HARVARD QUARTET,
THE GERMANIA ORCHESTRA.

POPULAR PRICES. 25 30 50 NOW ON SALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1890.

The Cambridge Symphony concerts begin in Sanders Theatre tomorrow night. The series will consist of eight concerts, for which season tickets can be bought for $6. Tomorrow evening the programme is: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; "Motto Perpetuo" (for all violins), Paginini; Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The pianist is Mr. Franz Rummnel, who has returned to the United States after an extended tour of foreign capitals.

The Kneisel Quartet concerts begin next Monday evening. Six concerts will be given in Union Hall, 18 Boylston street, Monday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9. Soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julia E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Arthur Whiting. Season tickets now on sale at Music Hall. The programme for the first concert is: Quartet in A minor, Svendsen; Songs to be sung by Theodor Reichmann; Quartet in A minor, No. 1, Schumann.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts.

Events which deserve and will attract in large measure the attention of the musical public, are the six concerts to be given in Infantry Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. This organization, now in its tenth year, is widely recognized as one of the finest orchestras in the world, and its home concerts receive the support of the Boston public to a degree probably never equalled by any concert enterprise. The subscription for the Providence concerts, now open at Steinert's piano warerooms, is already very large. The great excellence of the performances, and the exceedingly reasonable price of season tickets ($5 for six concerts), should ensure audiences that will fill Infantry Hall. Intending patrons are reminded that the subscription closes next Tuesday evening. As an aid to a complete understanding of the works to be performed, and to add to the enjoyment of patrons, analytical programmes in book form will be mailed in advance of each concert to subscribers for season tickets.

BOSTON'S BIG ORCHESTRA.

Opening of the Tenth Symphony Season.

BOSTON, Oct. 11.—Boston's warm and generous appreciation of her great symphony orchestra was never more clearly made manifest than it was this evening at the opening of the 10th season of that institution. A vast audience filled every seat in Music Hall, and occupied every inch of space that the police regulations allow to be utilized as standing room, as a similar one had at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, and as Mr. Nikisch came upon the platform to begin his second season of work in Boston, he was given a reception that showed he had won a very secure place in the heart of music-loving Boston. The Symphony Orchestra, in truth, sets out upon its 10th season in a condition both artistic and financial that was never sounder or more promising. Mr. Nikisch has proved himself to be a conductor of the rarest gifts; an interpreter endowed with the touch of genius. He has, indeed, secured the support of what is in the best sense, a popular love and appreciation of good music, as few of his predecessors in this country have done. This is shown by the widespread interest in the work of the orchestra, not only in Boston, but in other cities. In Boston, the financial support has been what is has never been before; it is such as to turn the deficit which the generous Mr. Higginson was in former years called upon to meet, into a surplus. And in other cities, over a wide stretch of country, a similar interest is manifest, the same interest which prompts the management to give six concerts in Providence and elsewhere, instead of four. It is a most encouraging indication that the Boston orchestra is winning that measure of popularity which it was founded to win, and for which so much has been wisely and liberally done.

This first concert of the season was dedicated to the memory of that admirable musician whose recent loss Boston and the musical public of the whole country deplore, Otto Dresel, and the severely conservative character of its programme may, perhaps, thus be accounted for,—it contained Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. Mr. Nikisch's striking and beautiful readings of Mendelssohn and Beethoven are by this time too familiar for detailed comment, though they are ever fresh and suggestive in their quality. The Bach concerto, magnificently played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, was heard for the first time in these concerts—a work full of the most vigorous and elastic vitality of Bach's genius, and one that it was a pleasure to hear.

There was in the work of the orchestra very little to show that it was the first performance after five or six months of separation and idleness, still less of anything to show that deterioration which a few croakers last year predicted would be the inevitable result of Mr. Nikisch's free and virile methods of conducting. It was well-nigh flawless. There have been very few changes made in this "band of virtuosi," as a distinguished critic has called it—one reason why from year to year its standard is so rigorously maintained. The great hornist and his only less great brother, Xaver and Josef Reiter, are gone, the former's place is filled by Mr. A. H. Hackebarth, lately of New York, where he was Thomas's first horn player. Two new first violins have been engaged, and a new kettledrum player; this completes the list of new members.

Mr. Nikisch has announced some of the novelties that he intends to produce this season. An auxiliary chorus will be needed for several, which will soon be put into training. There will be Schumann's music to Manfred, Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," Liszt's great "Dante" symphony with chorus, a great number of Wagner selections, two movements from Tschaikowsky's new symphony, and his "Romeo and Juliet" overture, a symphony in B-flat by Chadwick, the talented young Boston composer, and a Te Deum for chorus, solos and orchestra by Bruckner; as well as important new works by Saint-Saens, Villiers Stanford and Mackenzie.

In this connection it may be proper to add that the programme for the first concert in this city, Oct. 21, will include a symphony by Mozart, the "Perpetual Motion" of Paganini, played by all the violins in unison, the two movements of Tschaikowski's new symphony, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Herr Reichmann the soloist will sing the baritone aria from Lortzing's "Czar und Zimmermann," and songs by Brahms and Schubert.

R. A.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor. Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro assai.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in E flat, No. 5. Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Allegro.
PAGANINI.	MOTO PERPETUO, ALLEGRO DE CONCERT. (For all the Violins.)
WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The Music Hall popular concerts begin next Sunday evening for the winter season, and the opening programme will be contributed by Miss Marion Manola, Mr. T. Adamowski, the Harvard quartet and the Germania orchestra.

MUSIC HALL NEXT SUNDAY

Miss Marion Manola,
Mr. Timothie Adamowski.
The Harvard Quartet.
Mr. E. Strasser.
Mr. Paul Fox.
The Germania Orchestra.

Popular prices, 25, 35, 50 cents, including reserved seats. Tickets now on sale.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week, is: Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem Edlen Kreise," from "Tannhäuser," Wagner (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantino, and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaskowsky; songs, with piano; "Faint and Fainter is my Slumber," Brahms; "By the Sea," Schubert (Mr. Reichmann); Symphony No. 2, in D, Brahms.

The Cambridge Symphony concerts begin in Sanders Theatre tonight. The series will consist of eight concerts, for which season tickets can be bought for $6. Tonight's programme is: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Concerto for piano in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; "Moto Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; overture, "Oberon," Weber. The pianist is Mr. Franz Rummel, who has returned to the United States after an extended tour of foreign capitals.

The Palladium

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

HYPERION THEATER!
NIKISCH.
BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the assistance of EMINENT SOLO ARTISTS.

Monday Evenings,

Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season Tickets, with best reserved seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT'S SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, October 27, at 9 a. m.

☞No Subscription—First come first served.

o16 9t C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday, October 27, at nine o'clock in the morning, subscription tickets for a series of concerts to be given November 10, December 8, January 12, and February 28, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be on sale at M. Steinert & Son's Music store. The price is five dollars, which is very low for the delightful treats which are assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, OCT. 17.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

First Sunday Popular Concert,

NEXT SUNDAY, Oct. 19,

A great array of Musical Talent.

Miss Marion Manola, Only Appearance in Concert This Season.

T. Adamowski, The Famous Violin Soloist.

Harvard Quartet, In Several Popular Selections.

E. Strasser and Paul Rox,

The Celebrated Soloists, and the Full Germania Orchestra.

Popular Prices.

Seats Now on Sale.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the assistance of

Eminent Solo Artists.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel Street, Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m.

☞No Subscription—First come first served.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at 9 a. m.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1890

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The first of the series of concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat...Beethoven
Mr. Franz Rummel.
Moto Perpetuo.....Paganini
(For all the violins.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Deldevez summed up the whole matter in the case of Mozart's symphony in G minor when he characterized it as graceful, passionate and melancholy. Here science and inspiration go hand in hand. The most difficult technical problems—such as the reproduction in minor in the second reprise of the second melodic idea conceived originally in the major—are solved with apparent carelessness. Full as it is of the evidences of Mozart's contrapuntal skill, it is equally full of pure melody. This symphony is not an expression of metaphysical ideas; it is not programme-music; it does not try to paint any national or individual event or episode; it therefore furnishes no material for the rhapsodic utterances of those German critics who are only happy when they find everything in a musical composition except music. And yet, one man, a daring man named Elterlein, discovered that the andante expressed "a sentiment of consolation, not the repose of the soul in a firm conviction of interior joy, but rather a desire, a tendency towards it," whatever that may mean.

Now, because the music of Mozart is so musical, because it often seems so simple, it is extremely difficult to sing or to play; and when such a work as this G minor symphony is directed by a man of the temperament of Mr. Nikisch, its noble serenity at times becomes unmeaning sentimentalism, its natural, healthy passion is inflamed as though with blisters and drugs. Take the very opening of the first movement. Can anything be more simple, more direct than the first theme? But Mr. Nikisch did not seem to be content with the naked melody. He clothed it with gaudy garments, he gave it a coquettish air. He robbed a measure here, added to a measure there, and so he juggled with the whole allegro. The feverish unrest which he infused into the finale resulted in unsteadiness in the playing of the orchestra. Often there was an absence of the quiet delicacy and restrained passion which characterize the music of Mozart. And yet his reading of the work was interesting in spite of his exaggerations, and the greater part of the andante and the whole of the menuetto were delightful to hear.

Mr. Franz Rummel, who played the E flat concerto of Beethoven, in former years was a prominent disciple of the athletic school of pianists. His strength was formerly the dominating quality in his musical equipment: but he has changed, and last evening he gave a thoughtful and thoroughly musicianly performance of the great concerto. While it was admirable from a technical standpoint, his exhibition of technique was never obtrusive. His octave and pianissimo passages were superbly played, and in the passages where he exerted his strength the tone was never forced, was never unpleasant. Equally worthy of high praise was the manner in which he sank his own personality in the work of the composer. The orchestral accompaniment was a marked improvement upon that given Mr. Baermann a year ago.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch put the selection from Paganini upon the programme. The solemn preparation, the violinist's rising, the theatrical hush before the attack—all this was sensationalism pure and simple, unworthy of the occasion, the orchestra and the conductor. Nor was the music itself an excuse, however admirably it may have been performed.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The first of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place Monday evening, the 20th, at Union Hall, and the programme includes Svendsen's quartette in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's in A minor, op. 41. Mr. Theodor Reichmann will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art so Like a Flower."

OCTOBER 15.

HYPERION THEATER. } NIKISCH.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the Assistance Of

Eminent Solo Artists.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, Oct. 27th, at 9 A. M.

☞No Subscription—First come first Served.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

New Haven Symphony Concerts.

Events always eagerly awaited by the musical public of this city are the annual concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Four performances will be given at the Hyperion theater during the coming season by this famous organization under direction of its distinguished Leipzic conductor Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with the assistance of the best available solo artists. The dates appointed for these attractive occasions are Monday evenings November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.

The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the series will be five dollars. No subscription list will be opened but tickets will go on sale at M. Steinert & Sons' music store on Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m. The recognized superiority of the Boston orchestra and the remembrance of its splendid performances in past seasons will doubtless ensure a very large attendance at these concerts.

BOSTON HERALD

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Reappearance of Franz Rummel, the Pianist.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, were begun last evening, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with Franz Rummel, the pianist, as soloist. The programme made for the evening included the symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for piano in E flat ("Emperor"), Beethoven; "Moto Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; and overture, "Oberon," Weber.

The reappearance here of Franz Rummel, after an absence of several years, made a peculiarly interesting event of the evening, and, in addition to the large audience from the university city, there was a large attendance of amateur and professional musicians from Boston, the pianist having many warm admirers here. His playing of the great "Emperor" concerto was a delightful musical treat, and richly rewarded those who ventured into the suburbs to enjoy it. He is such a thoroughly satisfying artist that the listener neglects to analyze the characteristics of his playing, and gives way to the mood of listening without reserve. He has his piano absolutely at his command, the technical difficulties being but matters of detail, and so he gives his whole being to an interpretation of the composer's idea.

His touch has all the delicacy of a woman's, with, when occasion demands, the breadth, vigor and vitality of the master, and he combines in his work more of the qualities demanded for enjoyable pianoforte playing than are possessed by one in a thousand of the solo players of the day. His interpretation of the opening allegro movement showed the great abilities of the player with marked prominence, the way in which the exquisite andante was played fairly charmed all who heard it, and the brilliant final allegro was a veritable triumph of skill and teennical proficiency. The audience quickly recognized the value of the player's work and recalled him three times upon the conclusion of the concerto.

Mr. Haydn made one of his happy efforts in the Hadyn symphony, bringing out its dainty beauties with great skill, and giving much pleasure by his conservative reading of the composition. The string players repeated their success of last season in the Paganini number, and the concert was brought to a brilliant ending by a splendid interpretation of the "Oberon" overture.

NOTES.

Marian Manola, Timothee Adamowski, E. Strasser, Paul Fox, the Harvard quartet and the Germania band appear at Music Hall on Sunday evening in the first of the popular concerts announced there.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 18.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

TOMORROW EVENING.

FIRST SUNDAY POPULAR CONCERT.

MARION MANOLA.
ADAMOWSKI.
Harvard Quartet.
E. STRASSER.
PAUL FOX.
Germania Orchestra.

Best Seats Only 50 Cents. Other Reserved Seats 25 and 35 Cents, now on Sale.

[20]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor. Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro assai
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in E flat, No. 5. Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Allegro.
PAGANINI.	MOTO PERPETUO, ALLEGRO DE CONCERT. (For all the Violins.)
WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The Music Hall popular concerts begin next Sunday evening for the winter season, and the opening programme will be contributed by Miss Marion Manola, Mr. T. Adamowski, the Harvard quartet and the Germania orchestra.

MUSIC HALL NEXT SUNDAY

Miss Marion Manola,
Mr. Timothie Adamowski.
The Harvard Quartet.
Mr. E. Strasser.
Mr. Paul Fox.
The Germania Orchestra.

Popular prices, 25, 35, 50 cents, including reserved seats. Tickets now on sale.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week, is: Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem Edlen Kreise," from "Tannhäuser," Wagner (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantino, and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaskowsky; songs, with piano; "Faint and Fainter is my Slumber," Brahms; "By the Sea," Schubert (Mr. Reichmann); Symphony No. 2, in D, Brahms.

The Cambridge Symphony concerts begin in Sanders Theatre tonight. The series will consist of eight concerts, for which season tickets can be bought for $6. Tonight's programme is: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Concerto for piano in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; "Mote Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; overture, "Oberon," Weber. The pianist is Mr. Franz Rummel, who has returned to the United States after an extended tour of foreign capitals.

The Palladium.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

HYPERION THEATER! NIKISCH.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the assistance of EMINENT SOLO ARTISTS.

Monday Evenings,

Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season Tickets, with best reserved seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT'S SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, October 27, at 9 a. m.

☞ No Subscription—First come first served.

o16 9t C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday, October 27, at nine o'clock in the morning, subscription tickets for a series of concerts to be given November 10, December 8, January 12, and February 23, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be on sale at M. Steinert & Son's Music store. The price is five dollars, which is very low for the delightful treats which are assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, OCT. 17.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

First Sunday Popular Concert,

NEXT SUNDAY, Oct. 19,

A great array of Musical Talent.

Miss Marion Manola, Only Appearance in Concert This Season.

T. Adamowski, The Famous Violin Soloist.

Harvard Quartet, In Several Popular Selections.

E. Strasser and Paul Rox,

The Celebrated Soloists, and the Full Germania Orchestra.

A great Programme. Popular Prices.

25c., 35c., 50c., Seats Now on Sale. BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

HYPERION THEATER. NIKISCH.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the assistance of

Eminent Solo Artists.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel Street, Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m.

☞ No Subscription—First come first served.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at 9 a. m.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1890

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The first of the series of concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat...Beethoven
Mr. Franz Rummel.
Moto Perpetuo.....Paganini
(For all the violins.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Deldevez summed up the whole matter in the case of Mozart's symphony in G minor when he characterized it as graceful, passionate and melancholy. Here science and inspiration go hand in hand. The most difficult technical problems—such as the reproduction in minor in the second reprise of the second melodic idea conceived originally in the major—are solved with apparent carelessness. Full as it is of the evidences of Mozart's contrapuntal skill, it is equally full of pure melody. This symphony is not an expression of metaphysical ideas; it is not programme-music; it does not try to paint any national or individual event or episode; it therefore furnishes no material for the rhapsodic utterances of those German critics who are only happy when they find everything in a musical composition except music. And yet, one man, a daring man named Elterlein, discovered that the andante expressed "a sentiment of consolation, not the repose of the soul in a firm conviction of interior joy, but rather a desire, a tendency towards it," whatever that may mean.

Now, because the music of Mozart is so musical, because it often seems so simple, it is extremely difficult to sing or to play; and when such a work as this G minor symphony is directed by a man of the temperament of Mr. Nikisch, its noble serenity at times becomes unmeaning sentimentalism, its natural, healthy passion is inflamed as though with blisters and drugs. Take the very opening of the first movement. Can anything be more simple, more direct than the first theme? But Mr. Nikisch did not seem to be content with the naked melody. He clothed it with gaudy garments, he gave it a coquettish air. He robbed a measure here, added to a measure there, and so he juggled with the whole allegro. The feverish unrest which he infused into the finale resulted in unsteadiness in the playing of the orchestra. Often there was an absence of the quiet delicacy and restrained passion which characterize the music of Mozart. And yet his reading of the work was interesting in spite of his exaggerations, and the greater part of the andante and the whole of the menuetto were delightful to hear.

Mr. Franz Rummel, who played the E flat concerto of Beethoven, in former years was a prominent disciple of the athletic school of pianists. His strength was formerly the dominating quality in his musical equipment; but he has changed, and last evening he gave a thoughtful and thoroughly musicianly performance of the great concerto. While it was admirable from a technical standpoint, his exhibition of technique was never obtrusive. His octave and pianissimo passages were superbly played, and in the passages where he exerted his strength the tone was never forced, was never unpleasant. Equally worthy of high praise was the manner in which he sank his own personality in the work of the composer. The orchestral accompaniment was a marked improvement upon that given Mr. Baermann a year ago.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch put the selection from Paganini upon the programme. The solemn preparation, the violinist's rising, the theatrical hush before the attack—all this was sensationalism pure and simple, unworthy of the occasion, the orchestra and the conductor. Nor was the music itself an excuse, however admirably it may have been performed.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The first of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place Monday evening, the 20th, at Union Hall, and the programme includes Svendsen's quartette in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's in A minor, op. 41. Mr. Theodor Reichmann will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art so Like a Flower."

EVENING REGISTER.

OCTOBER 15.

HYPERION THEATER. NIKISCH.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the Assistance Of

Eminent Solo Artists.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, Oct. 27th, at 9 A. M.

☞ No Subscription—First come first Served.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

New Haven Symphony Concerts.

Events always eagerly awaited by the musical public of this city are the annual concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Four performances will be given at the Hyperion theater during the coming season by this famous organization under direction of its distinguished Leipzic conductor Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with the assistance of the best available solo artists. The dates appointed for these attractive occasions are Monday evenings November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.

The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the series will be five dollars. No subscription list will be opened but tickets will go on sale at M. Steinert & Sons' music store on Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m. The recognized superiority of the Boston orchestra and the remembrance of its splendid performances in past seasons will doubtless ensure a very large attendance at these concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Reappearance of Franz Rummel, the Pianist.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, were begun last evening, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with Franz Rummel, the pianist, as soloist. The programme made for the evening included the symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for piano in E flat ("Emperor"), Beethoven; "Moto Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; and overture, "Oberon," Weber.

The reappearance here of Franz Rummel, after an absence of several years, made a peculiarly interesting event of the evening, and, in addition to the large audience from the university city, there was a large attendance of amateur and professional musicians from Boston, the pianist having many warm admirers here. His playing of the great "Emperor" concerto was a delightful musical treat, and richly rewarded those who ventured into the suburbs to enjoy it. He is such a thoroughly satisfying artist that the listener neglects to analyze the characteristics of his playing, and gives way to the mood of listening without reserve. He has his piano absolutely at his command, the technical difficulties being but matters of detail, and so he gives his whole being to an interpretation of the composer's idea.

His touch has all the delicacy of a woman's, with, when occasion demands, the breadth, vigor and vitality of the master, and he combines in his work more of the qualities demanded for enjoyable pianoforte playing than are possessed by one in a thousand of the solo players of the day. His interpretation of the opening allegro movement showed the great abilities of the player with marked prominence, the way in which the exquisite andante was played fairly charmed all who heard it, and the brilliant final allegro was a veritable triumph of skill and technical proficiency. The audience quickly recognized the value of the player's work and recalled him three times upon the conclusion of the concerto.

Mr. Haydn made one of his happy efforts in the Hadyn symphony, bringing out its dainty beauties with great skill, and giving much pleasure by his conservative reading of the composition. The string players repeated their success of last season in the Paganini number, and the concert was brought to a brilliant ending by a splendid interpretation of the "Oberon" overture.

NOTES.

Marian Manola, Timothee Adamowski, E. Strasser, Paul Fox, the Harvard quartet and the Germania band appear at Music Hall on Sunday evening in the first of the popular concerts announced there.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 18.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

TOMORROW EVENING.

FIRST SUNDAY POPULAR CONCERT.

MARION MANOLA.
ADAMOWSKI.
Harvard Quartet.
E. STRASSER.
PAUL FOX.
Germania Orchestra.

Best Seats Only 50 Cents. Other Reserved Seats 25 and 35 Cents, now on sale.

[20]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16TH, AT 7.45 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor. Allegro molto. — Andante. — Minuet. — Allegro assai.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE [illegible] Allegro. — Adagio ma poco mosso. — [illegible]
PAGANINI.	MOTO PERPETUO, [illegible] (For all the Violins.)
WEBER.	OVERTURE, "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The Music Hall popular concerts begin next Sunday evening for the winter season, and the opening programme will be contributed by Miss Marion Manola, Mr. T. Adamowski, the Harvard quartet and the Germania orchestra.

MUSIC HALL NEXT SUNDAY

Miss Marion Manola,
Mr. Timothie Adamowski.
The Harvard Quartet.
Mr. E. Strasser.
Mr. Paul Fox.
The Germania Orchestra.

Popular prices, 25, 35, 50 cents, including reserved seats. Tickets now on sale.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY OCTOBER 16, 1890.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week, is: Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem Edlen Kreise," from "Tannhäuser," Wagner (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantino, and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaskowsky; songs, with piano: "Faint and Fainter is my Slumber," Brahms; "By the Sea," Schubert (Mr. Reichmann); Symphony No. 2, in D, Brahms.

The Cambridge Symphony concerts begin in Sanders Theatre tonight. The series will consist of eight concerts, for which season tickets can be bought for $6. Tonight's programme is: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Concerto for piano in E flat (Emperor), Beethoven; "Moto Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; overture, "Oberon," Weber. The pianist is Mr. Franz Rummel, who has returned to the United States after an extended tour of foreign capitals.

The Palladium

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1890.

HYPERION THEATER!
NIKISCH.
BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,
With the assistance of EMINENT SOLO ARTISTS.
Monday Evenings,
Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season Tickets, with best reserved seats for the series, $5.
Sale opens at M. STEINERT'S SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, October 27, at 9 a. m.
☞No Subscription—First come first served.
o16 9t C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday, October 27, at nine o'clock in the morning, subscription tickets for a series of concerts to be given November 10, December 8, January 12, and February 28, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be on sale at M. Steinert & Son's Music store. The price is five dollars, which is very low for the delightful treats which are assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, OCT. 17.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

First Sunday Popular Concert,
NEXT SUNDAY, Oct. 19,
A great array of Musical Talent.

Miss Marion Manola, Only Appearance in Concert This Season.
T. Adamowski, The Famous Violin Soloist.
Harvard Quartet, In Several Popular Selections.
E. Strasser and Paul Rox,
The Celebrated Soloists, and the Full Germania Orchestra.
A great Programme. Popular Prices.
25c., 35c., 50c., Seats Now on Sale. BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PUBLISHED BY OCTOBER 15

HYPERION THEATER. NIKISCH.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,
With the assistance of
Eminent Solo Artists.
Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.
Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel Street, Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m.
☞No Subscription—First come first served.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at 9 a. m.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1890

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The first of the series of concerts to be given this season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat...Beethoven
Mr. Franz Rummel.
Moto Perpetuo.....Paganini
(For all the violins.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Deldevez summed up the whole matter in the case of Mozart's symphony in G minor when he characterized it as graceful, passionate and melancholy. Here science and inspiration go hand in hand. The most difficult technical problems—such as the reproduction in minor in the second reprise of the second melodic idea conceived originally in the major—are solved with apparent carelessness. Full as it is of the evidences of Mozart's contrapuntal skill, it is equally full of pure melody. This symphony is not an expression of metaphysical ideas; it is not programme-music; it does not try to paint any national or individual event or episode; it therefore furnishes no material for the rhapsodic utterances of those German critics who are only happy when they find everything in a musical composition except music. And yet, one man, a daring man named Elterlein, discovered that the andante expressed "a sentiment of consolation, not the repose of the soul in a firm conviction of interior joy, but rather a desire, a tendency towards it," whatever that may mean.

Now, because the music of Mozart is so musical, because it often seems so simple, it is extremely difficult to sing or to play; and when such a work as this G minor symphony is directed by a man of the temperament of Mr. Nikisch, its noble serenity at times becomes unmeaning sentimentalism, its natural, healthy passion is inflamed as though with blisters and drugs. Take the very opening of the first movement. Can anything be more simple, more direct than the first theme? But Mr. Nikisch did not seem to be content with the naked melody. He clothed it with gaudy garments, he gave it a coquettish air. He robbed a measure here, added to a measure there, and so he juggled with the whole allegro. The feverish unrest which he infused into the finale resulted in unsteadiness in the playing of the orchestra. Often there was an absence of the quiet delicacy and restrained passion which characterize the music of Mozart. And yet his reading of the work was interesting in spite of his exaggerations, and the greater part of the andante and the whole of the menuetto were delightful to hear.

Mr. Franz Rummel, who played the E flat concerto of Beethoven, in former years was a prominent disciple of the athletic school of pianists. His strength was formerly the dominating quality in his musical equipment; but he has changed, and last evening he gave a thoughtful and thoroughly musicianly performance of the great concerto. While it was admirable from a technical standpoint, his exhibition of technique was never obtrusive. His octave and pianissimo passages were superbly played, and in the passages where he exerted his strength the tone was never forced, was never unpleasant. Equally worthy of high praise was the manner in which he sank his own personality in the work of the composer. The orchestral accompaniment was a marked improvement upon that given Mr. Baermann a year ago.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch put the selection from Paganini upon the programme. The solemn preparation, the violinist's rising, the theatrical hush before the attack—all this was sensationalism pure and simple, unworthy of the occasion, the orchestra and the conductor. Nor was the music itself an excuse, however admirably it may have been performed.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The first of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place Monday evening, the 20th, at Union Hall, and the programme includes Svendsen's quartette in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's in A minor, op. 41. Mr. Theodor Reichmann will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art so Like a Flower."

.....

NEW HAVEN
MORNING REGISTER.
OCTOBER 15.

HYPERION THEATER. NIKISCH.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,
With the Assistance Of
Eminent Solo Artists.
Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.
Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, Oct. 27th, at 9 A. M.
☞No Subscription—First come first Served.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

New Haven Symphony Concerts.

Events always eagerly awaited by the musical public of this city are the annual concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Four performances will be given at the Hyperion theater during the coming season by this famous organization under direction of its distinguished Leipzic conductor Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with the assistance of the best available solo artists. The dates appointed for these attractive occasions are Monday evenings November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.

The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the series will be five dollars. No subscription list will be opened but tickets will go on sale at M. Steinert & Sons' music store on Monday, October 27th, at 9 a. m. The recognized superiority of the Boston orchestra and the remembrance of its splendid performances in past seasons will doubtless ensure a very large attendance at these concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Reappearance of Franz Rummel, the Pianist.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, were begun last evening, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and with Franz Rummel, the pianist, as soloist. The programme made for the evening included the symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for piano in E flat ("Emperor"), Beethoven: "Moto Perpetuo" (for all the violins), Paginini; and overture, "Oberon," Weber.

The reappearance here of Franz Rummel, after an absence of several years, made a peculiarly interesting event of the evening, and, in addition to the large audience from the university city, there was a large attendance of amateur and professional musicians from Boston, the pianist having many warm admirers here. His playing of the great "Emperor" concerto was a delightful musical treat, and richly rewarded those who ventured into the suburbs to enjoy it. He is such a thoroughly satisfying artist that the listener neglects to analyze the characteristics of his playing, and gives way to the mood of listening without reserve. He has his piano absolutely at his command, the technical difficulties being but matters of detail, and so he gives his whole being to an interpretation of the composer's idea.

His touch has all the delicacy of a woman's, with, when occasion demands, the breadth, vigor and vitality of the master, and he combines in his work more of the qualities demanded for enjoyable pianoforte playing than are possessed by one in a thousand of the solo players of the day. His interpretation of the opening allegro movement showed the great abilities of the player with marked prominence, the way in which the exquisite andante was played fairly charmed all who heard it, and the brilliant final allegro was a veritable triumph of skill and technical proficiency. The audience quickly recognized the value of the player's work and recalled him three times upon the conclusion of the concerto.

Mr. Haydn made one of his happy efforts in the Hadyn symphony, bringing out its dainty beauties with great skill, and giving much pleasure by his conservative reading of the composition. The string players repeated their success of last season in the Paganini number, and the concert was brought to a brilliant ending by a splendid interpretation of the "Oberon" overture.

NOTES.

Marian Manola, Timothee Adamowski, E. Strasser, Paul Fox, the Harvard quartet and the Germania band appear at Music Hall on Sunday evening in the first of the popular concerts announced there.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 18.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
TOMORROW EVENING.

FIRST SUNDAY POPULAR CONCERT.

MARION MANOLA.
ADAMOWSKI.
Harvard Quartet.
E. STRASSER.
PAUL FOX.
Germania Orchestra.

Best Seats Only 50 Cents. Other Reserved Seats 25 and 35 Cents, now on sale.

[20]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

On Monday Evenings, November 3d, December 1st, 1890, and January 5th, 1891.

::: THIRD SEASON. :::

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series, Three Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 27th, at 9, A. M. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

Clipping from
News, New Haven Conn.
Date 10/

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at

Clipping from Sun
Worcester Mass
Date 10-13

The first rehearsal of the season in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra took place last Friday afternoon, and the first regular concert Saturday evening in Music Hall. They were both brilliant performances. Mr. Nikisch when he took up the baton was welcomed back with prolonged applause. The principal features of the concert were the overture to Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The program for the next concert, this coming Saturday, includes the overture to Volkmann's "Richard III," two movements from Tschaikowsky's new fourth symphony, and Brahm's second symphony in D. The vocal soloist is to be Theodore Reichmann.

BOSTON STORE.
(Sole Agency for E. C. Burt & Co.'s Shoes.)
WORCESTER, Oct. 13, 1890.

The weather today...

THE EVENING STAR.
WASHINGTON:
SATURDAY.....October 4, 1890.
.....Editor.

CONVINCED THAT LARGE ... after not ... office. ... our ... of ... [illegible]

COMMONWEALTH.

OCTOBER 18, 1890

MUSIC.

Mr. Nikisch had no reason to doubt the sincerity of the welcome Boston gave him last week. It was unmistakably cordial. Rehearsal and concert audiences fell easily and naturally into the mood of hearing and enjoying the orchestra again.

The programme was chosen as a memorial of Otto Dresel, a musical recluse, formerly a public performer and teacher; a man of conservative habit, whose horizon in music had narrow boundaries, within which, however, he was both prophet and seer. Mr. Nikisch gave the "Heroic" Symphony a superb reading; broad in outline and noble in spirit, it was to the understanding an epitome of human existence. Somewhat less noteworthy was the performance of a typical Mendelssohn overture, the one suggested by a visit to Fingal's Cave. An archaic novelty was the third selection, a concerto for the violin, in D minor, by Bach. While not especially characteristic of the old cantor—it is an early work — it is sufficiently rigid and formal to claim relationship with the composer of the Passions and the preludes and fugues. The middle movement is melodically serene. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler played the solo portions very beautifully; the orchestration is meagre.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was admirable, and, for a first concert after the summer rest, unusually finished. A change has been made in the wind division, a new first horn succeeding Mr. Reiter. The new player has a sweet, sure and full tone, and will acceptably fill the place of the departed artist and poseur. Last year in the orchestra the tympani reached almost to the level of a solo position; the new drummer is an earnest gymnast.

At the concert of this week some new music, by Tchaikowsky, will be played, namely, the andantino and scherzo, from his fourth symphony.

Deserving recognition because of the excellent motive behind it, is the scheme of Sunday evening concerts by an orchestra Mr. Bernhard Listemann has organized. Popular, but musically good, programmes are the rule, and Mr. Listemann's interest in modern composers guarantees an eclectic choice, with an occasional novelty, in this department.

Poco a Poco.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 18, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The first Symphony concert cannot be said to have been a generally interesting one, and the dedication of it as an obituary memorial of Otto Dresel appealed to scarcely any persons outside of that function of the Four Hundred to which he belonged by marriage and fashionable patronage. An excellent musician and learned in some branches of musical literature, he did fine and needed service within narrow limits; but he was not a good pianist for the public and his temperament and his disposition were not elastic or broadly sympathetic. For the vast musical people of today he was but a name, and his influence, if it reaches them at all, can only do so in the chamber music and the severer classical works to which he devoted himself. In the open world of orchestral and popular music he was practically unknown, and apart from those students to whom he was able to be of peculiar use, the admiration which followed him came rather from those who felt it to be the thing to sit at the feet of a Gamaliel than from either the professors or the amateurs of music. As representing the fashionable patrons of the Symphony concerts this dedication of the first evening to him was a pretty tribute, but it made the time heavy and almost lugubrious for the majority of the audience. Mr. Nikisch read the "Hebrides" overture in an erratic and fragmentary way, which detracted both from its coherenec and its poetry; the "Eroica" symphony, not by any any means the easiest to hear of the Beethoven series, dragged a little heavily, although the funeral march had a beautiful movement; the other number, a previously unheard two-violin concerto by Bach, was exquisitely played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, but its protracted polyphony wearied the general ear, which would have liked and understood it better if it had not been given entire.

The first Sanders Theatre concert was given on Thursday evening, when that forceful and warm pianist, Mr. Rummel, made his rentrée in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, always a strong work in his repertory.

The programme for tonight is well laden with symphony music, two movements of a new work in that class by Tschaikowsky being added to the whole of Brahms's second. The barytone Reichmann will sing twice, and Volkmann's "Richard III" overture will be played.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The chamber concerts given during the season by the Kneisel Quartette represent the highest attainment in chamber-music. The choice of music for each evening unites some of the immortal classics with newest compositians which have the commendation of approved and peculiar talent to embrace the interest which novelty gives. The performance is always close upon perfection, as is easily assumed by the individual mastery of each player over his instrument and by the consonance of understanding and style. The first concert of the present series is announced for next Monday evening, and Union Hall will again be the chosen locality.

The Kneisel Quartette are to begin their new season of delightful chamber concerts on Monday next, using as they did last winter Union Hall, which proved none too large for their evergrowing patronage.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

[Oct. 18, 1890

Rumor has it that next year Higginson will back up the Bostonians for a season of forty weeks, and that for this purpose the Music Hall will be rearranged, with sloping floor and proper stage. If this is so there will be a new era of Music in Boston, in a new opera house.

In memory of Otto Dresel his favorites were selected for the first brace of Symphony concerts: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Mendelssohn's Hebrides Overture; Bach's Concerto for Two Violins, with Kneisel and and Loeffler as the soloists. There were flowers for Mr. Dresel's memory and in Director Nikisch's honor. In the program was a sketch of Dresel, written by John S. Dwight, who has also been of late protesting that people would enjoy the music more if they would study the analysis and score less while the concert is in progress.

[21]

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890

The First Symphony Concert.—Some one has recently characterized Otto Dresel as a most pronounced musical pessimist. I am not sure that I fully understand what the expression "musical pessimist" is meant to convey, but I should not hesitate for a moment to conclude from what Mr. Dwight says of him that he was, in every point of his nature, a most determined musical purist. If I am right I hold it a duty to keep him reverentially in remembrance as the gifted representative of a small class; so small, indeed, that I fear we shall suffer to no inconsiderable degree by his loss. It is the influence that has value beyond estimate. One must always have in mind when thinking of such a man as Otto Dresel, those words of the poet, Henrik Wergeland, who went about with his pockets filled with tree-seed which he planted here and there, saying, "No one knows what good may spring up from it!"

An ideal program, one after the heart of a classicist; tedious, no doubt, to an untutored, impatient listener; I can readily understand that, but full of interest and beauty to one who is in touch with such works, full of themes for reflection, themes that are picture-bringing; and when one's thoughts begin to weave with picture-bringing music of the classic order, then, if I may repeat the words of the poet Norseman: "No one knows what good may spring up from it."

The overture was well played. There is a wealth of sea scenes contained in it, ever mysterious, yet ever beautiful. Mendelssohn shows his strong artistic sense in the theme of this work. Listen attentively to it. Could any group of tones be more suggestive, not only of scene, but of possible dialogue? Now one instrument announces it, then another; like a sea-anemone, open to the sun, it wafts back and forth now here, now there; always in a new light yet always friendly, because it is the same theme we have known from the moment the violins announced the sustained F sharp; seeming to open the door to let slip the six tones that form the motive of the work.

The novelty was the D minor concerto by Bach, most artistically played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. What a strong, healthy sentiment there is about a melody by Bach; many of them are so rich that they seem to have been born a century later than his time, when the romantic school began to assert itself. It would certainly be a difficult matter for one unacquainted with the writings of this great contrapuntist to assign a period to such a work as the Adagio of this concerto. The one wonder about Bach is this: he is continually surprising us by greater riches than we thought him to possess. Who that accuses this Leipsig cantor of being pedantic, prolix and mathematically correct could listen to the Adagio I have just mentioned and say that any such characteristics are his? Bach's compositions possess a solidity, yet with it such delicacy that one wonders how the union of these apparently opposing forces was ever effected. It is architectural music, commanding, like the cathedral at Lincoln, seen from a distance, crowning the hill-top, asserting itself with a power that at once wins and conquers. Great and strong as it is without, how delicate, how full of art and beauty—yes, and of nobility, if one will but make it so—is the Angel Choir, that is, the melody. It is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood. If the average listener could and would learn to select from the wealth of melody it has to offer, a fragment that he could analyze, familiarize, make his own in every sense, he would then begin to discover in it the true nature and the true beauty.

A symphony concert audience is not the sum total of two thousand or more critical listeners. Patrons of these concerts are not students of musical technicalities, though it would do them no harm to gain many bits of knowledge, easily acquired, that would make them familiar in some degree with the nature of music. First, get into the music you seem to like, then the music you seem to like will get into you—but not before. Otherwise it only flows about you; its soothing, refreshing waves of tone please and, perhaps, bring pleasant fancies; they do much more. It is so difficult to listen aright. One may dwell with a picture for any length of time and study again and again all it has to offer; one may wander about an edifice and in a week or a month know something of its structure and of its value as the type of a style; but with music it is different. It is never present, but ever passing by. With every moment the first strains are farther and farther away. Memory and attention must be continually on the alert, otherwise the picture retained will be imperfect. Think of a hyssus unfolding before you, ever passing away, so that it leaves but a fragment to view; is it not a feat of memory and of keen attention to retain a definite picture of all its delicate beauty? It is even more difficult in music where there is required a high cultivation of the inner senses. It is so easy for the mind to turn away from its work, so easy for the listener to be distracted by any trivial happening or object—the lights, the people, the sounds foreign to the music that come forth now and again; that the thoughts move from the music, as it carves itself out of the silence, and fix upon the distracting cause, thus losing, perhaps only for a moment, but nevertheless losing, the continuity of the figure on the tone-hyssus that never ceases its onward motion—a stream of measured rhythm that flows but once by a given point.

But the public does not, need not, in fact, speculate deeply on music or how to listen to it. Music pleases; that is why the public is willing to pay for it. Unfortunately, nine-tenths of music study in America anticipates nothing further than this pleasure; and instead of cultivating the listener it simply multiplies him. I have said that it is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood by the music lover who is not a student. It abounds in such a wealth of melodies which could each be heard alone, would at once become the common property, that it requires the greatest skill to listen to them all, to distinguish and separate one from another, to note how they come and go, to follow attentively the wonderful dialogue of the orchestra where the timber is so manifold. It does not lessen one's pleasure to know much about what one listens to in music. It should naturally follow that the more knowledge the greater and purer gratification. One may become critical and ever seek to drag forth the remembrance of something better by way of comparison, yet I doubt if this act makes one half so miserable as it makes them upon whom it is continually inflicted. At one time in his career the Count, Charney, could see nothing in the finest silks but the worm that gave them; but later, the ugly worm left his mind picture and he learned to love the flower that grew between the stones in his prison yard. Even the music-lover may pass through that period.

Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very satisfactory manner; even the funeral march, which it is so difficult to sustain at proper tempo, was full of interest. I think it was played even better at the rehearsal on Friday than on Saturday evening. This, by the way, is a work that can make an impatient listener very miserable; one must become a part of it in order fully to comprehend its meaning.

If any part of the concert be open to criticism it was that in places the accompaniment to the violin concerto was too piano. This was noticeable only in places, however. To accompany well is one of the most pronounced abilities of Mr. Nikisch. It is heartily to be wished that more of Bach could be given by the symphony orchestra; there is plenty of available material.

Thomas Tapper.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

On MONDAY EVENINGS, November 3d, December 1st, 1890, and January 5th, 1891.

::: THIRD SEASON. :::

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series, Three Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 27th, at 9, A. M. Subscription now open at Music Hall.

Clipping from
News, New Haven Conn.
Date 10/

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at 9 a. m.

Clipping from Sun
Worcester Mass
Date 10-13

The first rehearsal of the season in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra took place last Friday afternoon, and the first regular concert Saturday evening in Music Hall. They were both brilliant performances. Mr. Nikisch when he took up the baton was welcomed back with prolonged applause. The principal features of the concert were the overture to Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The program for the next concert, this coming Saturday, includes the overture to Volkmann's "Richard III," two movements from Tschaikowsky's new fourth symphony, and Brahm's second symphony in D. The vocal soloist is to be Theodore Reichmann.

BOSTON STORE.
(Sole Agency for E. C. Burt & Co.'s Shoes.)

WORCESTER, Oct. 13, 1890.

The weather today was likely to

THE EVENING STAR.
WASHINGTON:
SATURDAY.....October 4, 1890.
THOSRY S. NOYES.....Editor.

BEING CONVINCED THAT LARGE Ticket Sales have been injurious to our, as we have decided from this time hereafter not to allow our store to be used as a general ticket office. will, however, be pleased to accommodate our and customers by selling for them, free of tickets for any church, charitable or other local where the sale will not be large enough with our legitimate business.
WILLIS & CO.

COMMONWEALTH.

OCTOBER 18, 1890

MUSIC.

Mr. Nikisch had no reason to doubt the sincerity of the welcome Boston gave him last week. It was unmistakably cordial. Rehearsal and concert audiences fell easily and naturally into the mood of hearing and enjoying the orchestra again.

The programme was chosen as a memorial of Otto Dresel, a musical recluse, formerly a public performer and teacher; a man of conservative habit, whose horizon in music had narrow boundaries, within which, however, he was both prophet and seer. Mr. Nikisch gave the "Heroic" Symphony a superb reading; broad in outline and noble in spirit, it was to the understanding an epitome of human existence. Somewhat less noteworthy was the performance of a typical Mendelssohn overture, the one suggested by a visit to Fingal's Cave. An archaic novelty was the third selection, a concerto for the violin, in D minor, by Bach. While not especially characteristic of the old cantor—it is an early work — it is sufficiently rigid and formal to claim relationship with the composer of the Passions and the preludes and fugues. The middle movement is melodically serene. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler played the solo portions very beautifully; the orchestration is meagre.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was admirable, and, for a first concert after the summer rest, unusually finished. A change has been made in the wind division, a new first horn succeeding Mr. Reiter. The new player has a sweet, sure and full tone, and will acceptably fill the place of the departed artist and poseur. Last year in the orchestra the tympani reached almost to the level of a solo position; the new drummer is an earnest gymnast.

At the concert of this week some new music, by Tchaikowsky, will be played, namely, the andantino and scherzo, from his fourth symphony.

Deserving recognition because of the excellent motive behind it, is the scheme of Sunday evening concerts by an orchestra Mr. Bernhard Listemann has organized. Popular, but musically good, programmes are the rule, and Mr. Listemann's interest in modern composers guarantees an eclectic choice, with an occasional novelty, in this department.

Poco a Poco.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 18, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The first Symphony concert cannot be said to have been a generally interesting one, and the dedication of it as an obituary memorial of Otto Dresel appealed to scarcely any persons outside of that function of the Four Hundred to which he belonged by marriage and fashionable patronage. An excellent musician and learned in some branches of musical literature, he did fine and needed service within narrow limits; but he was not a good pianist for the public and his temperament and his disposition were not elastic or broadly sympathetic. For the vast musical people of today he was but a name, and his influence, if it reaches them at all, can only do so in the chamber music and the severer classical works to which he devoted himself. In the open world of orchestral and popular music he was practically unknown, and apart from those students to whom he was able to be of peculiar use, the admiration which followed him came rather from those who felt it to be the thing to sit at the feet of a Gamaliel than from either the professors or the amateurs of music. As representing the fashionable patrons of the Symphony concerts this dedication of the first evening to him was a pretty tribute, but it made the time heavy and almost lugubrious for the majority of the audience. Mr. Nikisch read the "Hebrides" overture in an erratic and fragmentary way, which detracted both from its coherenec and its poetry; the "Eroica" symphony, not by any any means the easiest to hear of the Beethoven series, dragged a little heavily, although the funeral march had a beautiful movement; the other number, a previously unheard two-violin concerto by Bach, was exquisitely played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, but its protracted polyphony wearied the general ear, which would have liked and understood it better if it had not been given entire.

The first Sanders Theatre concert was given on Thursday evening, when that forceful and warm pianist, Mr. Rummel, made his rentrée in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, always a strong work in his repertory.

The programme for tonight is well laden with symphony music, two movements of a new work in that class by Tschaikowsky being added to the whole of Brahms's second. The barytone Reichmann will sing twice, and Volkmann's "Richard III" overture will be played.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The chamber concerts given during the season by the Kneisel Quartette represent the highest attainment in chamber-music. The choice of music for each evening unites some of the immortal classics with newest compositians which have the commendation of approved and peculiar talent to embrace the interest which novelty gives. The performance is always close upon perfection, as is easily assumed by the individual mastery of each player over his instrument and by the consonance of understanding and style. The first concert of the present series is announced for next Monday evening, and Union Hall will again be the chosen locality.

The Kneisel Quartette are to begin their new season of delightful chamber concerts on Monday next, using as they did last winter Union Hall, which proved none too large for their evergrowing patronage.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

[Oct. 18, 1890

Rumor has it that next year Higginson will back up the Bostonians for a season of forty weeks, and that for this purpose the Music Hall will be rearranged, with sloping floor and proper stage. If this is so there will be a new era of Music in Boston, in a new opera house.

In memory of Otto Dresel his favorites were selected for the first brace of Symphony concerts: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Mendelssohn's Hebrides Overture; Bach's Concerto for Two Violins, with Kneisel and and Loeffler as the soloists. There were flowers for Mr. Dresel's memory and in Director Nikisch's honor. In the program was a sketch of Dresel, written by John S. Dwight, who has also been of late protesting that people would enjoy the music more if they would study the analysis and score less while the concert is in progress.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890

The First Symphony Concert.—Some one has recently characterized Otto Dresel as a most pronounced musical pessimist. I am not sure that I fully understand what the expression "musical pessimist" is meant to convey, but I should not hesitate for a moment to conclude from what Mr. Dwight says of him that he was, in every point of his nature, a most determined musical purist. If I am right I hold it a duty to keep him reverentially in remembrance as the gifted representative of a small class; so small, indeed, that I fear we shall suffer to no inconsiderable degree by his loss. It is the influence that has value beyond estimate. One must always have in mind when thinking of such a man as Otto Dresel, those words of the poet, Henrik Wergeland, who went about with his pockets filled with tree-seed which he planted here and there, saying, "No one knows what good may spring up from it!"

An ideal program, one after the heart of a classicist; tedious, no doubt, to an untutored, impatient listener, I can readily understand that, but full of interest and beauty to one who is in touch with such works, full of themes for reflection, themes that are picture-bringing; and when one's thoughts begin to weave with picture-bringing music of the classic order, then, if I may repeat the words of the poet Norseman: "No one knows what good may spring up from it."

The overture was well played. There is a wealth of sea scenes contained in it, ever mysterious, yet ever beautiful. Mendelssohn shows his strong artistic sense in the theme of this work. Listen attentively to it. Could any group of tones be more suggestive, not only of scene, but of possible dialogue? Now one instrument announces it, then another: like a sea-anemone, open to the sun, it wafts back and forth now here, now there; always in a new light yet always friendly, because it is the same theme we have known from the moment the violins announced the sustained F sharp; seeming to open the door to let slip the six tones that form the motive of the work.

The novelty was the D minor concerto by Bach, most artistically played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. What a strong, healthy sentiment there is about a melody by Bach; many of them are so rich that they seem to have been born a century later than his time, when the romantic school began to assert itself. It would certainly be a difficult matter for one unacquainted with the writings of this great contrapuntist to assign a period to such a work as the Adagio of this concerto. The one wonder about Bach is this: he is continually surprising us by greater riches than we thought him to possess. Who that accuses this Leipsig cantor of being pedantic, prolix and mathematically correct could listen to the Adagio I have just mentioned and say that any such characteristics are his? Bach's compositions possess a solidity, yet with it such delicacy that one wonders how the union of these apparently opposing forces was ever effected. It is architectural music, commanding, like the cathedral at Lincoln, seen from a distance, crowning the hill-top, asserting itself with a power that at once wins and conquers. Great and strong as it is without, how delicate, how full of art and beauty—yes, and of nobility, if one will but make it so—is the Angel Choir, that is, the melody. It is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood. If the average listener could and would learn to select from the wealth of melody it has to offer, a fragment that he could analyze, familiarize, make his own in every sense, he would then begin to discover in it the true nature and the true beauty.

A symphony concert audience is not the sum total of two thousand or more critical listeners. Patrons of these concerts are not students of musical technicalities, though it would do them no harm to gain many bits of knowledge, easily acquired, that would make them familiar in some degree with the nature of music. First, get into the music you seem to like, then the music you seem to like will get into you—but not before. Otherwise it only flows about you; its soothing, refreshing waves of tone please and, perhaps, bring pleasant fancies; they do much more. It is so difficult to listen aright. One may dwell with a picture for any length of time and study again and again all it has to offer; one may wander about an edifice and in a week or a month know something of its structure and of its value as the type of a style; but with music it is different. It is never present, but ever passing by. With every moment the first strains are farther and farther away. Memory and attention must be continually on the alert, otherwise the picture retained will be imperfect. Think of a hyssus unfolding before you, ever passing away, so that it leaves but a fragment to view; is it not a feat of memory and of keen attention to retain a definite picture of all its delicate beauty? It is even more difficult in music where there is required a high cultivation of the inner senses. It is so easy for the mind to turn away from its work, so easy for the listener to be distracted by any trivial happening or object—the lights, the people, the sounds foreign to the music that come forth now and again; that the thoughts move from the music, as it carves itself out of the silence, and fix upon the distracting cause, thus losing, perhaps only for a moment, but nevertheless losing, the continuity of the figure on the tone-hyssus that never ceases its onward motion—a stream of measured rhythm that flows but once by a given point.

But the public does not, need not, in fact, speculate deeply on music or how to listen to it. Music pleases; that is why the public is willing to pay for it. Unfortunately, nine-tenths of music study in America anticipates nothing further than this pleasure; and instead of cultivating the listener it simply multiplies him. I have said that it is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood by the music lover who is not a student. It abounds in such a wealth of melodies which could each be heard alone, would at once become the common property, that it requires the greatest skill to listen to them all, to distinguish and separate one from another, to note how they come and go, to follow attentively the wonderful dialogue of the orchestra where the timber is so manifold. It does not lesson one's pleasure to know much about what one listens to in music. It should naturally follow that the more knowledge the greater and purer gratification. One may become critical and ever seek to drag forth the remembrance of something better by way of comparison, yet I doubt if this act makes one half so miserable as it makes them upon whom it is continually inflicted. At one time in his career the Count, Charney, could see nothing in the finest silks but the worm that gave them; but later, the ugly worm left his mind picture and he learned to love the flower that grew between the stones in his prison yard. Even the music-lover may pass through that period.

Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very satisfactory manner; even the funeral march, which it is so difficult to sustain at proper tempo, was full of interest. I think it was played even better at the rehearsal on Friday than on Saturday evening. This, by the way, is a work that can make an impatient listener very miserable; one must become a part of it in order fully to comprehend its meaning.

If any part of the concert be open to criticism it was that in places the accompaniment to the violin concerto was too piano. This was noticeable only in places, however. To accompany well is one of the most pronounced abilities of Mr. Nikisch. It is heartily to be wished that more of Bach could be given by the symphony orchestra; there is plenty of available material.

Thomas Tapper.

[21]

STEINERT HALL.

FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 3, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN D MINOR, No. 11. — HAYDN

a) WIEGENLIED. — FITZENHAGEN

b) THEME AND VARIATIONS. — KLINGEL

(FOR FOUR 'CELLI.)

MR. J. ADAMOWSKI.
MR. LEO SHULZ.
MR. G. CAMPANARI
MR. H. MINGELS.

QUARTET IN C MAJOR, OP. 61. — DVORAK

Clipping from
News, New Haven Conn.
Date 10/

The Symphony Concerts.

The event of the musical season which will engage the interest of the public will be the annual series of concerts at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra under direction of Arthur Nikisch the distinguished Leipzic conductor. Four concerts will be given on Monday evenings November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23. The management promise for these concerts, programs of great interest and variety and the appearance of solo artists of the first rank. The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts will be $5. Tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music store on Monday October 27, at

Clipping from
Sun
Worcester Mass
10-13
Date

The first rehearsal of the season in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra took place last Friday afternoon, and the first regular concert Saturday evening in Music Hall. They were both brilliant performances. Mr. Nikisch when he took up the baton was welcomed back with prolonged applause. The principal features of the concert were the overture to Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The program for the next concert, this coming Saturday, includes the overture to Goldmann's "Richard III," two movements from Tschaikowsky's new fourth symphony, and Brahm's second symphony in D. The vocal soloist is to be Mme. Lehmann.

BOSTON STORE.
(Agency for E. C. Burt & Co.'s Shoes.)
WORCESTER, Oct. 13, 1890.

EVENING STAR.
WASHINGTON:
October 4, 1890.
Editor.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 18, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The first Symphony concert cannot be said to have been a generally interesting one, and the dedication of it as an obituary memorial of Otto Dresel appealed to scarcely any persons outside of that function of the Four Hundred to which he belonged by marriage and fashionable patronage. An excellent musician and learned in some branches of musical literature, he did fine and needed service within narrow limits; but he was not a good pianist for the public and his temperament and his disposition were not elastic or broadly sympathetic. For the vast musical people of today he was but a name, and his influence, if it reaches them at all, can only do so in the chamber music and the severer classical works to which he devoted himself. In the open world of orchestral and popular music he was practically unknown, and apart from those students to whom he was able to be of peculiar use, the admiration which followed him came rather from those who felt it to be the thing to sit at the feet of a Gamaliel than from either the professors or the amateurs of music. As representing the fashionable patrons of the Symphony concerts this dedication of the first evening to him was a pretty tribute, but it made the time heavy and almost lugubrious for the majority of the audience. Mr. Nikisch read the "Hebrides" overture in an erratic and fragmentary way, which detracted both from its coherenec and its poetry; the "Eroica" symphony, not by any any means the easiest to hear of the Beethoven series, dragged a little heavily, although the funeral march had a beautiful movement; the other number, a previously unheard two-violin concerto by Bach, was exquisitely played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, but its protracted polyphony wearied the general ear, which would have liked and understood it better if it had not been given entire.

The first Sanders Theatre concert was given on Thursday evening, when that forceful and warm pianist, Mr. Rummel, made his rentrée in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, always a strong work in his repertory.

The programme for tonight is well laden with symphony music, two movements of a new work in that class by Tschaikowsky being added to the whole of Brahms's second. The barytone Reichmann will sing twice, and Volkmann's "Richard III" overture will be played.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The chamber concerts given during the season by the Kneisel Quartette represent the highest attainment in chamber-music. The choice of music for each evening unites some of the immortal classics with newest compositians which have the commendation of approved and peculiar talent to embrace the interest which novelty gives. The performance is always close upon perfection, as is easily assumed by the individual mastery of each player over his instrument and by the consonance of understanding and style. The first concert of the present series is announced for next Monday evening, and Union Hall will again be the chosen locality.

The Kneisel Quartette are to begin their new season of delightful chamber concerts on Monday next, using as they did last winter Union Hall, which proved none too large for their evergrowing patronage.

COMMONWEALTH.

OCTOBER 18, 1890

MUSIC.

Mr. Nikisch had no reason to doubt the sincerity of the welcome Boston gave him last week. It was unmistakably cordial. Rehearsal and concert audiences fell easily and naturally into the mood of hearing and enjoying the orchestra again.

The programme was chosen as a memorial of Otto Dresel, a musical recluse, formerly a public performer and teacher; a man of conservative habit, whose horizon in music had narrow boundaries, within which, however, he was both prophet and seer. Mr. Nikisch gave the "Heroic" Symphony a superb reading; broad in outline and noble in spirit, it was to the understanding an epitome of human existence. Somewhat less noteworthy was the performance of a typical Mendelssohn overture, the one suggested by a visit to Fingal's Cave. An archaic novelty was the third selection, a concerto for the violin, in D minor, by Bach. While not especially characteristic of the old cantor—it is an early work — it is sufficiently rigid and formal to claim relationship with the composer of the Passions and the preludes and fugues. The middle movement is melodically serene. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler played the solo portions very beautifully; the orchestration is meagre.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was admirable, and, for a first concert after the summer rest, unusually finished. A change has been made in the wind division, a new first horn succeeding Mr. Reiter. The new player has a sweet, sure and full tone, and will acceptably fill the place of the departed artist and poseur. Last year in the orchestra the tympani reached almost to the level of a solo position; the new drummer is an earnest gymnast.

At the concert of this week some new music, by Tchaikowsky, will be played, namely, the andantino and scherzo, from his fourth symphony.

Deserving recognition because of the excellent motive behind it, is the scheme of Sunday evening concerts by an orchestra Mr. Bernhard Listemann has organized. Popular, but musically good, programmes are the rule, and Mr. Listemann's interest in modern composers guarantees an eclectic choice, with an occasional novelty, in this department.

POCO A POCO.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

[OCT. 18, 1890

RUMOR has it that next year Higginson will back up the Bostonians for a season of forty weeks, and that for this purpose the Music Hall will be rearranged, with sloping floor and proper stage. If this is so there will be a new era of Music in Boston, in a new opera house.

IN memory of Otto Dresel his favorites were selected for the first brace of Symphony concerts: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Mendelssohn's Hebrides Overture; Bach's Concerto for Two Violins, with Kneisel and and Loeffler as the soloists. There were flowers for Mr. Dresel's memory and in Director Nikisch's honor. In the program was a sketch of Dresel, written by John S. Dwight, who has also been of late protesting that people would enjoy the music more if they would study the analysis and score less while the concert is in progress.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Some one has recently characterized Otto Dresel as a most pronounced musical pessimist. I am not sure that I fully understand what the expression "musical pessimist" is meant to convey, but I should not hesitate for a moment to conclude from what Mr. Dwight says of him that he was, in every point of his nature, a most determined musical purist. If I am right I hold it a duty to keep him reverentially in remembrance as the gifted representative of a small class; so small, indeed, that I fear we shall suffer to no inconsiderable degree by his loss. It is the influence that has value beyond estimate. One must always have in mind when thinking of such a man as Otto Dresel, those words of the poet, Henrik Wergeland, who went about with his pockets filled with tree-seed which he planted here and there, saying, "No one knows what good may spring up from it!"

An ideal program, one after the heart of a classicist; tedious, no doubt, to an untutored, impatient listener, I can readily understand that, but full of interest and beauty to one who is in touch with such works, full of themes for reflection, themes that are picture-bringing; and when one's thoughts begin to weave with picture-bringing music of the classic order, then, if I may repeat the words of the poet Norseman: "No one knows what good may spring up from it."

The overture was well played. There is a wealth of sea scenes contained in it, ever mysterious, yet ever beautiful. Mendelssohn shows his strong artistic sense in the theme of this work. Listen attentively to it. Could any group of tones be more suggestive, not only of scene, but of possible dialogue? Now one instrument announces it, then another: like a sea-anemone, open to the sun, it wafts back and forth now here, now there; always in a new light yet always friendly, because it is the same theme we have known from the moment the violins announced the sustained F sharp; seeming to open the door to let slip the six tones that form the motive of the work.

The novelty was the D minor concerto by Bach, most artistically played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. What a strong, healthy sentiment there is about a melody by Bach; many of them are so rich that they seem to have been born a century later than his time, when the romantic school began to assert itself. It would certainly be a difficult matter for one unacquainted with the writings of this great contrapuntist to assign a period to such a work as the Adagio of this concerto. The one wonder about Bach is this: he is continually surprising us by greater riches than we thought him to possess. Who that accuses this Leipsig cantor of being pedantic, prolix and mathematically correct could listen to the Adagio I have just mentioned and say that any such characteristics are his? Bach's compositions possess a solidity, yet with it such delicacy that one wonders how the union of these apparently opposing forces was ever effected. It is architectural music, commanding, like the cathedral at Lincoln, seen from a distance, crowning the hill-top, asserting itself with a power that at once wins and conquers. Great and strong as it is without, how delicate, how full of art and beauty—yes, and of nobility, if one will but make it so—is the Angel Choir, that is, the melody. It is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood. If the average listener could and would learn to select from the wealth of melody it has to offer, a fragment that he could analyze, familiarize, make his own in every sense, he would then begin to discover in it the true nature and the true beauty.

A symphony concert audience is not the sum total of two thousand or more critical listeners. Patrons of these concerts are not students of musical technicalities, though it would do them no harm to gain many bits of knowledge, easily acquired, that would make them familiar in some degree with the nature of music. First, get into the music you seem to like, then the music you seem to like will get into you—but not before. Otherwise it only flows about you; its soothing, refreshing waves of tone please and, perhaps, bring pleasant fancies; they do much more. It is so difficult to listen aright. One may dwell with a picture for any length of time and study again and again all it has to offer; one may wander about an edifice and in a week or a month know something of its structure and of its value as the type of a style; but with music it is different. It is never present, but ever passing by. With every moment the first strains are farther and farther away. Memory and attention must be continually on the alert, otherwise the picture retained will be imperfect. Think of a hyssus unfolding before you, ever passing away, so that it leaves but a fragment to view; is it not a feat of memory and of keen attention to retain a definite picture of all its delicate beauty? It is even more difficult in music where there is required a high cultivation of the inner senses. It is so easy for the mind to turn away from its work, so easy for the listener to be distracted by any trivial happening or object—the lights, the people, the sounds foreign to the music that come forth now and again; that the thoughts move from the music, as it carves itself out of the silence, and fix upon the distracting cause, thus losing, perhaps only for a moment, but nevertheless losing, the continuity of the figure on the tone-hyssus that never ceases its onward motion—a stream of measured rhythm that flows but once by a given point.

But the public does not, need not, in fact, speculate deeply on music or how to listen to it. Music pleases; that is why the public is willing to pay for it. Unfortunately, nine-tenths of music study in America anticipates nothing further than this pleasure; and instead of cultivating the listener it simply multiplies him. I have said that it is the very richness of classical music that causes it to be misunderstood by the music lover who is not a student. It abounds in such a wealth of melodies which could each be heard alone, would at once become the common property, that it requires the greatest skill to listen to them all, to distinguish and separate one from another, to note how they come and go, to follow attentively the wonderful dialogue of the orchestra where the timber is so manifold. It does not lesson one's pleasure to know much about what one listens to in music. It should naturally follow that the more knowledge the greater and purer gratification. One may become critical and ever seek to drag forth the remembrance of something better by way of comparison, yet I doubt if this act makes one half so miserable as it makes them upon whom it is continually inflicted. At one time in his career the Count, Charney, could see nothing in the finest silks but the worm that gave them; but later, the ugly worm left his mind picture and he learned to love the flower that grew between the stones in his prison yard. Even the music-lover may pass through that period.

Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very satisfactory manner; even the funeral march, which it is so difficult to sustain at proper tempo, was full of interest. I think it was played even better at the rehearsal on Friday than on Saturday evening. This, by the way, is a work that can make an impatient listener very miserable; one must become a part of it in order fully to comprehend its meaning.

If any part of the concert be open to criticism it was that in places the accompaniment to the violin concerto was too piano. This was noticeable only in places, however. To accompany well is one of the most pronounced abilities of Mr. Nikisch. It is heartily to be wished that more of Bach could be given by the symphony orchestra; there is plenty of available material.

THOMAS TAPPER.

[21]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

On the evenings of

Tuesday, October 21, Wednesdays, November 19, December 17, January 21, March 4, and Tuesday, April 7, at 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME

I

Season Tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the Series of Six Concerts, $5.00; single tickets, $1.25; now on sale at M. Steinert & Sons, 176 and 178 Westminster Street.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890.

The programme of the Symphony concert tonight in Music Hall: Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," Volkmann; Aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem edlen Kreise," from "Tannhauser," Wegner, (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor Tschaikowsky (first time in Boston); songs, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlumer," Brahms; "Am Meer," Schubert (Mr Reichmann); Symphony No. 2, in D Brahms.

A new scheme of popular Sunday evening concerts will be begun in Music Hall tomorrow night. The participants include the Germania Orchestra; Marion Manola, who sings well, and is seldom heard outside the theatre; Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violinist; the Harvard Male Quartet, and Messrs. Strasser and Fox of the Germanias. Low prices of admission will be charged, and the programme is bound to be pleasing.

***

Audiences en masse this season look very gay, for no girl who has any sort of eye for picturesqueness fails to wear a liberty scarf. I noticed the pretty effect, particularly at the Symphony rehearsal, where nearly every brunette was set off by a red or yellow liberty, and the fetching shades of pink made the fair fairer.

***

Mr. Symphony-Concert-Manager Ellis, if you are the responsible person, why in the world do you print it F. Mendelssohn, J. S. Bach and L. v. Beethoven? Not only is there no need for the initials, but they sound decidedly shoppy and pedantic. There is a J. S. Bach & Co., boot and shoe dealers, I believe; very excellent merchants no doubt; but why advertise them in your Symphony programme?

***

A sympathetic young creature exclaimed yesterday at the rehearsal: "I should think those double-basses would be awfully tired standing so long." Why, they don't stand, my dear; I guess your lorgnette is short focus.

***

It's worth going to the Symphony concerts to see the antics of the new kettledrum player. But, by George, there's method in his madness.

***

Mr. Huckerbarth, the new first horn, plays very well, but we shall never have another Xavier Reiter.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 20, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch made a distinct departure Saturday night in conducting and used the score in the direction of every number on the programme. There was no appreciable difference in the performance, and possibly Mr. Nikisch wished to show the audiences that he is equally at home, whether conducting with a score or without it. The orchestra certainly played admirably, and if the audiences thus far have been less enthusiastic than were those of last year, which has certainly been the case in the Saturday evening concerts, they have been good listeners and very likely just as appreciative listeners of the work of the orchestra. Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, which was the closing number, is full of the intricacies and characteristics of that composer, and the conductor had already given the audience a musical feast before the first movement of that symphony. So that it was not specially remarkable that a number of the auditors did not remain until the close of the concert. They missed, however, the grand final movement, which was given a rendition that came the nearest to electrifying the audience of anything that has been done this season.

The novelty of the concert was the performance of two movements, the andantino and scherzo, from the Symphony No. 4 of Tschaikowsky. The scherzo was especially interesting and beautiful, which was well rendered and gained the appreciation of the hearers. Volkmann's Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.," which is substantially a symphonic poem, was given an exceedingly realistic and careful reading by Mr. Nikisch, and was perhaps the finest thing done by the orchestra during the evening.

Theodor Reichmann was the soloist. His first number was the descriptive song of Wolfram at the tournament in "Tannhauser," from Wagner, and it was given with the breadth and careful interpretation that is expected of this artist. Evidently he had a cold, and his intonation seemed at times to be a little faulty, but one could forgive all that under the circumstances for the tender and artistic rendering of the Schubert song which he gave later, and which gained for him such an enthusiastic encore that he was obliged to sing another song. This he did gracefully and beautifully, and the accompaniments for this and the other songs by Mr. Reichmann were contributed by Mr. Nikisch in a careful and scholarly manner, but with no apparent enthusiasm. At the next concert there will be two symphonies, Haydn's No. 2 in D major and Schubert's in C major, with a Faust Overture by Wagner for an intermezzo. There will be no soloist.

Mr. Reichmann sings at the first concert of the Kneisel Quartette this evening and at the opening Symphony concert at Providence Tues-

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890.

First Sanders Theatre Concert.

On Thursday evening we felt drawn, by a certain mingled spell of memory and music, to the consecrated theatre of alma mater. Think what it was to an old "Pierian" boy of Harvard, far back in the thirties, whose earliest musical enthusiasms were with that callow crowd of flute-playing undergraduates, and with the pick of them, the old Pierian Sodality, which, though often reduced to the shadow of a name, has never to this day relaxed its traditional tenacity of life. Think what it was, recalling those days, to pass now under the leafy shades of what begins to call itself the University, and find one's self amid the peopled circles of that lovely amphitheatre, the eloquent and tuneful focus of the monumental, touching, grand memorial building which the pious hands of Harvard's sons have reared to the fragrant memory of their patriot dead, who gave their fresh young hearts and hopes and lives to freedom and their country! And what was it specially that drew us there? What but to hear a classical and noble feast of great orchestral music with the cultivated families, professors, students of the university, given by one of the completest, finest orchestras of the world, under the inspiring conductorship of Arthur Nikisch—the same Boston Symphony Orchestra which paid that beautiful tribute to the memory of Dresel in the Boston Music Hall last Saturday.

This bespeaks some musical growth at Harvard; at least a great development of taste and interest for music; an academic and a social atmosphere well tempered by a love for music, made earnest in the curriculum of the college by classes studying the art under an able and devoted musical professor. It was not so in that primitive flute-playing period. Who then dreamed of a symphonic orchestra equal to the interpretation of Mozart and Beethoven, Schubert and Mendelssohn and Schumann? Arranged for a dozen flutes with a "bass viol" (cello), now and then a horn or two, once (as we too well know) a clarinet, which, for the sake of a smooth tone, had the reed cut thick and cost the blower such a stress of wind as would not have lasted him until now to write about it, symphonies and overtures were quite impossible; German band marches, popular melodies, Scotch, English, Irish, etc., were practicable enough, and sometimes witching to the wakeful ears of fair listeners when the club went serenading, and hurried back, demoralized, you can imagine, to the tune "We won't go home till Morning."

Well, music among the students in those days was not much smiled upon by the higher powers. We cannot think of a single professor who loved it much himself or held it openly in honor. The freshman or sophomore who betrayed a passion for it was suspected. It interfered with studies, it bespoke a tendency to self-indulgence, it was fatal to moral purpose, it cast a mildew o'er the purity of youth, and so on. The flute playing therefore had the fatal charm of a truant occupation; it lived by sufferance, by stealth, or by defiance. Theoretically it was sub rosa, but practically, like all rampant weeds, it would assert itself. Perhaps the musical amateur of today, who knows not only his Beethoven, but his Brahms and all the 'owskys, will say that such mere fluting really earned its doubtful reputation and deserved to be rated by the professorial standard. But we are tempted to go back a few years farther in our reminiscences and add to what we have said about the meagre instrumental outfit of the old sodality, that once at least it did rejoice in an actual trombone; and that, too, played on exhibition day by one of our most venerable and honored citizens, who looked even then to freshman eyes almost as grave and dignified as now, the lineal descendant of the first governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company and leader among the first settlers of Boston. Amid all his public honors, we doubt not he is still a little proud of that trombone, and he has made good its promise in being to this day one of the heartiest and most appreciative friends and supporters of good music in the city of his fathers.

Well, so the fluting period drifted lazily along in its monotonous path until, in 1837, some of the past members of the club saw fit to organize the Harvard Musical Association, partly to cherish the old musical and social tie, partly to create a certain public opinion in behalf of music among educated men, and more especially to promote the recognition of the art in the college, and to give it its fair place among the "humanities" of a liberal education. Silently, in many ways, it had an influence upon the minds of the community, and did much to prepare the way for a full professorship of music, of which the present incumbent holds an honored place among the faculty. Now music is seriously taught and prized at Harvard. The Pierians, having outgrown the "piping times" of only flutes, have taken to the violin, and now make a pretty brave show as a full-fledged orchestra. And all this is part and parcel of the musical movement in Cambridge, which culminates in the fine symphony concert of which we were beginning to speak. So to the visionary flood of college reminiscences we must say: "Claudite jam rivos," and keep room for a few words of the impression which the concert made on us. Here is the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat ("Emperor")..Beethoven
Concert Allegro: "Moto Perpetuo" (by all the violins).....Paganini
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Mr. Franz Rummell was the pianist.

This is an excellent programme; the musical matter choice, consistent and congenial, with good contrast,—all with one exception. The "Moto perpetuo," although played in wonderful unison by all those violins, is still a Paganini show-piece; underscored by all the violins in the universe. It is just that—nothing more; a piece of virtuoso music used in this case to show the finish and precision of the "four and twenty fiddlers" of the Boston orchestra, who needed not that proof; for what they did in the Bach concerto for two violins a few nights before was equally convincing, while much more worthy of their mettle.

The perfect Mozart symphony in G minor will always be a model in its way. Its themes, so simple and so clear, yet containing so much in embryo; the wonderful musicianship employed in their subtle, beautiful development; the all-pervading melody with which the individual parts intertwine so gracefully; the pure, chaste harmony; the instrumentation, alike rich and warm and delicate, all combine to give it a spontaneous air and movement, and make it one of the finest instances of the art that conceals art. In this it is truly Mozartian. It is a [illegible] with [illegible] employs fewer instruments, [illegible] every instrument tells. It does not strive [illegible] for startling grandiose effects; but every listener who is musically susceptible is held delighted to the end. The tone of sentiment, serene, sincere, sweet, mildly melancholy, surging sometimes to impassioned climaxes, revealing a nature at once warm, deep and exquisitely refined, sustains itself throughout, relieved by many an effective contrast. You think you hear a simple tale, yet it unfolds itself with all the magical devices of consummate contrapuntal art. The execution by Mr. Nikisch's fine orchestra was all clear and delicate, finely shaded, nothing overdone, a fair and true reflection, as in a pure mirror, of Mozart's conception; the light parts and the strong parts came out equally well. Doubtless the effect was not a little favored, for so small a symphony, by the acoustics of that beautiful theatre, small beside the Boston Music Hall. It was also favored by the sympathetic hearing of so choice a public.

The great Beethoven concerto was as good a thing as possible to follow such a work of Mozart. Mr. Rummel returns to us, after some half a dozen years, much toned down from his old tendency to a too muscular exaggeration of fortissimo. He has still all the strength required and plenty in reserve. He presented the concerto thoroughly and most judiciously, artistically thought out and mastered, in all its strength and power, while feeling his way into the heart of its most delicate bits of finesse with a sensitive and subtle finger. It was in all respects an admirable and masterly interpretation of the work on his part as well as on that of the orchestra.

Weber's romantic and imaginative overture made just the fit finale after the two great works. (We will consider the Paganini freak—beautifully as the flock of humming birds kept poised on tiny, rapidly fluttering wings, so coolly pianissimo, anon warming into a crescendo—as an interpolation not belonging to the concert). We never heard the Oberon more finely, delicately played. It had all the wonder, all the dreaminess, all the chivalric ardor. The horn passages were perfect. J. S. D.

In the Music Hall tomorrow night the first of a series of popular concerts will be given by Marian Manola, Timothee Adamowski, E. Strasser, Paul Fox, the Harvard Quartet and the Germania Band. The programme promises pleasant diversion of a musical sort.

The Kneisel Quartet will give six concerts of chamber music in Union Hall on Monday evening, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Mr. Theodor Reichmann is engaged for the first concert next Monday night, and will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art So Like a Flower." The instrumental works promised are Svendsen's Quartet in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's Quartet in A minor, op. 41.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall. The dates are Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. Subscriptions for course tickets received at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, OCT. 20, 1890.

MANOLA AT MUSIC HALL.

Jack Mason Was There, the Observed of All Observers.

The Music Hall Sunday "Pops" opened for the season of 1890-91 last evening with an excellent concert by the full Germania orchestra, under the leadership of Emil Mollenhauer; Adamowski, the violinist; Miss Marion Manola; the Harvard male quartet; Paul Fox, flutist; E. Strasser, saxophone soloist, and Leon Keach, accompanist.

Miss Manola was the star attraction, naturally enough, for "Jack" Mason's dismissal from the Museum, and the consequent coupling of her name with that of the favorite young actor had advertised her in a most sensational manner. It was also to be expected that "Jack" would put in an appearance at the concert. He was the observed of all observers, sitting in the first balcony at the left of the hall, near the stage, where he could receive the sweet smiles of the fair soprano as she made her exit after singing.

A handsome bouquet of roses, presumably from Mr. Mason, was passed to her by an usher after her first song, and she made her reappearance to sing an encore verse with a rose from the bunch in her hand. A recall was accorded her for each of her three songs.

At the close of the concert the waiting crowd at the Winter st. exit, principally composed of the fair sex, was much disappointed when Mr. Mason and his friends drove away without Miss Manola. One persistent woman followed their carriage, breathless and umbrellaless, on the run, and was rewarded by seeing it turn into Hamilton pl., where Miss Manola was met at the doorway by "Jack," who solicitously shielded her uncovered head from the falling rain while he escorted her to the carriage in waiting.

The party in the balcony with Mr. Mason included his solicitor, Lawyer Pattee, Mr. Simmons and Miss Bemis, the compagnon de voyage of Miss Manola.

Liberal applause was received by each number, and the concert seemed to suit the popular taste exactly. The orchestra was all that could be desired, Mr. Adamowski played with feeling and force, a pleasing duet was rendered by Messrs. Fox and Strasser, and the Harvard quartet was recalled with each appearance.

[22]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

On the evenings of

Tuesday, October 21, Wednesdays, November 19, December 17, January 21, March 4, and Tuesday, April 7, at 8 o'clock.

Season Tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the Series of Six Concerts, $5.00; single tickets, $1.25; now on sale at M. Steinert & Sons, 176 and 178 Westminster Street.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890.

The programme of the Symphony concert tonight in Music Hall: Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," Volkmann; Aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem edlen Kreise," from "Tannhauser," Wegner, (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor Tschaikowsky (first time in Boston); songs, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlumer," Brahms; "Am Meer," Schubert (Mr Reichmann); Symphony No. 2, in D Brahms.

A new scheme of popular Sunday evening concerts will be begun in Music Hall tomorrow night. The participants include the Germania Orchestra; Marion Manola, who sings well, and is seldom heard outside the theatre; Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violinist; the Harvard Male Quartet, and Messrs. Strasser and Fox of the Germanias. Low prices of admission will be charged, and the programme is bound to be pleasing.

***

Audiences en masse this season look very gay, for no girl who has any sort of eye for picturesqueness fails to wear a liberty scarf. I noticed the pretty effect, particularly at the Symphony rehearsal, where nearly every brunette was set off by a red or yellow liberty, and the fetching shades of pink made the fair fairer.

***

Mr. Symphony-Concert-Manager Ellis, if you are the responsible person, why in the world do you print it F. Mendelssohn, J. S. Bach and L. v. Beethoven? Not only is there no need for the initials, but they sound decidedly shoppy and pedantic. There is a J. S. Bach & Co., boot and shoe dealers, I believe; very excellent merchants no doubt; but why advertise them in your Symphony programme?

***

A sympathetic young creature exclaimed yesterday at the rehearsal: "I should think those double-basses would be awfully tired standing so long." Why, they don't stand, my dear; I guess your lorgnette is short focus.

***

It's worth going to the Symphony concerts to see the antics of the new kettle-drum player. But, by George, there's method in his madness.

***

Mr. Hackerbarth, the new first horn, plays very well, but we shall never have another Xavier Reiter.

***

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 20, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch made a distinct departure Saturday night in conducting and used the score in the direction of every number on the programme. There was no appreciable difference in the performance, and possibly Mr. Nikisch wished to show the audiences that he is equally at home, whether conducting with a score or without it. The orchestra certainly played admirably, and if the audiences thus far have been less enthusiastic than were those of last year, which has certainly been the case in the Saturday evening concerts, they have been good listeners and very likely just as appreciative listeners of the work of the orchestra. Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, which was the closing number, is full of the intricacies and characteristics of that composer, and the conductor had already given the audience a musical feast before the first movement of that symphony. So that it was not specially remarkable that a number of the auditors did not remain until the close of the concert. They missed, however, the grand final movement, which was given a rendition that came the nearest to electrifying the audience of anything that has been done this season.

The novelty of the concert was the performance of two movements, the andantino and scherzo, from the Symphony No. 4 of Tschaikowsky. The scherzo was especially interesting and beautiful, which was well rendered and gained the appreciation of the hearers. Volkmann's Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.," which is substantially a symphonic poem, was given an exceedingly realistic and careful reading by Mr. Nikisch, and was perhaps the finest thing done by the orchestra during the evening.

Theodor Reichmann was the soloist. His first number was the descriptive song of Wolfram at the tournament in "Tannhauser," from Wagner, and it was given with the breadth and careful interpretation that is expected of this artist. Evidently he had a cold, and his intonation seemed at times to be a little faulty, but one could forgive all that under the circumstances for the tender and artistic rendering of the Schubert song which he gave later, and which gained for him such an enthusiastic encore that he was obliged to sing another song. This he did gracefully and beautifully, and the accompaniments for this and the other songs by Mr. Reichmann were contributed by Mr. Nikisch in a careful and scholarly manner, but with no apparent enthusiasm. At the next concert there will be two symphonies, Haydn's No. 2 in D major and Schubert's in C major, with a Faust Overture by Wagner for an intermezzo. There will be no soloist.

Mr. Reichmann sings at the first concert of the Kneisel Quartette this evening and at the opening Symphony concert at Providence Tues-

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1890.

First Sanders Theatre Concert.

On Thursday evening we felt drawn, by a certain mingled spell of memory and music, to the consecrated theatre of alma mater. Think what it was to an old "Pierian" boy of Harvard, far back in the thirties, whose earliest musical enthusiasms were with that callow crowd of flute-playing undergraduates, and with the pick of them, the old Pierian Sodality, which, though often reduced to the shadow of a name, has never to this day relaxed its traditional tenacity of life. Think what it was, recalling those days, to pass now under the leafy shades of what begins to call itself the University, and find one's self amid the peopled circles of that lovely amphitheatre, the eloquent and tuneful focus of the monumental, touching, grand memorial building which the pious hands of Harvard's sons have reared to the fragrant memory of their patriot dead, who gave their fresh young hearts and hopes and lives to freedom and their country! And what was it specially that drew us there? What but to hear a classical and noble feast of great orchestral music with the cultivated families, professors, students of the university, given by one of the completest, finest orchestras of the world, under the inspiring conductorship of Arthur Nikisch—the same Boston Symphony Orchestra which paid that beautiful tribute to the memory of Dresel in the Boston Music Hall last Saturday.

This bespeaks some musical growth at Harvard; at least a great development of taste and interest for music; an academic and a social atmosphere well tempered by a love for music, made earnest in the curriculum of the college by classes studying the art under an able and devoted musical professor. It was not so in that primitive flute-playing period. Who then dreamed of a symphonic orchestra equal to the interpretation of Mozart and Beethoven, Schubert and Mendelssohn and Schumann? Arranged for a dozen flutes with a "bass viol" ('cello), now and then a horn or two, once (as we too well know) a clarinet, which, for the sake of a smooth tone, had the reed cut thick and cost the blower such a stress of wind as would not have lasted him until now to write about it, symphonies and overtures were quite impossible; German band marches, popular melodies, Scotch, English, Irish, etc., were practicable enough, and sometimes witching to the wakeful ears of fair listeners when the club went serenading, and hurried back, demoralized, you can imagine, to the tune "We won't go home till Morning."

Well, music among the students in those days was not much smiled upon by the higher powers. We cannot think of a single professor who loved it much himself or held it openly in honor. The freshman or sophomore who betrayed a passion for it was suspected. It interfered with studies, it bespoke a tendency to self-indulgence, it was fatal to moral purpose, it cast a mildew o'er the purity of youth, and so on. The flute playing therefore had the fatal charm of a truant occupation; it lived by sufferance, by stealth, or by defiance. Theoretically it was sub rosa, but practically, like all rampant weeds, it would assert itself. Perhaps the musical amateur of today, who knows not only his Beethoven, but his Brahms and all the 'owskys, will say that such mere fluting really earned its doubtful reputation and deserved to be rated by the professorial standard. But we are tempted to go back a few years farther in our reminiscences and add to what we have said about the meagre instrumental outfit of the old sodality, that once at least it did rejoice in an actual trombone; and that, too, played on exhibition day by one of our most venerable and honored citizens, who looked even then to freshman eyes almost as grave and dignified as now, the lineal descendant of the first governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company and leader among the first settlers of Boston. Amid all his public honors, we doubt not he is still a little proud of that trombone, and he has made good its promise in being to this day one of the heartiest and most appreciative friends and supporters of good music in the city of his fathers.

Well, so the fluting period drifted lazily along in its monotonous path until, in 1837, some of the past members of the club saw fit to organize the Harvard Musical Association, partly to cherish the old musical and social tie, partly to create a certain public opinion in behalf of music among educated men, and more especially to promote the recognition of the art in the college, and to give it its fair place among the "humanities" of a liberal education. Silently, in many ways, it had an influence upon the minds of the community, and did much to prepare the way for a full professorship of music, of which the present incumbent holds an honored place among the faculty. Now music is seriously taught and prized at Harvard. The Pierians, having outgrown the "piping times" of only flutes, have taken to the violin, and now make a pretty brave show as a full-fledged orchestra. And all this is part and parcel of the musical movement in Cambridge, which culminates in the fine symphony concert of which we were beginning to speak. So to the visionary flood of college reminiscences we must say: "Claudite jam rivos," and keep room for a few words of the impression which the concert made on us. Here is the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat ("Emperor").. Beethoven
Concert Allegro: "Moto Perpetuo" (by all the violins).....Paganini
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Mr. Franz Rummell was the pianist.

This is an excellent programme; the musical matter choice, consistent and congenial, with good contrast,—all with one exception. The "Moto perpetuo," although played in wonderful unison by all those violins, is still a Paganini show-piece; underscored by all the violins in the universe, it is just that—nothing more; a piece of virtuoso music used in this case to show the finish and precision of the "four and twenty fiddlers" of the Boston orchestra, who needed not that proof; for what they did in the Bach concerto for two violins a few nights before was equally convincing, while much more worthy of their mettle.

The perfect Mozart symphony in G minor will always be a model in its way. Its themes, so simple and so clear, yet containing so much in embryo; the wonderful musicianship employed in their subtle, beautiful development; the all-pervading melody with which the individual parts intertwine so gracefully; the pure, chaste harmony; the instrumentation, alike rich and warm and delicate, all combine to give it a spontaneous air and movement, and make it one of the finest instances of the art that conceals art. In this it is truly Mozartian. It is a compared with many modern, more pretentious ones: it employs fewer instruments, but in it every instrument tells. It does not strike out for startling grandiose effects; but every listener who is musically susceptible is held delighted to the end. The tone of sentiment, serene, sincere, sweet, mildly melancholy, surging sometimes to impassioned climaxes, revealing a nature at once warm, deep and exquisitely refined, sustains itself throughout, relieved by many an effective contrast. You think you hear a simple tale, yet it unfolds itself with all the magical devices of consummate contrapuntal art. The execution by Mr. Nikisch's fine orchestra was all clear and delicate, finely shaded, nothing overdone, a fair and true reflection, as in a pure mirror, of Mozart's conception; the light parts and the strong parts came out equally well. Doubtless the effect was not a little favored, for so small a symphony, by the acoustics of that beautiful theatre, small beside the Boston Music Hall. It was also favored by the sympathetic hearing of so choice a public.

The great Beethoven concerto was as good a thing as possible to follow such a work of Mozart. Mr. Rummel returns to us, after some half a dozen years, much toned down from his old tendency to a too muscular exaggeration of fortissimo. He has still all the strength required and plenty in reserve. He presented the concerto thoroughly and most judiciously, artistically thought out and mastered, in all its strength and power, while feeling his way into the heart of its most delicate bits of finesse with a sensitive and subtle finger. It was in all respects an admirable and masterly interpretation of the work on his part as well as on that of the orchestra.

Weber's romantic and imaginative overture made just the fit finale after the two great works. (We will consider the Paganini freak—beautifully as the flock of humming birds kept poised on tiny, rapidly fluttering wings, so coolly pianissimo, anon warming into a crescendo—as an interpolation not belonging to the concert). We never heard the Oberon more finely, delicately played. It had all the wonder, all the dreaminess, all the chivalric ardor. The horn passages were perfect. J. S. D.

In the Music Hall tomorrow night the first of a series of popular concerts will be given by Marian Manola, Timothee Adamowski, E. Strasser, Paul Fox, the Harvard Quartet and the Germania Band. The programme promises pleasant diversion of a musical sort.

The Kneisel Quartet will give six concerts of chamber music in Union Hall on Monday evening, Oct. 20, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 9. Mr. Theodor Reichmann is engaged for the first concert next Monday night, and will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art So Like a Flower." The instrumental works promised are Svendsen's Quartet in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's Quartet in A minor, op. 41.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall. The dates are Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. Subscriptions for course tickets received at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, OCT. 20, 1890.

MANOLA AT MUSIC HALL.

Jack Mason Was There, the Observed of All Observers.

The Music Hall Sunday "Pops" opened for the season of 1890-91 last evening with an excellent concert by the full Germania orchestra, under the leadership of Emil Mollenhauer; Adamowski, the violinist; Miss Marion Manola; the Harvard male quartet; Paul Fox, flutist; E. Strasser, saxophone soloist, and Leon Keach, accompanist.

Miss Manola was the star attraction, naturally enough, for "Jack" Mason's dismissal from the Museum, and the consequent coupling of her name with that of the favorite young actor had advertised her in a most sensational manner. It was also to be expected that "Jack" would put in an appearance at the concert. He was the observed of all observers, sitting in the first balcony at the left of the hall, near the stage, where he could receive the sweet smiles of the fair soprano as she made her exit after singing.

A handsome bouquet of roses, presumably from Mr. Mason, was passed to her by an usher after her first song, and she made her reappearance to sing an encore verse with a rose from the bunch in her hand. A recall was accorded her for each of her three songs.

At the close of the concert the waiting crowd at the Winter st. exit, principally composed of the fair sex, was much disappointed when Mr. Mason and his friends drove away without Miss Manola. One persistent woman followed their carriage, breathless and umbrellaless, on the run, and was rewarded by seeing it turn into Hamilton pl., where Miss Manola was met at the doorway by "Jack," who solicitously shielded her uncovered head from the falling rain while he escorted her to the carriage in waiting.

The party in the balcony with Mr. Mason included his solicitor, Lawyer Pattee, Mr. Simmons and Miss Bemis, the compagnon de voyage of Miss Manola.

Liberal applause was received by each number, and the concert seemed to suit the popular taste exactly. The orchestra was all that could be desired, Mr. Adamowski played with feeling and force, a pleasing duet was rendered by Messrs. Fox and Strasser, and the Harvard quartet was recalled with each appearance.

...TIMES
...ON, SUNDAY, OCT. 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SECOND CONCERT.

...second Symphony concert in Music ... last evening the programme was: ...Volkmann—Overture to Shakespeare's "Rich... ...Wagner, Aria, from "Tannhaeuser"; ...Tschaikowsky—Andantino and Scherzo from ...Symphony No. 4, in F minor; Songs—Brahms, ..."Wenn der leiser wird mein Schlummer;" Schubert, ..."Am Meer," Drahms—Symphony No. 2, in D ...

...playing as a rule was much better than ...the previous concert, except that the first ...clarinet was chronically flat throughout, and ...the kettle drummer pounded his drums as ...though it were his chief object to call ...attention to the fact that as the least ...musical member of the orchestra, he can ...almost make the most noise. Otherwise the ...overture was well played, and with considera... ...of the old-time unity and precision for ...which the orchestra has been noted. The Volk... ...overture does not gain with ...repeated hearings. Liszt would have ...called it a symphonic poem, and ...it is markedly suggestive of the extrinsic ...features of the Liszt so-called symphonic ...poems, excepting the interpolation of "The ...Campbells are Comin'," with which tune the ...composer apparently makes several attempts ...to do something ingenious, but fails.

The novelty of the programme was the Tschaikowsky symphony. Mr. Nikisch is entitled to any musician's gratitude for only giving two movements of the work, if its andante and scherzo are to be regarded as samples of Tschaikowsky's symphonic writing. The orchestration is simply tricky in covering a multitude of sins, and intrinsically considered the andantino is open to the charge of being both tawdry and vulgar, while in the scherzo there is in this respect but little improvement.

Herr Reichman's singing was as usual effective. It was neither his or the harpist's fault that the Wagner Aria was heard at a woful disadvantage, as, while they were in agreement as regards intonation, the remaining ensemble was persistently out of tune. The concert ended with the Brahms symphony, No. 2.

ANENT THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartette concerts for the present season are announced, and many season tickets for the series have doubtless been sold. This is as it should be. Chamber concerts of the right kind are an indispensable source of musical education to students of all grades; to the right-thinking amateur also; in fact, to one and all who desire to cultivate a taste for the purest and best music; and the purest and best music is none too good; it refines, it elevates, it ennobles. Thus do Messrs. Kneisel and his artistic associates refine, elevate and ennoble. All honor and all encouragement to such artists; and who shall say that such honor and encouragement are not best expressed through the enterprise in behalf of the Kneisel quartette that Messrs. Ellis and Comee of Boston Music hall are showing? Musicians in this vicinity who cannot attend such a series of concerts may well have cause for regret, for such as can and will attend become thereby far better musicians. Keep up with the times and be with the times at their best. This is one of the most important duties that the true-art lover has to perform. Bear well in mind therefore the following:

The first of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place tomorrow evening at Union hall, and the programme includes Svendsen's quartette in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's in A minor, op. 41. Mr. Theodor Reichmann will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art so Like a Flower."

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 19.

The Symphony Concerts.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was not especially interesting or enlivening, as far as the programme was concerned. In fact it was rather tiresome. The work of the orchestra was steadily fine throughout, and was almost up to its best standard. The brass wind has not yet quite fallen well into the traces and is prone to be a little coarse and blaring, especially its trumpets which in the closing portions of the first movement gave vent to the meanest and most vulgar quality of tone of which the instrument is capable. The Volkmann "Richard III." overture, with which the concert opened, does not improve upon acquaintance. All that there is to hear in it is discovered in a first hearing, and listening to it a second time finds the interest in it dulled. The introduction of the Scotch air, "The Campbells are Coming," still baffles understanding, to say nothing of the difficulty of discovering the meaning of the music in its application to the Shakspearian tragedy, what it typifies, what impression it is intended to convey. Of course, the mighty drum beat toward the end of the overture is the deathblow of the crook-back tyrant. The new drummer gave him this blow with such herculean force that it should have killed him on the spot. It is to be regretted that it failed to do so, and thus made the long-drawn, lugubrious death-strains that followed possible. The work is strong and musicianly, but it is ineffably dry and wearisome. The novelty of the programme was two movements, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, never heard here before. The andantino is very graceful and melodious, clean and flowing in its polyphony, and charming in effect generally. It is full of color and variety, and is beautifully scored. The movement was exquisitely played, especially by the wood wind. The scherzo is bright, ingenious and original, but it is not as interesting as the other movement, and if the trickiness of the orchestration were taken away and the underlying idea heard in its nakedness there would be but little left. The programme imparts some very remarkable information about this movement. It says: "The explanatory phrase, pizzicato ostinato, appended to the scherzo movement, indicates the continuous use of some distinctive melodial figure or groups of notes, the strings being pinched or twitched with the finger producing a staccato effect, the other instruments for the most part being blown or struck staccato." This is news indeed. Pizzicato ostinato simply means constant picking of the strings. It has nothing to do with any "distinctive melodial figure," whatever that may mean, and has no possible relation to "the other instruments," which, cannot be played pizzicato: "The other instruments for the most part, being blown or struck staccato," is a gem. The only "other instrument" that can be struck staccato is the drum. As for wind instruments, they cannot be blown staccato. Later on the notice alludes to pizzicato chords in the strings and soft brasses, which is simply idiotic. A little more sense and much less gush and nonsense in the programmes would leave the general reader in a much more happy frame of mind. The concert ended with a masterly reading and performance of Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, in D major. The lovely allegretto was exquisitely given, and the finale was played with greater fire and dash, notably in its closing moments, where the brasses are devoted to a brilliant fanfare, than it has ever before had here. The soloist was Mr. Theodor Reichmann, whose first contribution to the programme was Wolfram's Song at the Song Tournament, from "Tannhauser." The number does not bear separation from its place in the opera, and Mr. Reichmann's manner of singing it did not help it. His intonation was frequently faulty, and he imparted to it a monotonous color of sickly sentimentality that was almost as exasperating as it was inappropriate. The artist indulged frequently and unmeaningly in falsetto, evidently under the mistaken impression that falsetto and piano are one and the same thing. However, he was warmly applauded and recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, Brahms's "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and Schubert's "Am Meer," Mr. Nikisch playing the accompaniments delightfully. In these songs Mr. Reichmann was dry, uninteresting and affected in style to a painful degree. It is sometimes hard to believe that the bulk of the symphony audience really know what good singing is, and in this instance they emphasized this state of affairs by applauding rapturously about as inadequate singing as has ever been heard at these concerts, singing that was far from reaching the high standard that should be maintained at them. He was recalled twice, and responded with a long and dreary song, unknown to us, in which he repeated the faults that came so unpleasingly to the surface in his earlier efforts. It is curious that the admirable rule which prohibits encores at these performances should have been broken through under such circumstances. For the next concert the programme is: Symphony, D-major, Haydn; "Faust Overture," Wagner; Symphony, C-major, Schubert. There will be no soloist.

The first in this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall tomorrow evening. Svensden's Quartet in A-minor Op 1, and Schumann's Quartet, in the same key, Op. 41, will be performed. Mr. Theodore Reichmann is to be the soloist and will sing three songs by Schumann.

The first concert of the Sunday Populars will be given in Music Hall to-night by the full Germania Orchestra, Mr. Emil Mollenhaur conducting, assisted by Miss Marian Manola, Mr. T. Adamowski, the Harvard Quartet, Mr. Paul Fox, Mr. E. Strasser and Mr. Leon Keach. An excellent programme has been prepared, and the prices of admission have been placed upon a popular basis.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday—Theodor Reichmann as Soloist.

Volkmann and Jensen may almost be called the two moons of Schumann's glorious sun, and although something of the master is reflected in both, the full greatness is in neither. Volkmann, however, has more of decisive shape than Schumann, and this is displayed both in his two symphonies, and in the work which began the programme on Saturday—the overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." The old criticism on Napoleon's strategy, "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la Guerre!" may be applied in this case; it is brilliant music, but it is by no means Shakespeare. What our English poet has undergone at the hands of French and German composers can scarcely be realized by those who are not directly occupied with music and literature; a passing allusion to "Queen Mab" becomes metamorphosed by Berlioz into a whole symphonic movement; "The Tempest" at the hands of Ambroise Thomas becomes very short-skirted, and Miranda dances a pas de deux with Caliban or Ferdinand; St. Saens introduces a corps de ballet into Richmond Park for the delectation of Henry VIII. besides giving a very unhistoric flirtation to Anne Boleyn and allowing Queen Catherine to die in England in the presence of the twe parties aforesaid; and here in "Richard III." we have the wicked duke of Gloster killed by an overwhelming stroke on the drum, after fighting with a set of Scotchmen (!!) who march to battle to the tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" nearly a century before the melody was composed, for "The Campbells are Comin'" was written in 1568, while Bosworth Field was fought in 1485! The tune, apart from the anachronism and the inappropriateness of its use in an English battle, is by no means so finely treated as by Max Bruch in his "Fair Ellen." The performance was a generally good one; the ensemble suffered a little at times from excess of zeal on the part of some of the musicians who anticipated the conductor's beat, and the death agonies were a trifle too long drawn out, as if the drum having failed to prove fatal, the king was being despatched with a very dull knife. The trumpet fanfares at the end were especially well done.

Theodor Reichmann was the soloist. Although he proved a popular success, to the reviewer he was a decided disappointment. He exaggerated almost everything and sang off pitch besides. "Wolfram's Song" is about as unthankful a number as one could select from Wagner's works; on the stage, in the midst of the tournament, and contrasted with the passionate utterances of Tannhaeuser, this celebration of pure love has a meaning, but placed thus on the concert platform it becomes simply dull. In the Brahms number, later in the programme, the singer was at his best, as also in the encore which was allowed, but in Schubert's "Am Meer" he distorted the work unwarrantably. This is one of the few subjective songs of the great composer; here, inspired by Heine (he set very few of Heine's poems, compared with Schumann or Franz, as the poet was at that time—only rising into prominence) Schubert has given emotion rather than tone-picturing; he does not, for example, give the ripple of the water as in his "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," or the splash of oars as in "Die Stadt," or the murmer of waves as in "Wohin," but presents a profound melancholy instead, ushered in by two chords of deepest meaning; to invest this with theatrical effect, is, I think, a mistake; August Kreissman used to give a far different interpretation of this song from that it received at this concert. There were even alterations of the phrasing made for a popular effect. It was by no means up to the great standard which Reichmann himself has established.

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were pleasing and well-constructed, if no more. They were perhaps carried to a greater length than their ideas warranted, but did not become wearisome. The variations of a rather characteristic theme which appeared on the oboes, 'cellos, and even on the bassoon, at times richly embroidered with flute fioriture, gave excellent chances to these instruments to display themselves in obligato work, and all these chances were well used. The second of these movements was chiefly delivered over to pizzicato effects, and was of a more complex character than Delibes' famous "Pizzicati," yet almost as popular. The use of the wind instruments in short, staccato effects, quite out of their usual character, was quite effective, and these difficult passages were well and crisply played.

Brahms' second symphony ended the concert. This is one of the most pleasing of his larger works, and at times attains even the popular vein of folksong themes. Unfortunately the audience had become wearied, and there was a large exodus between each of its movements. The first movement has been more equally given in this city, but was not without its effect. The instruments were not too blatant, and even the kettle-drum played pianissimo. Some of the themes in this movement remind even of Schubert, but the wonderful development is something that Schubert never could have accomplished. The adagio went well, but the dainty allegretto could have had a livelier lilt. The finale was a trifle noisy—for Brahms. The whole symphony is a living proof that the old forms have not died out yet, and that passion and melody may be as strongly and attractively presented in sonata shape as in the amorphous style of some of the modern iconoclasts. The important horn passages of the first movement deserve a special word of commendation for their clear execution.

It remains only to speak a word of praise for the excellence of the piano accompaniments furnished by Mr. Nikisch to three of Mr. Reichmann's songs. If I except the beginning of "Am Meer," the work was perfection. There are not ten people in a thousand who understand the musicianship implied in playing a difficult accompani-

...ment well ... works, Candidus Lachner has written a valuable treasure on this subject, in which he palpably shows that only the truly musical nature can accompany well; that Mr. Nikisch possesses such a nature he proved in this case, as he has done in other directions and in many former instances.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music Hall Populars Begun.

The interest in the first of the Sunday popular concerts, which was given last night in Music Hall, centred in Miss Marion Manola, the solo vocalist of the entertainment. Even the decided downpour of rain which so enhanced the comforts of home, did not prevent a good sized audience from turning out, and the reception given Miss Manola was enthusiastic and gratifying. Miss Manola confined herself to sentimental pieces and light songs and sang well. Her selections were "If 'tis a Dream" (Dellinger), with orchestral accompaniment, "Thine Eyes as Blue and Tender" (Lassen), and others, she being encored at each appearance.

The programme was decidedly a popular one and was heartily appreciated. Nearly everything was demanded a second time, and every one thoroughly enjoyed it. Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist, put forth some of his best efforts in a variety of selections. The Harvard quartette has a tenor whose voice is almost exactly like a female alto and very effective. The quartette's music was bright and cheerful. Messrs. Fox and Strasser's serenade for flute and saxophone was fine. Conductor Mollenhauer led the Germania orchestra in his usual careful and painstaking manner, evoking results most creditable to himself and his players.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mr. Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will appear with the Kneisel Quartet in the opening concert of their series at Union Hall this evening. Quartetts by Schumann and Svendsen will be performed, and Mr. Reichmann will sing a group of Schumann songs.

"JACK" MASON TO WED MISS MANOLA.

The Errant Museum Actor to Replace Her Expected Divorce.

Miss Marion Manola and John Mason are both in Boston. In an interview with Miss Manola last evening she stated that the report that she was to marry Mr. Mason is true. She said: "I have a divorce suit now pending against my first husband, Henry Mould, for desertion. There is no doubt but that I shall win my case. Mr. Mould is in Canada, and can not return to New York, as he would be arrested for a crime committed here some time ago. I have a little girl, 10 years old, whom I have had the custody of and have supported ever since my separation from Mr. Mould. I am going to Europe."

The Music Hall popular concert last evening of which Miss Manola was the principal star, was thronged by an audience which took especial interest in Mr. Mason's inamorata and in the presence of Mr. Mason himself in the front of one of the balconies overlooking the stage. It seemed as though people looked a good deal more at Mr. Mason than at the musicians. Mr. Lowell Mason, apparently the picture of health, accompanied his brother.

THE BOSTONIAN.
OCT. 17, 1890.

The first Symphony concert, Saturday night, was the signal for the reappearance of a large number of the swagger set, who always want to be on hand to inaugurate this eminently fashionable institution. A little coterie of clever society women, composed of Mrs. F. Gordon Dexter, Mrs. Helen Bell and her sister Mrs. E. E. Pratt, Mrs. B. J. Lang and daughter, and Mrs. Arthur Foote, made the end of the left-hand balcony present quite a gay appearance, to be made gayer still when Mrs. Gardner claims her seat there. Mr. Lang, Mr. Foote, Mr. Theodore Chase and Mr. Causten Browne being the men of the party. In the opposite balcony sat Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with her faithful attendant, Mr. John Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Fay, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Mr. George Osgood, and others of that musical set; while scattered over the hall below were Mrs. Louis Agassiz with her daughter Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Colonel Higginson, Mrs. Nikisch, and Mrs. Shaw, all grouped together; Mr. Josiah Bradlee and family, just home from Europe, Mrs. John E. Lodge, Mrs. Lithgow Devens, looking very pretty in grey; the Lowells, from Chestnut Hill; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Codman, Mr. Louis Curtis and his fiancee, Miss Richardson; Mr. Berthold Schlesinger and family, the Misses Fairchild and brother, Mr. George Inches, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mrs. J. W. Wheelwright and her daughter, just returned from Europe also, the latter looking extremely pretty in a black and gold gown; Mrs. John V. Apthorp and family, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mrs. Seth Sprague and her son, Mr. Richard Sprague; Mrs. John A. Andrew and Miss Bessie Andrew, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Russell and daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SECOND CONCERT.

At the second Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Volkmann—Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III," Wagner, Aria, from "Tannhaeuser"; Tschaikowsky—Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor; Songs—Brahms, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlumer;" Schubert, "Am Meer," Drahms—Symphony No. 2, in D major.

The playing as a rule was much better than at the previous concert, except that the first clarinet was chronically flat throughout, and the kettle drummer pounded his drums as though it were his chief object to call attention to the fact that as the least musical member of the orchestra, he can at least make the most noise. Otherwise the Overture was well played, and with considerable of the old-time unity and precision for which the orchestra has been noted. The Volkmann overture does not gain with repeated hearings. Liszt would have called it a symphonic poem, and it is markedly suggestive of the extrinsic features of the Liszt so-called symphonic poems, excepting the interpolation of "The Campbells are Comin'," with which tune the composer apparently makes several attempts to do something ingenious, but fails.

The novelty of the programme was the Tschaikowsky symphony. Mr. Nikisch is entitled to any musician's gratitude for only giving two movements of the work, if its andante and scherzo are to be regarded as samples of Tschaikowsky's symphonic writing. The orchestration is simply tricky in covering a multitude of sins, and intrinsically considered the andantino is open to the charge of being both tawdry and vulgar, while in the scherzo there is in this respect but little improvement.

Herr Reichman's singing was as usual effective. It was neither his or the harpist's fault that the Wagner Aria was heard at a woful disadvantage, as, while they were in agreement as regards intonation, the remaining ensemble was persistently out of tune. The concert ended with the Brahms symphony, No. 2.

ANENT THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartette concerts for the present season are announced, and many season tickets for the series have doubtless been sold. This is as it should be. Chamber concerts of the right kind are an indispensable source of musical education to students of all grades; to the right-thinking amateur also; in fact, to one and all who desire to cultivate a taste for the purest and best music; and the purest and best music is none too good; it refines, it elevates, it enobles. Thus do Messrs. Kneisel and his artistic associates refine, elevate and ennoble. All honor and all encouragement to such artists; and who shall say that such honor and encouragement are not best expressed through the enterprise in behalf of the Kneisel quartette that Messrs. Ellis and Comee of Boston Music hall are showing? Musicians in this vicinity who cannot attend such a series of concerts may well have cause for regret, for such as can and will attend become thereby far better musicians. Keep up with the times and be with the times at their best. This is one of the most important duties that the true-art lover has to perform. Bear well in mind therefore the following:

The first of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place tomorrow evening at Union hall, and the programme includes Svendsen's quartette in A minor, op. 1, and Schumann's in A minor, op. 41. Mr. Theodor Reichmann will sing three songs by Schumann, "Dedication," "The Lotos" and "Thou Art so Like a Flower."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 19.

The Symphony Concerts.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was not especially interesting or enlivening, as far as the programme was concerned. In fact it was rather tiresome. The work of the orchestra was steadily fine throughout, and was almost up to its best standard. The brass wind has not yet quite fallen well in to the traces and is prone to be a little coarse and blaring, especially its trumpets which in the closing portions of the first movement gave vent to the meanest and most vulgar quality of tone of which the instrument is capable. The Volkmann "Richard III." overture, with which the concert opened, does not improve upon acquaintance. All that there is to hear in it is discovered in a first hearing, and listening to it a second time finds the interest in it dulled. The introduction of the Scotch air, "The Campbells are Coming," still baffles understanding, to say nothing of the difficulty of discovering the meaning of the music in its application to the Shakspearian tragedy, what it typifies, what impression it is intended to convey. Of course, the mighty drum beat toward the end of the overture is the deathblow of the crook-back tyrant. The new drummer gave him this blow with such herculean force that it should have killed him on the spot. It is to be regretted that it failed to do so, and thus made the long drawn, lugubrious death-strains that followed possible. The work is strong and musicianly, but it is ineffably dry and wearisome. The novelty of the programme was two movements, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, never heard here before. The andantino is very graceful and melodious, clean and flowing in its polyphony, and charming in effect generally. It is full of color and variety, and is beautifully scored. The movement was exquisitely played, especially by the wood wind. The scherzo is bright, ingenious and original, but it is not as interesting as the other movement, and if the trickiness of the orchestration were taken away and the underlying idea heard in its nakedness there would be but little left. The programme imparts some very remarkable information about this movement. It says: "The explanatory phrase, pizzicato ostinato, appended to the scherzo movement, indicates the continuous use of some distinctive melodial figure or groups of notes, the strings being pinched or twitched with the finger producing a staccato effect, the other instruments for the most part being blown or struck staccato." This is news indeed. Pizzicato ostinato simply means constant picking of the strings. It has nothing to do with any "distinctive melodial figure," whatever that may mean, and has no possible relation to "the other instruments," which, cannot be played pizzicato: "The other instruments for the most part, being blown or struck staccato," is a gem. The only "other instrument" that can be struck staccato is the drum. As for wind instruments, they cannot be blown staccato. Later on the notice alludes to pizzicato chords in the strings and soft brasses, which is simply idiotic. A little more sense and much less gush and nonsense in the programmes would leave the general reader in a much more happy frame of mind. The concert ended with a masterly reading and performance of Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, in D major. The lovely allegretto was exquisitely given, and the finale was played with greater fire and dash, notably in its closing moments, where the brasses are devoted to a brilliant fanfare, than it has ever before had here. The soloist was Mr. Theodor Reichmann, whose first contribution to the programme was Wolfram's Song at the Song Tournament, from "Tannhauser." The number does not bear separation from its place in the opera, and Mr. Reichmann's manner of singing it did not help it. His intonation was frequently faulty, and he imparted to it a monotonous color of sickly sentimentality that was almost as exasperating as it was inappropriate. The artist indulged frequently and unmeaningly in falsetto, evidently under the mistaken impression that falsetto and piano are one and the same thing. However, he was warmly applauded and recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, Brahms's "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and Schubert's "Am Meer," Mr. Nikisch playing the accompaniments delightfully. In these songs Mr. Reichmann was dry, uninteresting and affected in style to a painful degree. It is sometimes hard to believe that the bulk of the symphony audience really know what good singing is, and in this instance they emphasized this state of affairs by applauding rapturously about as inadequate singing as has ever been heard at these concerts, singing that was far from reaching the high standard that should be maintained at them. He was recalled twice, and responded with a long and dreary song, unknown to us, in which he repeated the faults that came so unpleasingly to the surface in his earlier efforts. It is curious that the admirable rule which prohibits encores at these performances should have been broken through under such circumstances. For the next concert the programme is: Symphony, D-major, Haydn; "Faust Overture," Wagner; Symphony, C-major, Schubert. There will be no soloist.

The first in this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall tomorrow evening. Svendsen's Quartet in A-minor Op 1, and Schumann's Quartet, in the same key, Op. 41, will be performed. Mr. Theodore Reichmann is to be the soloist and will sing three songs by Schumann.

The first concert of the Sunday Populars will be given in Music Hall to-night by the full Germania Orchestra, Mr. Emil Mollenhaur conducting, assisted by Miss Marian Manola, Mr. T. Adamowski, the Harvard Quartet, Mr. Paul Fox, Mr. E. Strasser and Mr. Leon Keach. An excellent programme has been prepared, and the prices of admission have been placed upon a popular basis.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday—Theodor Reichmann as Soloist.

Volkmann and Jensen may almost be called the two moons of Schumann's glorious sun, and although something of the master is reflected in both, the full greatness is in neither. Volkmann, however, has more of decisive shape than Schumann, and this is displayed both in his two symphonies, and in the work which began the programme on Saturday—the overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." The old criticism on Napoleon's strategy, "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la Guerre!" may be applied in this case; it is brilliant music, but it is by no means Shakespeare. What our English poet has undergone at the hands of French and German composers can scarcely be realized by those who are not directly occupied with music and literature; a passing allusion to "Queen Mab" becomes metamorphosed by Berlioz into a whole symphonic movement; "The Tempest" at the hands of Ambroise Thomas becomes very short-skirted, and Miranda dances a pas de deux with Caliban or Ferdinand; St. Saens introduces a corps de ballet into Richmond Park for the delectation of Henry VIII. besides giving a very unhistoric flirtation to Anne Boleyn and allowing Queen Catherine to die in England in the presence of the two parties aforesaid; and here in "Richard III." we have the wicked duke of Gloster killed by an overwhelming stroke on the drum, after fighting with a set of Scotchmen (!!) who march to battle to the tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" nearly a century before the melody was composed, for "The Campbells are Comin'" was written in 1568, while Bosworth Field was fought in 1485! The tune, apart from the anachronism and the inappropriateness of its use in an English battle, is by no means so finely treated as by Max Bruch in his "Fair Ellen." The performance was a generally good one; the ensemble suffered a little at times from excess of zeal on the part of some of the musicians who anticipated the conductor's beat, and the death agonies were a trifle too long drawn out, as if the drum having failed to prove fatal, the king was being despatched with a very dull knife. The trumpet fanfares at the end were especially well done.

Theodor Reichmann was the soloist. Although he proved a popular success, to the reviewer he was a decided disappointment. He exaggerated almost everything and sang off pitch besides. "Wolfram's Song" is about as unthankful a number as one could select from Wagner's works; on the stage, in the midst of the tournament, and contrasted with the passionate utterances of Tannhaeuser, this celebration of pure love has a meaning, but placed thus on the concert platform it becomes simply dull. In the Brahms number, later in the programme, the singer was at his best, as also in the encore which was allowed, but in Schubert's "Am Meer" he distorted the work unwarrantably. This is one of the few subjective songs of the great composer; here, inspired by Heine (he set very few of Heine's poems, compared with Schumann or Franz, as the poet was at that time—only rising into prominence) Schubert has given emotion rather than tone-picturing; he does not, for example, give the ripple of the water as in his "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," or the splash of oars as in "Die Stadt," or the murmer of waves as in "Wohin," but presents a profound melancholy instead, ushered in by two chords of deepest meaning; to invest this with theatrical effect, is, I think, a mistake; August Kreissman used to give a far different interpretation of this song from that it received at this concert. There were even alterations of the phrasing made for a popular effect. It was by no means up to the great standard which Reichmann himself has established.

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were pleasing and well-constructed, if no more. They were perhaps carried to a greater length than their ideas warranted, but did not become wearisome. The variations of a rather characteristic theme which appeared on the oboes, 'cellos, and even on the bassoon, at times richly embroidered with flute fioriture, gave excellent chances to these instruments to display themselves in obligato work, and all these chances were well used. The second of these movements was chiefly delivered over to pizzicato effects, and was of a more complex character than Delibes' famous "Pizzicati," yet almost as popular. The use of the wind instruments in short, staccato effects, quite out of their usual character, was quite effective, and these difficult passages were well and crisply played.

Brahms' second symphony ended the concert. This is one of the most pleasing of his larger works, and at times attains even the popular vein of folksong themes. Unfortunately the audience had become wearied, and there was a large exodus between each of its movements. The first movement has been more equally given in this city, but was not without its effect. The instruments were not too blatant, and even the kettle-drum played pianissimo. Some of the themes in this movement remind even of Schubert, but the wonderful development is something that Schubert never could have accomplished. The adagio went well, but the dainty allegretto could have had a livelier lilt. The finale was a trifle noisy—for Brahms. The whole symphony is a living proof that the old forms have not died out yet, and that passion and melody may be as strongly and attractively presented in sonata shape as in the amorphous style of some of the modern iconoclasts. The important horn passages of the first movement deserve a special word of commendation for their clear execution.

It remains only to speak a word of praise for the excellence of the piano accompaniments furnished by Mr. Nikisch to three of Mr. Reichmann's songs. If I except the beginning of "Am Meer," the work was perfection. There are not ten people in a thousand who understand the musicianship implied in playing a difficult accompaniment well. In Leipsic, within a few weeks, Capell-Meister Reinecke has written a valuable brochure on this subject, in in which he palpably shows that only the truly musical nature can accompany well; that Mr. Nikisch possesses such a nature he proved in this case, as he has done in other directions and in many former instances.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music Hall Populars Begun.

The interest in the first of the Sunday popular concerts, which was given last night in Music Hall, centred in Miss Marion Manola, the solo vocalist of the entertainment. Even the decided downpour of rain which so enhanced the comforts of home, did not prevent a good sized audience from turning out, and the reception given Miss Manola was enthusiastic and gratifying. Miss Manola confined herself to sentimental pieces and light songs and sang well. Her selections were "If 'tis a Dream" (Dellinger), with orchestral accompaniment, "Thine Eyes so Blue and Tender" (Lassen), and others, she being encored at each appearance.

The programme was decidedly a popular one and was heartily appreciated. Nearly everything was demanded a second time, and every one thoroughly enjoyed it. Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist, put forth some of his best efforts in a variety of selections. The Harvard quartette has a tenor whose voice is almost exactly like a female alto and very effective. The quartette's music was bright and cheerful. Messrs. Fox and Strasser's serenade for flute and saxophone was fine. Conductor Mollenhauer led the Germania orchestra in his usual careful and painstaking manner, evoking results most creditable to himself and his players.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mr. Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will appear with the Kneisel Quartet in the opening concert of their series at Union Hall this evening. Quartetts by Schumann and Svendsen will be performed, and Mr. Reichmann will sing a group of Schumann songs.

"JACK" MASON TO WED MISS MANOLA.

The Errant Museum Actor to Replace Her Expected Divorce.

Miss Marion Manola and John Mason are both in Boston. In an interview with Miss Manola last evening she stated that the report that she was to marry Mr. Mason is true. She said: "I have a divorce suit now pending against my first husband, Henry Mould, for desertion. There is no doubt but that I shall win my case. Mr. Mould is in Canada, and can not return to New York, as he would be arrested for a crime committed here some time ago. I have a little girl, 10 years old, whom I have had the custody of and have supported ever since my separation from Mr. Mould. I am going to Europe."

The Music Hall popular concert last evening of which Miss Manola was the principal star, was thronged by an audience which took especial interest in Mr. Mason's inamorata and in the presence of Mr. Mason himself in the front of one of the balconies overlooking the stage. It seemed as though people looked a good deal more at Mr. Mason than at the musicians. Mr. Lowell Mason, apparently the picture of health, accompanied his brother.

THE BOSTONIAN.
OCT. 17, 1890.

The first Symphony concert, Saturday night, was the signal for the reappearance of a large number of the swagger set, who always want to be on hand to inaugurate this eminently fashionable institution. A little coterie of clever society women, composed of Mrs. F. Gordon Dexter, Mrs. Helen Bell and her sister Mrs. E. E. Pratt, Mrs. B. J. Lang and daughter, and Mrs. Arthur Foote, made the end of the left-hand balcony present quite a gay appearance, to be made gayer still when Mrs. Gardner claims her seat there. Mr. Lang, Mr. Foote, Mr. Theodore Chase and Mr. Causten Browne being the men of the party. In the opposite balcony sat Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with her faithful attendant, Mr. John Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Fay, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Mr. George Osgood, and others of that musical set; while scattered over the hall below were Mrs. Louis Agassiz with her daughter Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Colonel Higginson, Mrs. Nikisch, and Mrs. Shaw, all grouped together; Mr. Josiah Bradlee and family, just home from Europe, Mrs. John E. Lodge, Mrs. Lithgow Devens, looking very pretty in grey; the Lowells, from Chestnut Hill; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Codman, Mr. Louis Curtis and his fiancee, Miss Richardson; Mr. Berthold Schlesinger and family, the Misses Fairchild and brother, Mr. George Inches, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mrs. J. W. Wheelwright and her daughter, just returned from Europe also, the latter looking extremely pretty in a black and gold gown; Mrs. John V. Apthorp and family, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mrs. Seth Sprague and her son, Mr. Richard Sprague; Mrs. John A. Andrew and Miss Bessie Andrew, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Russell and daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers.

[23]

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. THEODOR REICHMANN, Baritone.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SVENDSEN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 1.
Allegro.—Andantino.—
Allegro Scherzando.—Finale.

SCHUMANN. SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) "LOTOS BLUME"
b) "DIE BIST WIE EINE BLUME."
c) "WIDMUNG."

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.
Introduzione, Andante espressivo.—A minor; leading to Allegro.—F major.
Scherzo, Presto.—A minor: with intermezzo.—C major.
Adagio—F major. Presto—A minor and major.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The date of the Second Concert is November 24.

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS
. . HYPERION THEATRE . .
. . . . . NEW HAVEN . . . . .

TENTH SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Monday evenings,
November 10,
December 8, 1890
January 12,
1891 February 23.

[24]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert at Union Hall.

Of course Union Hall was crowded last night, and equally of course the audience was a representative one, for were not the four favorite artists who constitute the Kneisel Quartette giving their first concert of the season? The first number of the programme was an Opus 1, but a beginning worthy to be compared with the great Opus 1 with which Robert Franz burst upon the musical world. In the very first movement of Svendsen's Quartette in A minor the themes were well formed and in fine contrast, and if the development was not of the magnitude or skill of a Beethoven or Brahms, it was still adequate and interesting. More characteristic was the slow movement, in which the viola had some fine passages in imitation, and in which the chief theme suggested the composer's native land of Norway. The third movement was not brisk enough for a Halling, nor in the proper rhythm for a Spring-Tanz (the two favorite Norwegian dances which Svendsen has often used in his classical forms) yet it suggested brightness and merrymaking and had a distinctly national flavor. The chief theme of the finale at times seemed very much like the Hungarian Rakoczy March transported into more northern climes. The performance of the work was excellent, the ensemble being such as I have learned to expect from this leading string quartette of America. Mr. Reichmann now appeared and sang three Schumann lieder. He was more successful than on Saturday last, and his intonation at least, was generally true; yet it was rather unfortunate that he should have chosen such dreamy numbers as "The Lotos Flower" and "Thou Art Like a Flower," for these suit to a sweet and pathetic voice; but in this world of cross-purposes, each artist generally longs most to try the effects which belong to him least, and so I must condone the fact that "the timid lotos-flower" became a sort of tiger lily, and the wish,

On those golden tresses
My folded hands to lay,

became expressive of a Sullivanian order of laying on of hands, because of the tremendous power of the singer. Much better was the beautiful "Widmung," although the singer and the accompanist (Mr. Arthur Whiting) fell out once or twice; but here at least the broad climax was noble and effective. And, best of all, was the song of "Ewige Liebe," which was most dramatically rendered and well accompanied. Perhaps this ultra-dramatic quality is unfitting the singer for the true school of the Lied, for the clipping of some words, the hissing forth of others, and manifold gasps and pauses, speak rather of the operatic stage than of the works of Schumann, Schubert or Franz. It would be folly to expect the bull of Bashan to coo as a turtle dove, but for all that I counsel Mr. Reichmann to let songs like "The Lotos Flower" alone. The end of the concert came with Schumann's string quartette in A minor, and splendidly performed, too, although the cello might have played a little louder. The quartette in the finale of this did some noble ensemble work; they seem to be growing broader in tone, yet are not losing an iota of their wonderful finish. The Scherzo, too, (quite a la Schumann, whose scherzi never have the lightheartedness of Mendelssohn, but an underlying earnestness) was the perfection of ensemble work, and the way in which the cello sang its beautiful theme in the slow movement, was quite the best thing Mr. Hekking has done during the past year or two; it was masterly. The length of the programme, too, was commendable, for in past days the quartette used to furnish so long a tonal feast that musical indigestion was sure to ensue especially as the diet was of the richest.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its regular series of concerts in Providence last evening, at Infantry Hall, to an audience that nearly filled that spacious auditorium. It was composed of the culture and the wealth of the city, and Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were accorded a reception second only to what is given them in Boston. Infantry Hall is a grand one in which to hear this orchestra. Its acoustic properties are superior to Boston Music Hall, and the climaxes and effects, and this was particularly noticeable in the "Oberon" overture which closed the concert, were charming. The programme opened with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and the two movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony which have just been heard in Boston were given—and they were given exceedingly well and enthusiastically received. The "Moto Perpetuo" of Paganini, which is taken by all the violins and which was rendered by the orchestra in Boston last season, followed, and the programme closed with the "Oberon" overture. Its rendition was a revelation, as are the performances of such familiar pieces by this orchestra always.

Mr. Reichmann was the soloist. He gave a song from Lorizing's "Czar and the Carpenter" and two songs with piano later, one being Schubert's "Wanderer," which was given the finest rendition of anything he has done since Saturday evening when he sang in Music Hall. He was given an ovation and had to return four times to respond to the calls of the audience. The concert was a grand success.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Present Providence Season Opened in Infantry Hall.

Even if only the artistic in the case is to be reckoned with, there is much significance in the present Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened last evening in Infantry Hall with an altogether distinguished success. For nine years this organization has paid annually a certain number of visits to Providence, its nearest neighboring large city, sometimes four, sometimes not more than one. It certainly argues well for the growth of musical culture in Providence that in this, the tenth season of the orchestra's existence, its management have for the first time felt justified, from the interest manifested of recent years in its work, in making the season one of six concerts. And it argues even better that under these circumstances an audience so large in numbers and so excellent in the quality of its understanding and appreciation assembled to hear the first concert.

The programme offered two absolute novelties, while the rest were works of the securest classical standing that had not been heard in Providence for several years. The soloist was Herr Theodor Reichmann, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House. Following is the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria—"Czar and Zimmermann".....Lortzing
HERR REICHMANN.
Two Movements from Symphony No. 4 in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
(First time in Providence.)
"Perpetuum Mobile" (for al. the violins).....Paganini
(First time in Providence.)
Songs with Piano—
(a) "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer".....Brahms
(b) Wanderlied.....Schubert
HERR REICHMANN.
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Of those last three symphonies among Mozart's 41, the ones which live and flourish in these modern days, that in G minor, heard last evening, is undoubtedly the finest—at all events the deepest in intellectual idea, the most passionate in feeling, the most individual and characteristic of Mozart's highest qualities. Because there is, in the enormous flood of music which that most prolific of all composers poured forth during his short life, much that falls to stand the test of a hundred years, it is all too frequent that modern conductors and performers conceive and expound Mozart as though from a superior standpoint. They read his works as trivial or melodious trifles, or else as what the Germans characterize by the word "pig-tail"—the formal and pedantic utterances of an age of powdered wigs. Mr. Nikisch has risen to no higher plane than that upon which last evening he refuted this misreading of Mozart's genius. His playing of the symphony was eloquent of the fiery passion, the melting tenderness and control of the sound, sane, healthy sentiment that characterize its changing moods. The opening allegro was taken at a notably moderate speed, according to our modern standards, but yet one that can only be regarded as the right one for the import and character of the movement. Nothing could have been more lucid, too, than the unfolding of that interwoven tracery of counterpoint, and that delightful treatment of the wood-wind which Mozart himself first devised, and which is still, though familiar, ever fresh and charming. The performance was a plastic exposition of every shade of meaning, artistic in its exquisite symmetry and balance, qualities which, above all, Mozart imposes upon those who would rightly know him.

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were in sharp contrast with the classical spirit of the Mozart. The andante is unmistakably a product of strong, clear-cut ideas, melodious and of delightful rhythmic individuality, set forth in rich and highly colored instrumentation. It was sonorously and brilliantly played. The scherzo is an extraordinary piece of musical genre, a study, as it were, in "pizzicato," carried to the utmost extreme. The principal theme is entirely given in this string-plucking fashion by all the stringed instruments, and some very novel effects are elicited during this breezy, rushing melody, especially of a dynamic character, of sudden contrasts of light and shade. As a very fitting companion piece to this was Paganini's etude, "Perpetuo Motion," played by all the violins instead of by one. All that there was to be gotten from this, from the 28 playing so nearly like one man, was the knowledge of the altogether exceptional ability of the orchestra's violin players. As this was doubtless possessed by most of the persons present already, the net result of such an exhibition was small. But of course it called forth many plaudits, to which the 28 gentlemen all responded.

Herr Reichmann has already been heard in this city, and in more exacting duties than were imposed upon him last evening, but he has not appeared to so excellent advantage in anything that he has previously done. His voice is of magnificent power and quality, and his style such as befits one of the foremost representatives of the German school in dramatic singing. The simple and eminently lyric aria—if the truth be told, the somewhat old-fashioned aria—from Lortzing's opera he sang in a highly refined style, with much tender feeling. It was highly appreciated, and Herr Reichmann was obliged to repeat a stanza of it. But by far the finest work he did—or it would have been had his intonation in it not so frequently been faulty—was in Schubert's "Wanderer" Song," in which his singing was marked by magnificent breadth and nobility of style and a thrilling dramatic power.

The close was brilliantly reached through Weber's splendid "Oberon" overture, played with never more warmth of romantic color, vividness of contrast and fiery vigor.

Origin of the Fire No. 15 Market Square.

On Saturday night those brilliant lighted Gas Heaters can be seen at the Gas Stove Store. Suitable for parlors, bedrooms, libraries, nurseries and bath rooms. No coal, wood or dust

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartet will give concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall on Monday nights Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The members of the quartet are Messrs. T. Adamowski, A. Moldauer, M. Zach and J. Adamowski. Among the novelties promised is a quartet for violoncellos, by Klengel, which will be played by Messrs. J. Adamowski, L. Schultz, G. Campanari and H. Mingels. A new quartet by Dvorak is also included in the scheme of the concerts. Subscriptions for the series are received at the Music Hall.

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. THEODOR REICHMANN, Baritone.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SVENDSEN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 1.
Allegro.—Andantino.—
Allegro Scherzando.—Finale.

SCHUMANN. SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) "LOTOS BLUME"
b) "DIE BIST WIE EINE BLUME."
c) "WIDMUNG."

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.
Introduzione, Andante espressivo.—A minor; leading to Allegro.—F major.
Scherzo, Presto.—A minor: with intermezzo.—C major.
Adagio—F major. Presto—A minor and major.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The date of the Second Concert is November 24.

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS
. . HYPERION THEATRE . .
. . . . . NEW HAVEN . . . . .

TENTH SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Monday evenings,
November 10,
December 8, 1890
January 12,
1891 February 23.

[24]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert at Union Hall.

Of course Union Hall was crowded last night, and equally of course the audience was a representative one, for were not the four favorite artists who constitute the Kneisel Quartette giving their first concert of the season? The first number of the programme was an Opus 1, but a beginning worthy to be compared with the great Opus 1 with which Robert Franz burst upon the musical world. In the very first movement of Svendsen's Quartette in A minor the themes were well formed and in fine contrast, and if the development was not of the magnitude or skill of a Beethoven or Brahms, it was still adequate and interesting. More characteristic was the slow movement, in which the viola had some fine passages in imitation, and in which the chief theme suggested the composer's native land of Norway. The third movement was not brisk enough for a Halling, nor in the proper rhythm for a Spring-Tanz (the two favorite Norwegian dances which Svendsen has often used in his classical forms) yet it suggested brightness and merrymaking and had a distinctly national flavor. The chief theme of the finale at times seemed very much like the Hungarian Rakoczy March transported into more northern climes. The performance of the work was excellent, the ensemble being such as I have learned to expect from this leading string quartette of America. Mr. Reichmann now appeared and sang three Schumann lieder. He was more successful than on Saturday last, and his intonation at least, was generally true; yet it was rather unfortunate that he should have chosen such dreamy numbers as "The Lotos Flower" and "Thou Art Like a Flower," for these suit to a sweet and pathetic voice; but in this world of cross-purposes, each artist generally longs most to try the effects which belong to him least, and so I must condone the fact that "the timid lotos-flower" became a sort of tiger lily, and the wish,

On those golden tresses
My molded hands to lay,

became expressive of a Sullivanian order of laying on of hands, because of the tremendous power of the singer. Much better was the beautiful "Widmung," although the singer and the accompanist (Mr. Arthur Whiting) fell out once or twice; but here at least the broad climax was noble and effective. And, best of all, was the song of "Ewige Liebe," which was most dramatically rendered and well accompanied. Perhaps this ultra-dramatic quality is unfitting the singer for the true school of the Lied, for the clipping of some words, the hissing forth of others, and manifold gasps and pauses, speak rather of the operatic stage than of the works of Schumann, Schubert or Franz. It would be folly to expect the bull of Bashan to coo as a turtle dove, but for all that I counsel Mr. Reichmann to let songs like "The Lotos Flower" alone. The end of the concert came with Schumann's string quartette in A minor, and splendidly performed, too, although the cello might have played a little louder. The quartette in the finale of this did some noble ensemble work; they seem to be growing broader in tone, yet are not losing an iota of their wonderful finish. The Scherzo, too, (quite a la Schumann, whose scherzi never have the lightheartedness of Mendelssohn, but an underlying earnestness) was the perfection of ensemble work, and the way in which the cello sang its beautiful theme in the slow movement, was quite the best thing Mr. Hekking has done during the past year or two; it was masterly. The length of the programme, too, was commendable, for in past days the quartette used to furnish so long a tonal feast that musical indigestion was sure to ensue espesially as the diet was of the richest.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its regular series of concerts in Providence last evening, at Infantry Hall, to an audience that nearly filled that spacious auditorium. It was composed of the culture and the wealth of the city, and Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were accorded a reception second only to what is given them in Boston. Infantry Hall is a grand one in which to hear this orchestra. Its acoustic properties are superior to Boston Music Hall, and the climaxes and effects, and this was particularly noticeable in the "Oberon" overture which closed the concert, were charming. The programme opened with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and the two movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony which have just been heard in Boston were given—and they were given exceedingly well and enthusiastically received. The "Moto Perpetuo" of Paganini, which is taken by all the violins and which was rendered by the orchestra in Boston last season, followed, and the programme closed with the "Oberon" overture. Its rendition was a revelation, as are the performances of such familiar pieces by this orchestra always.

Mr. Reichmann was the soloist. He gave a song from Lortzing's "Czar and the Carpenter" and two songs with piano later, one being Schubert's "Wanderer," which was given the finest rendition of anything he has done since Saturday evening when he sang in Music Hall. He was given an ovation and had to return four times to respond to the calls of the audience. The concert was a grand success.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Present Providence Season Opened in Infantry Hall.

Even if only the arithmetic in the case is to be reckoned with, there is much of significance in the present Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened last evening in Infantry Hall with an altogether distinguished success. For nine years this organization has paid annually a certain number of visits to Providence, its nearest neighboring large city, sometimes four, sometimes not more than one. It certainly argues well for the growth of musical culture in Providence that in this, the tenth season of the orchestra's existence, its management have for the first time felt justified, from the interest manifested of recent years in its work, in making the season one of six concerts. And it argues even better that under these circumstances an audience so large in numbers and so excellent in the quality of its understanding and appreciation assembled to hear the first concert.

The programme offered two absolute novelties, while the rest were works of the securest classical standing that had not been heard in Providence for several years. The soloist was Herr Theodor Reichmann, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House. Following is the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria—"Czar and Zimmerman".....Lortzing
HERR REICHMANN.
Two Movements from Symphony No. 4 in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
(First time in Providence.)
"Perpetuum Mobile" (for al. the violins).....Paganini
(First time in Providence.)
Songs with Piano—
(a) "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer".....Brahms
(b) Wanderlied.....Schubert
HERR REICHMANN.
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Of those last three symphonies among Mozart's 41, the ones which live and flourish in these modern days, that in G minor, heard last evening, is undoubtedly the finest—at all events the deepest in intellectual idea, the most passionate in feeling, the most individual and characteristic of Mozart's highest qualities. Because there is, in the enormous flood of music which that most prolific of all composers poured forth during his short life, much that fails to stand the test of a hundred years, it is all too frequent that modern conductors and performers conceive and expound Mozart as though from a superior standpoint. They read his works as trivial or melodious trifles, or else as what the Germans characterize by the word "pig-tail"—the formal and pedantic utterances of an age of powdered wigs. Mr. Nikisch has risen to no higher plane than that upon which last evening he refuted this misreading of Mozart's genius. His playing of the symphony was eloquent of the fiery passion, the melting tenderness and control of the sound, sane, healthy sentiment that characterize its changing moods. The opening allegro was taken at a notably moderate speed, according to our modern standards, but yet one that can only be regarded as the right one for the import and character of the movement. Nothing could have been more lucid, too, than the unfolding of that interwoven tracery of counterpoint, and that delightful treatment of the wood-wind which Mozart himself first devised, and which is still, though familiar, ever fresh and charming. The performance was a plastic exposition of every shade of meaning, artistic in its exquisite symmetry and balance, qualities which, above all, Mozart imposes upon those who would rightly know him.

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were in sharp contrast with the classical spirit of the Mozart. The andante is unmistakably a product of strong, clear-cut ideas, melodious and of delightful rhythmic individuality, set forth in rich and highly colored instrumentation. It was sonorously and brilliantly played. The scherzo is an extraordinary piece of musical genre, a study, as it were, in "pizzicato," carried to the utmost extreme. The principal theme is entirely given in this string-plucking fashion by all the stringed instruments, and some very novel effects are elicited during this breezy, rushing melody, especially of a dynamic character, of sudden contrasts of light and shade. As a very fitting companion piece to this was Paganini's etude, "Perpetual Motion," played by all the violins instead of by one. All that there was to be gotten from this, from the 28 playing so nearly like one man, was the knowledge of the altogether exceptional ability of the orchestra's violin players. As this was doubtless possessed by most of the persons present already, the net result of such an exhibition was small. But of course it called forth many plaudits, to which the 28 gentlemen all responded.

Herr Reichmann has already been heard in this city, and in more exacting duties than were imposed upon him last evening, but he has not appeared to so excellent advantage in anything that he has previously done. His voice is of magnificent power and quality, and his style such as befits one of the foremost representatives of the German school in dramatic singing. The simple and eminently lyric aria—if the truth be toll, the somewhat old-fashioned aria—from Lortzing's opera, he sang in a highly refined style, with much tender feeling. It was highly appreciated, and Herr Reichmann was obliged to repeat a stanza of it. But by far the finest work he did—or it would have been had his intonation in it not so frequently been faulty—was in Schubert's "Wanderer's Song," in which his singing was marked by magnificent breadth and nobility of style and a thrilling dramatic power.

The close was brilliantly reached through Weber's splendid "Oberon" overture, played with never more warmth of romantic color, vividness of contrast and fiery vigor.

Origin of the Fire No. 15 Market Square.

On Saturday night those brilliant lighted Gas Heaters can be seen at the Gas Stove Store, suitable for parlors, bedrooms, libraries, nurseries and bath rooms. No coal, wood or kind-

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartet will give concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall on Monday nights Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5. The members of the quartet are Messrs. T. Adamowski, A. Moldauer, M. Zach and J. Adamowski. Among the novelties promised is a quartet for violoncellos, by Klengel, which will be played by Messrs. J. Adamowski, L. Schulz, G. Campanari and H. Mingels. A new quartet by Dvorak is also included in the scheme of the concerts. Subscriptions for the series are received at the Music Hall.

Johan Severin Svendsen, the son of a military band master of Christiania, was himself a band master early in life. But this was by no means the height of his ambition. Setting his mind upon nobler things, his friend, Carl Sievers, tells us,—"Svendsen left the army and entered the orchestra of the Christiania Theatre, subsequently going on a wandering tour through Sweden and North Germany. His situation at this period was not at all enviable; but, when in sad straits at Lübeck, he met with a friend in the Swedish-Norwegian Vice-Consul, who obtained from his king a small annual stipend. A physical infirmity presently compelled Svendsen so give up the violin, whereupon, turning his attention to composition, he entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig(1863), and received instruction from Hauptmann, David, Richter and Reinecke. Under these circumstances, he wrote a quartet (the work played to-day), a quintet and octet for strings. 'The following anecdote of this period,' remarks Mr. Sievers. 'is both characteristic and authentic. On hearing that Svendsen's octet had been played with great success by the students, Reinecke asked to see it. He declined, however, to suggest any improvements in so splendid a work, but remarked somewhat sarcastically, "The next thing will be a symphony I suppose!" Barely a week after, Svendsen laid his symphony in D before his astonished instructor.' Svendsen left Leipzig in 1867 with the honorary medal of Conservatorium, and proceeded through Denmark, Scotland and Norway, afterwards (1868) going to Paris, where he joined Musard's orchestra and that of the Odéon. In the French capital he wrote his Violin concerto in A, and other works.

When the war of 1870 broke out, Svendsen made his way back to Leipzig, where he was offered the conductorship of the Euturpe concerts, but to no purpose, as the society's work stopped owing to the great conflict which then occupied all thoughts. Svendsen did well in Germany, making many friends and great progress. In 1871 he went to America, returning at the end of the war, and again going to Leipzig and the Euturpe. Subsequently he met Wagner and spent some time in Bayreuth, his next move being to his native country and city, remaining in Christiania for five years as conductor of the Musical Association. In 1874 he obtained an annuity from the Norwegian Parliament and in 1877 once more proceeded abroad. The next year he visited London and introduced a number of his best works, soon, however, returning to Christiania and resuming his old post, which he still retains. 'Svendsen's music,' adds Mr. Sievers, 'is all of a very high character, remarkable for strong individuality, conciseness, and the absence of anything national or Scandinavian, as well as for an elaborate finish strictly in harmony with the traditions of the great masters.' A sketch of the work played to-day could not be prepared owing to unforeseen circumstances.

(First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

LOTOS BLUME.

The lotos flower is troubled
At the sun's resplendent light;
With sunken head and sadly
She dreamily waits for the night.
She waits the moon's arising,
His path on the heaven to trace,
For him alone she unveileth
Her tender flowering face.
She blooms and glows and glistens,
And mutely gazes above,
She weeps and exhals and trembles
With love and the sorrows of love.

DIE BIST WIE EINE BLUME.

Thou art my soul, thou art my heart,
Naught can like thee such joy impart!
Thou art my world, my all of love,
My heaven art thou of all above;
And in thy breast have I reposed
Each grief as in an urn enclosed.
Thou art my rest, to me that's given,
After life's storm, a peaceful haven;
Blest with thy love is life more dear,
Thy glance doth make e'en heaven more clear;
Thou hast upraised me with thy worth,
My guardian angel here on earth!

WIDMUNG.

Thou'rt like unto a flower,
As fair, as pure, as bright;
I gaze on thee, and sadness
Steals o'er my heart's delight.
I long on those golden tresses
My folded hands to lay,
Praying that heaven may preserve thee,
So fair, so pure, alway.

Mendelssohn's influence led Schumann to a deeper study of musical form. His first symphony, the overture, scherzo and finale, and the three string quartets (1842), were the immediate examples of his industry and application. The three quartets "in inniger Verehrung seinem Freunde, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy zugeeinet"—are highly esteemed by Schumann's admirers. The first of the group (the one played to-day) has this peculiarity: that although put forth as "Quartet in A minor," the first allegro (as well as the slow movement) is in F major. No precedent for such independence of form exists in the works of any great master; but Schumann spoke a musical language peculiar to himself, and wholy independent of previous or contemporary models. "The first allegro is prefaced by an introductory andante in A minor. The leading theme of the allegro is F major. A second melody announced by the viola leads directly from it. When this breaks off with a half close on the dominant of C, the second subject proper appears in that key, and soon modulates into others. The second part, or "free fantasia," of the allegro, is constructed upon the before mentioned materials. The scherzo, in A minor, opens with a brisk subject, (presto,) in harmony. The second part is more simply melodic. In place of the trio there is a short intermezzo The scherzo in A minor is then repeated. The adagio, ushered in by a brief prelude, is constructed upon a melody out of which the entire movement may be said to grow, even the very original episode that separates the first and second statements of the theme, and is developed further on. The movement does not come to a full close, but towards the end glides almost imperceptibly back again into the brief introductory prelude, which now in turn becomes its peroration. The finale, in A minor, sets out energetically after three full chords. The first theme leads directly into the second subject in the relative major. Upon these materials, allowing for an episode, in A major, which temporarily supersedes the progress of their developement, the finale is exclusively built." (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS

At the Hyperion Theatre, New Haven,

On Monday evenings, November 10th, December 8th, January 12th, and February 23d.

Eminent Soloists will appear in each concert.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, Five Dollars.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT & SONS, Music Store, 777 Chapel Street, Monday, October 27th, at 9 A.M.

No subscription-list will be opened.

CHAS. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
OCTOBER 20, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become so well and favorably known in New Haven that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

The management beg to renew the assurance that, as in the past, performances may be expected in every way worthy the attention and support of the musical public.

The best available soloists will appear at each concert, and sterling programmes will be presented.

As an aid to a complete understanding of the works to be performed, and to add to the enjoyment of patrons, analytical programmes in book form will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

TUESDAY MORNING

The Kneisel Quartette Concert at Union Hall.

Of course Union Hall was crowde night, and equally of course the au was a representative one, for were four favorite artists who constitu Kneisel Quartette giving their fir cert of the season? The first num the programme was an Opus 1, bu ginning worthy to be compared wi great Opus 1 with which Robert burst upon the musical world. I very first movement of Sven Quartette in A minor the themes well formed and in fine contrast, the development was not of the m tude or skill of a Beethoven or Br it was still adequate and intere More characteristic was the slow ment, in which the viola had som passages in imitation, and in whic chief theme suggested the comp native land of Norway. The third ment was not brisk enough for a Ha nor in the proper rhythm for a Sy Tanz (the two favorite wegian dances which Sve has often used in his cla forms) yet it suggested brightness merrymaking and had a distinctl tional flavor. The chief theme of finale at times seemed very much lik Hungarian Rakoczy March transp into more northern climes. The per ance of the work was excellent, th semble being such as I have learned pect from this leading string quarte America. Mr. Reichmann now app and sang three Schumann lieder. was more successful than on S day last, and his intonation least, was generally true; yet it rather unfortunate that he should chosen such dreamy numbers as Lotos Flower" and "Thou Art Li Flower," for these suit to a sweet pathetic voice; but in this world of purposes, each artist generally longs to try the effects which belong to least, and so I must condone the fact "the timid lotos-flower" became a so tiger lily, and the wish,

On those golden tresses
My folded hands to lay, became expressive of a Sullivanian of laying on of hands, because of the mendous power of the singer. Much b was the beautiful "Widmung," alth the singer and the accompanist (Mr. Ar Whiting) fell out once or twice; but at least the broad climax was noble effective. And, best of all, was the of "Ewige Liebe," which was dramatically rendered and well ac panied. Perhaps this ultra-dram quality is unfitting the singer for the school of the Lied, for the clippi some words, the hissing forth of ot and manifold gasps and pauses, s rather of the operatic stage than of works of Schumann, Schubert or F It would be folly to expect the bu Bashan to coo as a turtle dove, but fo that I counsel Mr. Reichmann to let s like "The Lotos Flower" alone. The of the concert came with Schuma string quartette in A minor, and s didly performed, too, although the might have played a little louder. quartette in the finale of this did noble ensemble work; they seem t growing broader in tone, yet are not lo an iota of their wonderful fi The Scherzo, too, (quite a Schumann, whose scherzi n have the lightheartedness of Mendelss but an underlying earnestness) was perfection of ensemble work, and the in which the cello sang its beau theme in the slow movement, was the best thing Mr. Hekking has done ing the past year or two; it was mast The length of the programme, too, commendable, for in past days the q tette used to furnish so long a tonal that musical indigestion was sure to e especially as the diet was of the riche

LOUIS C. ELS

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMEN

WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Providence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opene regular series of concerts in Providence evening, at Infantry Hall, to an audience nearly filled that spacious auditorium. I composed of the culture and the wealth city, and Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra accorded a reception second only to wh given them in Boston. Infantry Hall is a g one in which to hear this orchestra. Its a tic properties are superior to Boston Music and the climaxes and effects, and this particularly noticeable in the "Obe overture which closed the concert, charming. The programme opened Mozart's Symphony in G minor, the two movements from Tschaikows Symphony which have just been heard in ton were given—and they were given ex ingly well and enthusiastically received. "Moto Perpetuo" of Paganini, which is t by all the violins and which was rendere the orchestra in Boston last season, follo and the programme closed with the "Ober overture. Its rendition was a revelation, as the performances of such familiar pieces by orchestra always.

Mr. Reichmann was the soloist. He gav song from Lortzing's "Czar and the Carpent and two songs with piano later, one being Sc bert's "Wanderer," which was given the fi rendition of anything he has done since Sa day evening when he sang in Music Hall was given an ovation and had to return times to respond to the calls of the audie The concert was a grand success.

...VIDENCE, R. I.
...NESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Greeted Herr Nikisch Last Night.

Next to the quality of the music, the most pleasing feature of the first concert of the subscription series to be given at Infantry hall this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was the audience. It was a large audience for a concert, larger than most concerts can draw in this city. It was illustrative of the educating power of the Symphony orchestra, being larger than the first-night audience the orchestra has ever drawn in this city. The first-night listeners to the Symphony have usually been limited in numbers, and the succeeding concerts have drawn better houses. The same rule prevails this season as has governed in other years, the prospect is excellent for packed houses at the other concerts in the course opened last night, and these concerts are regarded with such favor by Providence people ought to be regarded as a most favorable indication of the growth of music culture in this city, and a growth of a correct appreciation for good music is an influence making toward the best civilization possible that should be cherished in every community.

The concert last night was classical—rather too classical, in fact, for an audience that must contain a very large proportion of people who are not students of music to an extent that enables them to fully appreciate the severe artistic standard maintained by the extreme cult. There were features of the program which did much to popularize it—to redeem it, as it were, from the straight-cut garment with which Herr Nikisch had enveloped it. The program was:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria—"Czar and Zimmerman".....Lortzing
Herr Reichmann.
Two Movements from Symphony No. 4 in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
"Perpetuum Mobile" (for all violins)....
.....Paganini
Songs with Piano—
(a) "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," .....Brahms
(b) Wanderlied.....Schubert
Herr Reichmann.
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Two of these numbers were absolutely new to Providence—the selections from Tschaikowsky's symphony and Paganini's "Perpetual motion" by all the violins. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were pleasing and well-constructed, if no more. They were perhaps carried to a greater length than their ideas warranted, but did not become wearisome. The variations of a rather characteristic theme which appeared on the oboes, 'cellos, and even on the bassoon, at times richly embroidered with flute fioriture, gave excellent chances to these instruments to display themselves in obligato work, and all these chances were well used. The second of these movements was chiefly delivered over to pizzicato effects, and was of a more complex character than Delibes' famous "Pizzicati," yet almost as popular. The use of the wind instruments in short, staccato effects, quite out of their usual character, was quite effective, and these difficult passages were well and crisply played. The Paganini Moto Perpetuo served to demonstrate that the string portion of the orchestra is composed of all artists, and has been given splendid training by Herr Nikisch. The piece was written for and is usually performed by one violin, and when it is given by twenty-eight instruments, with all the fine effects that one artist could produce and the added quality of volume of tone, it is an argument against which there can be no effective statement made.

The Mozart symphony in G minor with which the program opened, has not been heard in Providence for some time, and has never been heard here as it was given last night. It is the best example of Mozart's best work, and Herr Nikisch broke away from the conventional rendering to infuse into the composition something of the real life and temperament of the composer, discarding the formal and pedantic interpretation that has been applied to the works of Mozart. The concluding number was Weber's Overture to "Oberon," which was given with vigor and warmth. The piece is perfectly familiar to all music lovers.

The vocal soloist was Herr Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera company. He has been heard in this city, but such a magnificent voice as his cannot be heard too often. He sang a double number and a single selection, obligingly responding to an imperative encore.

The next concert will be on Wednesday evening, Nov. 19.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
Entered OCTOBER 22, 1890.

H. L. Higginson is the most modest of men. Imagine a Chicago man, establisher of such a course as the symphony course, waiting in the hall for the completion of an orchestral number, when he happened to appear on the scene a bit late. Yet that is Mr. Higginson's record.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1890

Miss Marion Manola, whose singing at the Music Hall Sunday Popular last week created such a sensation, has consented to postpone her intended departure for Europe until next week in order to comply with the many requests the management has received from persons who were prevented from attending last Sunday on account of the storm, and will sing next Sunday at the second Sunday concert in conjunction with Signor Campanari, Leo Shultz, Amelotte and the Salem Cadet band.

[25]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction last Saturday night in Boston, when the following program was performed:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III."....Volkmann
Aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem edlen Kreise," from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor...Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)
Songs.
"Immer leiser wird mein Schlumer".....Brahms
"Am Meer".....Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Theodor Reichmann.

Although it is early in the season it is already manifest that Mr. Nikisch has his orchestra under perfect control and accomplishes results that place the organization in the front rank of orchestral bodies. More finished work than the playing of the Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers is rarely heard.

Mr. Reichmann was slightly off pitch, but his singing was of the intellectual order and called for an encore.

The orchestra is constituted as follows this year:

THE PERSONNEL.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Franz. Kneisel, C. M. Loeffler, O. Roth, L. Svecenski, E. Fiedler, A. Moldauer, D. Kuntz, T. Human, F. Mahn, Hoffmann, Strube, T. Adamowski, W. Krafft, C. Delisle, J. Gantzberg, R. Kuehn.

SECOND VIOLINS.

J. Akeroyd, P. Fiumara, W. W. Swornsbourne, Hahnemann, J. E. Eichler, H. Tischer-Zeitz, F. E. Schuchmann, J. Michael, E. B. Marble, S. Goldstein, R. Kurth, H. Berger, J. Kneisel, J. Ed. Eichler.

VIOLAS.

E. Grunberg, H. Heindl, J. Kluge, W. Rietzel, O. Taubert, Sauer, A. Kolster, L. Post, M. Zach, G. A. Patz, J. Knecht, H. Hoyer.

VIOLONCELLOS.

A. Hekking, H. Mingels, G. Campanari, E. Loeffler, C. Reibl, A. Heindl, J. Adamowski, A. Sailer.

DOUBLE BASS.

A. Goldstein, H. A. Greene, G. Bareither, G. Gerhart, H. J. Butler, L. Jennewein, A. Reinhart, H. Barth,

FLUTES.

C. Molé, E. M. Heindl.

PICCOLO.

P. Fox.

OBOES.

A. Sautet, L. Demuth.

ENGLISH HORN.

F. Müller.

CLARINETS.

G. Goldschmidt.

P. Metzger.

BASSOONS.

H. Günzel.

C. Dietsch.

CONTRA BASSOON.

L. Post.

BASS CLARINET.

H. Nightingale.

HORNS.

A. Hackebarth, J. Schneider, C. Schumann, E. Schormann,

TRUMPETS.

P. Muller, E. N. Lafricain.

TROMBONES.

C. Hampe, Carl Behr, G. W. Stewart.

TUBA. TYMPANI. CYMBALS.

Golde. C. Ludwig. D. H. Moore.

HARP. DRUM.

H. Schluecker. H. Simpson.

LIBRARIAN, TRIANGLE, &C.

W. C. Nichols.

First violins	16	Brass	10
Second violins	14	Percussion	3
Violas	12	Harp	1
'Cellos	8	Triangle, &c	1
Double bass	8
Wood wind	12	Total	85

——The Kneisel Quartet will give the usual series of six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston-st., Boston, on the following Monday evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, February 16 and March 9, 1891. The assisting artists will be: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting.

BOSTON HERALD.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890.

At Music Hall tomorrow evening the Sunday night Popular concert will have many attractive features, the talent engaged including Marion Manola, who is re-engaged for this occasion at the request of many who were unable to attend last Sunday on account of the storm; the popular singer, Sig. Campanari; the 'cello soloist, Leo Shultz; the clarinet soloist, Amelotte, and the Salem Cadet band. Miss Manola will sing Gounod's "Ave Maria" and a number of pleasing ballads, and the selections for the band and other soloists are all of a popular character.

Clipping from Call Philadelphia Pa.
Date 10-24-90

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will give six concerts at the Academy of Music this season on the evenings of November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, March 23 and April 27, the sale of season tickets for which will begin at 1119 Chestnut street, November 3.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The second Symphony concert was much more enjoyable than the first. On the one hand, because the auditors were not trying to work themselves into an obituary frame of mind, and on the other the programme touched the lighter moods of fancy and made but slight demands upon either reflection or passion. The only discouraging element was the vocalism of Mr. Reichmann, who chose rather despondent music and sang so persistently and aggravatingly out of tune that we could not help wondering how small a fraction of his hearers could have any fine sense of intonation. An occasional false note may be excusable or at least explicable, in a heavy voice or in a difficult passage; but Mr. Reichmann made his rare accordances with the pitch seem like accidents, and kept so consistently away from the key that one was puzzled to understand how he did it. On the other hand, he gave to his selections—which were Wolfram's contribution to the bardic tournament in "Tannhäuser" and lieder from Brahms and Schubert—renderings appreciative of their sentiments and their verbal texts, although not perfect in phrasing and extravagantly bedecked with falsetto effects. The novelty of the evening consisted in two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony—the andantino and scherzo. Both were delightful as composition and as performance, the first charming by mellowness and grace, the latter fascinating by fantastic lightness, and neither being touched with the hardness of hand which even the best Russian music is apt to show. The andantino is cast in the measure of a song and has two contrasting themes, the first—which is the longer and more definite—being in a minor key. This is presented lingeringly by the oboe, but as the scoring grows it passes to the strings and is varied and embellished beautifully. As it strengthens to a climax, the key changes and the responsive major theme enters at a quicker pace and with something of anxiety; this mood is brief, the first air returns and the movement ends gently. A chief and curious feature of the scherzo is that so much of it is written for the strings in pizzicato and with short, sudden staccato chords for the wind instruments when they bear the burden of the accompaniment. In the middle of the movement comes an episode which gives the suggestion of a dance-measure, with its solo for clarinet and its drone-like support. A rushing, eager passage follows this, and then, with a return to the first theme and manner, all ends. Every one hears music according to his imagination, and to us this movement suggested a cold, clear winter night, sparkling with frost and stars; an hour of genial gayety within doors filled with bustle and song; a rising of keen, busy midnight winds and broken clouds, and then the hurry homeward again under the glitter of constellations and across the glimmer of ice and snow. The overture was Volkmann's "Richard III.," heavily rich in sombre coloring and almost spectral at times with its strange orchestration and deeply significant phrases. It is a melodramatic work, no doubt; but not for that unworthy of its name. The symphony was that most melodious and sympathetic of the Brahms four—the second; this is instinct with a happy spirit which none of the scholar's arts can hide or harden, and yet the power of those arts is so evident that the musician respects it while the dilettante merely admires. The orchestra did excellent work all the evening; the new kettle-drum player begins to moderate his transports, but the new first horn, although his tone is pure and apparent, still does not reach the confident freedom and varied shading of his predecessors. Mr. Nikisch accompanied on a sweet Chickering, to perfection; and he was pushed quite to his wits' ends by Mr. Reichmann's insistance upon singing an encore which the applause was not sufficient to call for under any circumstances and which Symphony canons forbid. The programme was already too long and this gratification of Mr. Reichmann's vanity cheated the ten-o'clock train people out of the last movement of the Symphony.

Tonight's programme does not err on the side of levity It is made up of Wagner's "Faust" overture and two symphonies—Haydn, in D major, number 2, and Schubert's long C major; there is no soloist.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The first concert of the Kneisel Quartette took place on Monday evening at Union Hall. The novelty of the evening was a quartette by the Scandinavian composer, Svendsen, which was interesting and gave great pleasure. The first movement had the least of his agreeable individuality; it was academic and almost labored in style, anxious in spirit and uncertain in statement. But the other three movements were wholly delightful, each having something fresh to say and conveying it lucidly and briefly, yet with ample variety of treatment. The andantino has almost the character of a hymn in the close harmonies and squared rhythm of its first subject, the religious character of which is not dissipated by the lighter sweep of the second, that lasts little longer than an intermezzo might. The scherzo sets out with a gay and lightfooted air from the 'cello, which passes through the quartette, always with rippling accompaniment or quaint comment, and ends suddenly while in the full vigor of its course. The finale, beginning with a rattling unison, keeps up almost to a presto in pace and never relaxes its buoyant disposition. The other quartette was Schumann's first, which contains some beautiful and inspired movements such as the introductory andante, the sweet deep adagio, and the quaint and unexpected episode of moderation which interrupts the swift rush of the finale. These are opposed to the other movements in which the author's metaphysical fashions and his apparent uncertainty as to how his thoughts should best be expressed detract from the unprofessional hearer's enjoyment. The club played well, but not always in their best form, the first violin being sometimes too prominent and the 'cello too weak. Mr. Reichmann performed three songs of Schumann with unpleasantly assertive opposition of his own notions to the ideas of the poet and the composer, and only less ill in intonation and phrasing than at the Symphony concert. Still being all the fashion and having an array of miniature decorations in his lapel, he was encored. Mr. Arthur Whiting at the piano accompanied so delightfully as occasionally to make one ignore the singer.

Clipping from Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.
Date 10/20

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert to be given next Monday night at the Grand Opera House will be the musical event of the season. Herr Arthur Nikisch, the popular conductor, has returned from his European trip with new and grander conceptions of the meaning of the word music, and the concerts at Boston have been attended by crowds of listeners who have been charmed and held spellbound by the wonderful skill of this great leader. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, who won such laurels at the Worcester festival this year, will be the soloist of the occasion. The orchestra will come down on a special train from Boston Monday afternoon returning at the close of the concert. Sixty-five musicians not including the soloists, will be present. People having tickets would do well to go early and secure their seats, thus avoiding the rush at the door.

THE REGISTER.
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 24.

HYPERION THEATER. NIKISCH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,

With the Assistance Of

Eminent Solo Artists.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.

Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.

Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, Oct. 27th, at 9 A. M.

☞ No Subscription—First come first Served.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion, November 10, and the others of the course will follow December 8, January 12, and February 23.

THE REGISTER.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25,

New Haven Highly Favored.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Oct. 25, 1890.

To the Editor of the Register:

The people of New Haven are about to have the privilege of enjoying a series of fine orchestral concerts. This privilege is one which we as a city have earned through our own efforts.

The aim of this contribution to your columns is to call the attention of our community to the fact that New Haven is the only city between Boston and New York which the Boston Symphony society favors with its performances while on its way to New York and Philadelphia.

Six years ago a few of our music-loving citizens appealed to the public for support in starting a series of orchestral concerts in our city. The response, as will be remembered, was most gratifying and a succession of brilliant concerts with overflowing houses was the result. The Boston Symphony recognizing the fact that we appreciate a high order of music here, has delighted us for a number of years past with a series of four magnificent concerts each season. And now as the seventh year opens shall we not greet Mr. Nikisch and his noble orchestra with large and enthusiastic audiences. We cannot afford to do without them, and in closing permit me to suggest to those among us who are generously if not musically inclined that they should subscribe to the cause as a matter of pride and enterprise, giving their tickets to those members of our community who otherwise could not avail themselves of so great an opportunity for musical culture and enjoyment. A CITIZEN.

At the Theaters.

The sale of course tickets for the series of concerts to be given this winter at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be opened Monday morning at 9 o'clock, at Steinerts' music store. The first concert will be given on November 10.

The Telegram.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Greeted Herr Nikisch Last Night.

Next to the quality of the music, the most pleasing feature of the first concert of the subscription series to be given at Infantry hall this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was the audience. It was a large audience for a concert, larger than most concerts can draw in this city. It was illustrative of the educating power of the Symphony orchestra, being larger than any first-night audience the orchestra has ever drawn in this city. The first-night listeners to the Symphony have usually been limited in numbers, and the succeeding concerts have drawn better houses. If the same rule prevails this season as has governed in other years, the prospect is excellent for packed houses at the other concerts in the course opened last night. That these concerts are regarded with such favor by Providence people ought to be regarded as a most favorable indication of the growth of music culture in this city, and a growth of a correct appreciation for good music is an influence making toward the best civilization possible that should be cherished in every community.

The concert last night was classical—rather too classical, in fact, for an audience that must contain a very large proportion of people who are not students of music to an extent that enables them to fully appreciate the severe artistic standard maintained by the extreme cult. There were features of the program which did much to popularize it—to redeem it, as it were, from the straight-cut garment with which Herr Nikisch had enveloped it. The program was:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria—"Czar and Zimmerman".....Lortzing
Herr Reichmann.
Two Movements from Symphony No. 4 in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
"Perpetuum Mobile" (for all violins).....Paganini
Songs with Piano—
(a) "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," .....Brahms
(b) Wanderlied.....Schubert
Herr Reichmann.
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Two of these numbers were absolutely new to Providence—the selections from Tschaikowsky's symphony and Paganini's "Perpetual motion" by all the violins. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony were pleasing and well-constructed, if no more. They were perhaps carried to a greater length than their ideas warranted, but did not become wearisome. The variations of a rather characteristic theme which appeared on the oboes, 'cellos, and even on the bassoon, at times richly embroidered with flute fioriture, gave excellent chances to these instruments to display themselves in obligato work, and all these chances were well used. The second of these movements was chiefly delivered over to pizzicato effects, and was of a more complex character than Delibes' famous "Pizzicati," yet almost as popular. The use of the wind instruments in short, staccato effects, quite out of their usual character, was quite effective, and these difficult passages were well and crisply played. The Paganini Moto Perpetuo served to demonstrate that the string portion of the orchestra is composed of all artists, and has been given splendid training by Herr Uikisch. The piece was written for and is usually performed by one violin and when it is given by twenty-eight instruments, with all the fine effects that one artist could produce and the added quality of volume of tone, it is an argument against which there can be no effective statement made.

The Mozart symphony in G minor with which the program opened, has not been heard in Providence for some time, and has never been heard here as it was given last night. It is the best example of Mozart's best work, and Herr Nikisch broke away from the conventional rendering to infuse into the composition something of the real life and temperament of the composer, discarding the formal and pedantic interpretation that has been applied to the works of Mozart. The concluding number was Weber's Overture to "Oberon," which was given with vigor and warmth. The piece is perfectly familiar to all music lovers.

The vocal soloist was Herr Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera company. He has been heard in this city, but such a magnificent voice as his cannot be heard too often. He sang a double number and a single selection, obligingly responding to an imperative encore.

The next concert will be on Wednesday evening, Nov. 19.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
[Entered OCTOBER 22, ...er.]

H. L. Higginson is the most modest of men. Imagine a Chicago man, establisher of such a course as the symphony course, waiting in the hall for the completion of an orchestral number, when he happened to appear on the scene a bit late. Yet that is Mr. Higginson's record.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1890

Miss Marion Manola, whose singing at the first Music Hall Sunday Popular last week created such a sensation, has consented to postpone her intended departure for Europe until next week in order to comply with the many requests the management has received from persons who were prevented from attending last Sunday on account of the storm, and will sing next Sunday at the second Sunday Popular in conjunction with Signor Campanari, Leo Shultz, Amelotte and the Salem Cadet band.

[25]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction last Saturday night in Boston, when the following program was performed:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III."....Volkmann
Aria, "Blick ich umher in diesem edlen Kreise," from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor....Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)
Songs.
"Immer leiser wird mein Schlumer".....Brahms
"Am Meer".....Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Theodor Reichmann.

Although it is early in the season it is already manifest that Mr. Nikisch has his orchestra under perfect control and accomplishes results that place the organization in the front rank of orchestral bodies. More finished work than the playing of the Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers is rarely heard.

Mr. Reichmann was slightly off pitch, but his singing was of the intellectual order and called for an encore.

The orchestra is constituted as follows this year:

THE PERSONNEL.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Franz Kneisel, C. M. Loeffler, O. Roth, L. Svecenski, E. Fiedler, A. Moldauer, D. Kuntz, T. Human, F. Mahn, Hoffmann, Strube, T. Adamowski, W. Krafft, C. Delisle, J. Gantzberg, R. Kuehn.

SECOND VIOLINS.

J. Akeroyd, P. Fiumara, W. W. Swornsbourne, Hahnemann, J. E. Eichler, H. Tischer-Zeitz, F. E. Schuchmann, J. Michael, E. B. Marble, S. Goldstein, R. Kurth, H. Berger, J. Kneisel, J. Ed. Eichler.

VIOLAS.

E. Grunberg, H. Heindl, J. Kluge, W. Rietzel, O. Taubert, Sauer, A. Kolster, L. Post, M. Zach, G. A. Patz, J. Knecht, H. Hoyer.

VIOLONCELLOS.

A. Hekking, H. Mingels, G. Campanari, E. Loeffler, C. Reibl, A. Heindl, J. Adamowski, A. Sailer.

DOUBLE BASS.

A. Goldstein, H. A. Greene, G. Bareither, G. Gerhart, H. J. Butler, L. Jennewein, A. Reinhart, H. Barth,

FLUTES.

C. Molé, E. M. Heindl.

PICCOLO.

P. Fox.

OBOES.

A. Sautet, L. Demuth.

ENGLISH HORN.

F. Müller.

CLARINETS.

G. Goldschmidt, P. Metzger.

BASSOONS.

H. Günzel, C. Dietsch.

CONTRA BASSOON.

L. Post.

BASS CLARINET.

H. Nightingale.

HORNS.

A. Hackebarth, J. Schneider, C. Schumann, E. Schormann,

TRUMPETS.

P. Muller, E. N. Lafricain.

TROMBONES.

C. Hampe, Carl Behr, G. W. Stewart.

TUBA. TYMPANI. CYMBALS.

Golde. C. Ludwig. D. H. Moore.

HARP. DRUM.

H. Schüecker. H. Simpson.

LIBRARIAN, TRIANGLE, &C.

W. C. Nichols.

First violins	16	Brass	10
Second violins	14	Percussion	3
Violas	12	Harp	1
'Cellos	8	Triangle, &c	1
Double bass	8
Wood wind	12	Total	85

——The Kneisel Quartet will give the usual series of six subscription concerts in Union Hall, 18 Boylston-st., Boston, on the following Monday evenings, October 20, November 24, December 29, 1890, January 26, February 16 and March 9, 1891. The assisting artists will be: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, Mr. Theodor Reichmann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Arthur Whiting.

BOSTON HERALD.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890.

At Music Hall tomorrow evening the Sunday night Popular concert will have many attractive features, the talent engaged including Marion Manola, who is re-engaged for this occasion at the request of many who were unable to attend last Sunday on account of the storm; the popular singer, Sig. Campanari; the 'cello soloist, Leo Shultz; the clarinet soloist, Amelotte, and the Salem Cadet band. Miss Manola will sing Gounod's "Ave Maria" and a number of pleasing ballads, and the selections for the band and other soloists are all of a popular character.

Clipping from Philadelphia Pa.
Date 10-21

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will give six concerts at the Academy of Music this season on the evenings of November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, March 23 and April 27, the sale of season tickets for which will begin at 1119 Chestnut street, November 3.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The second Symphony concert was much more enjoyable than the first. On the one hand, because the auditors were not trying to work themselves into an obituary frame of mind, and on the other the programme touched the lighter moods of fancy and made but slight demands upon either reflection or passion. The only discouraging element was the vocalism of Mr. Reichmann, who chose rather despondent music and sang so persistently and aggravatingly out of tune that we could not help wondering how small a fraction of his hearers could have any fine sense of intonation. An occasional false note may be excusable or at least explicable, in a heavy voice or in a difficult passage; but Mr. Reichmann made his rare accordances with the pitch seem like accidents, and kept so consistently away from the key that one was puzzled to understand how he did it. On the other hand, he gave to his selections—which were Wolfram's contribution to the bardic tournament in "Tannhäuser" and lieder from Brahms and Schubert—renderings appreciative of their sentiments and their verbal texts, although not perfect in phrasing and extravagantly bedecked with falsetto effects. The novelty of the evening consisted in two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony—the andantino and scherzo. Both were delightful as composition and as performance, the first charming by mellowness and grace, the latter fascinating by fantastic lightness, and neither being touched with the hardness of hand which even the best Russian music is apt to show. The andantino is cast in the measure of a song and has two contrasting themes, the first—which is the longer and more definite—being in a minor key. This is presented lingeringly by the oboe, but as the scoring grows it passes to the strings and is varied and embellished beautifully. As it strengthens to a climax, the key changes and the responsive major theme enters at a quicker pace and with something of anxiety; this mood is brief, the first air returns and the movement ends gently. A chief and curious feature of the scherzo is that so much of it is written for the strings in pizzicato and with short, sudden staccato chords for the wind instruments when they bear the burden of the accompaniment. In the middle of the movement comes an episode which gives the suggestion of a dance-measure, with its solo for clarinet and its drone-like support. A rushing, eager passage follows this, and then, with a return to the first theme and manner, all ends. Every one hears music according to his imagination, and to us this movement suggested a cold, clear winter night, sparkling with frost and stars; an hour of genial gayety within doors filled with bustle and song; a rising of keen, busy midnight winds and broken clouds, and then the hurry homeward again under the glitter of constellations and across the glimmer of ice and snow. The overture was Volkmann's "Richard III.," heavily rich in sombre coloring and almost spectral at times with its strange orchestration and deeply significant phrases. It is a melodramatic work, no doubt; but not for that unworthy of its name. The symphony was that most melodious and sympathetic of the Brahms four—the second; this is instinct with a happy spirit which none of the scholar's arts can hide or harden, and yet the power of those arts is so evident that the musician respects it while the dilettante merely admires. The orchestra did excellent work all the evening; the new kettle-drum player begins to moderate his transports, but the new first horn, although his tone is pure and apparent, still does not reach the confident freedom and varied shading of his predecessors. Mr. Nikisch accompanied on a sweet Chickering, to perfection; and he was pushed quite to his wits' ends by Mr. Reichmann's insistance upon singing an encore which the applause was not sufficient to call for under any circumstances and which Symphony canons forbid. The programme was already too long and this gratification of Mr. Reichmann's vanity cheated the ten-o'clock train people out of the last movement of the Symphony.

Tonight's programme does not err on the side of levity It is made up of Wagner's "Faust" overture and two symphonies—Haydn, in D major, number 2, and Schubert's long C major; there is no soloist.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The first concert of the Kneisel Quartette took place on Monday evening at Union Hall. The novelty of the evening was a quartette by the Scandinavian composer, Svendsen, which was interesting and gave great pleasure. The first movement had the least of his agreeable individuality; it was academic and almost labored in style, anxious in spirit and uncertain in statement. But the other three movements were wholly delightful, each having something fresh to say and conveying it lucidly and briefly, yet with ample variety of treatment. The andantino has almost the character of a hymn in the close harmonies and squared rhythm of its first subject, the religious character of which is not dissipated by the lighter sweep of the second, that lasts little longer than an intermezzo might. The scherzo sets out with a gay and lightfooted air from the 'cello, which passes through the quartette, always with rippling accompaniment or quaint comment, and ends suddenly while in the full vigor of its course. The finale, beginning with a rattling unison, keeps up almost to a presto in pace and never relaxes its buoyant disposition. The other quartette was Schumann's first, which contains some beautiful and inspired movements such as the introductory andante, the sweet deep adagio, and the quaint and unexpected episode of moderation which interrupts the swift rush of the finale. These are opposed to the other movements in which the author's metaphysical fashions and his apparent uncertainty as to how his thoughts should best be expressed detract from the unprofessional hearer's enjoyment. The club played well, but not always in their best form, the first violin being sometimes too prominent and the 'cello too weak. Mr. Reichmann performed three songs of Schumann with unpleasantly assertive opposition of his own notions to the ideas of the poet and the composer, and only less ill in intonation and phrasing than at the Symphony concert. Still being all the fashion and having an array of miniature decorations in his lapel, he was encored. Mr. Arthur Whiting at the piano accompanied so delightfully as occasionally to make one ignore the singer.

Clipping from ...
Date 10/20

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert to be given next Monday night at the Grand Opera House will be the musical event of the season. Herr Arthur Nikisch, the popular conductor, has returned from his European trip with new and grander conceptions of the meaning of the word music, and the concerts at Boston have been attended by crowds of listeners who have been charmed and held spellbound by the wonderful skill of this great leader. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, who won such laurels at the Worcester festival this year, will be the soloist of the occasion. The orchestra will come down on a special train from Boston Monday afternoon returning at the close of the concert. Sixty-five musicians not including the soloists, will be present. People having tickets would do well to go early and secure their seats, thus avoiding the rush at the door.

THE REGISTER.
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 24.
HYPERION THEATER. } NIKISCH.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
"The only orchestra to appear in this city organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class."
FOUR GRAND CONCERTS,
With the Assistance Of
Eminent Solo Artists.
Monday Evenings, Nov. 10th, Dec. 8th, Jan. 12th, Feb. 23d.
Season tickets, with best Reserved Seats for the series, $5.
Sale opens at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St., Monday, Oct. 27th, at 9 A. M.
☞ No Subscription—First come first Served.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion, November 10, and the others of the course will follow December 8, January 12, and February 23.

THE REGISTER.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25,

New Haven Highly Favored.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Oct. 25, 1890.

To the Editor of the Register:

The people of New Haven are about to have the privilege of enjoying a series of fine orchestral concerts. This privilege is one which we as a city have earned through our own efforts.

The aim of this contribution to your columns is to call the attention of our community to the fact that New Haven is the only city between Boston and New York which the Boston Symphony society favors with its performances while on its way to New York and Philadelphia.

Six years ago a few of our music-loving citizens appealed to the public for support in starting a series of orchestral concerts in our city. The response, as will be remembered, was most gratifying and a succession of brilliant concerts with overflowing houses was the result. The Boston Symphony recognizing the fact that we appreciate a high order of music here, has delighted us for a number of years past with a series of four magnificent concerts each season. And now as the seventh year opens shall we not greet Mr. Nikisch and his noble orchestra with large and enthusiastic audiences. We cannot afford to do without them, and in closing permit me to suggest to those among us who are generously if not musically inclined that they should subscribe to the cause as a matter of pride and enterprise, giving their tickets to those members of our community who otherwise could not avail themselves of so great an opportunity for musical culture and enjoyment. A CITIZEN.

At the Theaters.

The sale of course tickets for the series of concerts to be given this winter at the Hyperion theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be opened Monday morning at 9 o'clock, at Steinerts' music store. The first concert will be given on November 10.

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890

Whatever may be the merits of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor—and in directing works of the modern romantic school he certainly carries all before him—as a maker of programs he is a failure. His selections for the symphony concerts of last year showed that here in Boston he still breathed the air of the little town of Leipzig, and walked our streets clothed in its atmosphere. He either dislikes or ignores the writings of the French school; and in his arrangement of the familiar German compositions he pays no attention to space or time; that which is heaviest is kept for the final number, and throughout the programs there is no contrast—there is no relief. There was some excuse for the dreariness of the first concert of this season, for it was a memorial service; and the rites which attend the apotheosis or the canonization of the dead generally serve only to re-open the wounds and intensify the woe of the mourner.

* * * * *

The program of last Saturday's concert was made up of Volkmann's Overture, "Richard III.;" the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony, No. 4, in F; and Brahms' Symphony, No. 2, in D major. What can be said of the overture, except that as a whole it is a tiresome composition? Viewed as program music, it must suffer from the very choice of a subject; for the popular idea of the character of Richard, in spite of the whitewashing of modern historians, suggests only unrelieved cruelty, nor were there gentle episodes in his life which might furnish the musician with stuff for a musical contrast. It is true that the embodiment of this character upon the stage depends upon the actor's conception of the part. We are told by the enthusiastic Mrs. French that Kean's Richard "possessed a mine of humor and pleasantry, with all the grace of high breeding grafted on strong and brilliant intellect;" and Barry Sullivan made him half brute, half clown. Volkmann's Overture, however, is full of nothing but saturnine savageness and the tumult of battle. The battle scene is naturally full of sound and fury, and it is interesting to learn from Mr. Volkmann's score that the familiar air, "The Campbell's are coming," was heard on Bosworth Field above the clash of arms and groans of the dying.

* * * * *

The recipe for concocting a musical battle is of ancient date. In 1544 Clément Jannequin published "The Battle of Marignan" and "The War" for voices, and whoever is interested in studying the history of program music will find in the second volume of Weckerlin's "Musiciana" a list of musical battle-pieces, where among the names of composers, are found those of Beethoven, Pacini, Steibelt, and Diabelli.

* * * * *

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony are so interesting that it is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch did not give the composer his due by playing the whole work. The andantino is beautiful in idea and in workmanship; it is thoroughly individual and characteristic; the scherzo is most ingenious as regards instrumentation and will serve as a test piece for an orchestra. These numbers were exceedingly well played, as was, in fact, the whole orchestral program.

* * * * *

The Brahms Symphony, with the exception of the adagio, is a noble work; probably the slavish worshippers of Brahms regret that the other movements of the symphony do not rise to the "high intellectual level" of this adagio. But when the vague quantity ycleped "intellectuality" enters into a musical composition, music itself will not endure a rival and disappears. Metaphysics and music cannot dwell together, nor will the most cunning contrapuntal exercises awaken emotions. Does any one suppose that Mozart, or Haydn, or Beethoven bothered himself about the expression of any ideas save musical ideas? They were content to write music. They were music makers. And in the first and two last movements Brahms too has followed their example.

* * * * *

But Mr. Nikisch made a mistake, a mistake which often happens, in putting this symphony at the end of the concert; and the mistake was the more serious upon this occasion, for the ears had been tortured by the false intonation of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, the soloist of the evening. Nature was kind to Mr. Reichmann and gave him a rich and powerful voice which he has sadly abused. When he sang in Munich he constantly forced it; and when he went to Vienna his faults became more marked and more grievous with each performance. As he began to lose his hold upon the public, he naturally looked towards America and readily became a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, the life-saving station, the asylum of so many worn out and exhausted singers of Germany. He sang the dreary song from "Tannhauser," a song which should have cost the bard his position at court, even before he had avowed his relations with Venus; and songs by Brahms and Schubert. His singing has been praised for its "intellectuality" and "musicianly spirit"; but surely it is not the mark of a musician to sing one phrase with full voice, the next with a wretched falsetto which apes the true piano, and thus make of a song "one vile antithesis." The audience was so enthusiastic and Mr. Reichmann seemed so contented that the scene must have reminded him of the happy state of affairs at ancient Thebes where it was an indictable offense to disturb a musician in the exercise of his art.

* * * * *

So far as concerts of an instrumental nature are concerned the chamber concerts given by the Kneisel quartet are easily first. The quartet playing is well nigh perfection; the programs are worthy of the players. It has been said that it is the fashion to attend these concerts and that the many who attend are coerced, and secretly wish themselves anywhere but in Union Hall. Yet if it is only a fashion, it is one which should be kept alive. The program of the first concert which took place Monday evening was made up of Svendsen's Quartet in A minor op. 1 and Schumann's Quartet in A minor op. 41 No. 1. The quartet of the Norwegian composer, written when he was studying at Leipsig, is a pleasing work of which the first movement is the least agreeable, in fact it is for the most part dry and conventional; in the scherzando, the most original portion of the quartet, whimsicalness is but within a step of catch-penny clap-trap. Although the composition is worth the playing, it has not the true character of a string-quartet and it continually suggests the orchestra. It was a novelty so far as the Kneisel concerts are concerned.

* * * * *

A very select audience gathered in Union hall on Monday night to enjoy the first Kneisel quartet concert of the season. Among them were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mrs. Edward Robinson, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Edward Jackson, Miss Emma Rice, Mrs. B. T. Olcott, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank Johns, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. Howard Ticknor and Mr. Louis Elson. The group of songs of Schumann, including H. Heine's "Du bist wie eine blume," by Mr. Reichmann was exceedingly well received.

Mr. Nikisch will doubtless accept more invitations this year than last if Mrs. Nikisch be included in them. Mrs. Nikisch, by the way, speaks English fluently with scarcely any accent.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The first chamber concert of the sixth season was given last Monday evening, in Union Hall, before the old-time large, attentive and appreciative audience. The same four finished and congenial artists, who seem to have grown together, as by some true affinity of musical artistic nature, into rare unity of style and feeling and fine mutual understanding, still compose the quartet: Franz Kneisel, the "Vorgeiger" or leading violinist in the Symphony Orchestra; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola: Anton Hekking, violoncello; all likewise members of the orchestra. The programme was as follows:

Svendsen—Quartet in A minor, Op. 1.
Schumann—Songs, with piano:
"Lotos Blume."
"Du bist wie eine Blume."
"Widmung."
Schumann—Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1.
Binger, Theodor Reichmann, baritone.

Johan Severin Svendsen, a Norwegian composer of strong individuality, but of by no means so fine a genius as the Danish Gade, who was born in 1840 at Christiania, where he is now living as conductor of the musical association and teacher of composition. He became a violinist in his early youth, and in 1863 studied at the Conservatory in Leipzig under Hauptmann, David, Richter and Reinecke, owing most, he always said, to the first. While there he composed his three only works of chamber music—Op. 1, the quartet in A minor, played last Monday; Op. 3, octet for strings in A minor; Op. 5, string quintet in C. The octet seems to have made the greatest impression in Germany. His other principal compositions are two symphonies, a violin and a violoncello concerto, several overtures, romances, rhapsodies, etc., and songs. Indeed, the list is not a long one, nor does it seem peculiarly rich. He travelled a good deal in Europe, married in America, spent some time in Paris, also at Bayreuth, where he became intimate with Wagner, but is now settled at his Norwegian birthplace. His violin concerto (in A) was played here in a Harvard musical concert by Wulf Fries, who has lived so long in Norway. It did not make a very agreeable impression, which was no fault of the interpreter.

It is a little singular that his opus 1 has not been followed by any further effort in the way of string quartet composition, considering how well it has been received. It has been given several times in Boston by the Listemann Quartet, we believe, but we did not chance to hear it. Of course we cannot offer a mature opinion of it after a single hearing; nor can we speak by book, since there is no score published; it is only available in separate parts. Admirably played, as it was, it sounded euphonious, rich, free, clear and full of verve; a work of striking character for one beginning his career. The strongly contrasted middle movements interested us most. The finale was spirited and brilliant, one might say dashing, yet a little commonplace, winding up in the usual manner of a theatre overture. We noticed nothing peculiarly Scandinavian or local in its melody or flavor. All was within the bounds of harmony and form, and free from wild extravagance.

In the Schumann quartet, also in A minor, the first of the three quartets in op. 41—the only ones he wrote—we have finer metal. Schumann was not a violinist, but he wrote here in the spirit of the violin, whether he was hampered by the technique or not; at any rate, all flows freely, easily and gracefully in all the movements of this lovely composition. If he did not write for the violin family par excellence, he did write for music. Each movement is a breath from the essential life and soul of music. It is music for its own sake, representing nothing that could be expressed in words, conforming to no programme, advocating no idea or principle or faith, hinting no history, no drama through the medium of tones. It is music pure and self-sufficing — music, itself "more definite than words," as Mendelssohn once wrote when asked to explain the meaning of one of his wordless songs.

A peculiar feature in the Andante introduction is, that while in A minor, and while the quartet is said to be in A minor, it soon shows a bias toward the key of F major, and in that key the allegro is openly written. Its six-eight movement is serene, pensive, graceful, genial, presenting at least three distinct and interesting melodic motives, which are contrasted and worked up together so artistically that they seem to spring forth spontaneously. It is a charming movement, making one feel at peace and at home in a better world of which music is the atmosphere and revelation. The Scherzo, in A minor, is in the same rhythm, only presto, has a family relationship of character and is equally delightful. The flow of it is broken only once by a short intermezzo in four-part measure in the key of C, which forms a refreshing episode. The Adagio is in F again, in common time. It is substantially a Lied, a serious melody of great beauty and depth of feeling, sung now by the first violin, now by the other instruments in turn, introduced accompanied and followed by imaginative fantasia-like figures, which gives it all an air of reverie, pathetic and profound. The Presto, beginning in A minor, alla breve, is brisk, decided, the parts running, chasing, diving, with great vivacity. Before the close occurs an exquisite surprise, where suddenly the heavens seem to open and you are caught up into a mystic element of light and beauty, an effect somewhat, on a smaller scale, like that of the marvellous trio to the Scherzo in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. On a long sustained drone bass, or organ point, keynote of A major, reflected in upper octaves, a simple, charming strain of hurdy-gurdy melody is heard, but like a hurdy-gurdy strain transfigured, glorified; then a piece of mystic harmony in equal whole notes for the four parts. All this is in a more moderate tempo; then the vision fades, the quick time returns, with the original motive, and, still in the major, hastens to a close. The quartet was exquisitely played, in the true Schumann spirit. It is perhaps not generally known that a four-hand arrangement of the three quartets was made with Schumann's commendation, by Otto Dresel, and published by Breitkopf & Härtel. The group of Schumann songs between the two quartets were more beautiful in themselves than in the treatment they received from the singer, Mr. Reichmann, who was fairly well accompanied by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with the exception of one or two momentary disagreements in the last song of the three. Mr. Reichmann has a splendid voice, and great force of delivery as well as much coolly, finely calculated shading. But hearing him in that smaller hall, "at closer range" we missed that feeling and that true and pure expression for which we gave him credit in the Music Hall.

were overtone, as it were, [illegible] by sheer tours de force. Schumann's songs are from the heart; the rendering was not so; it was cold and lacked fire from within. This especially in the "Lotos Blume" and the one beginning "Du bist wie eine Blume"—words to which everybody makes a song, but not a song like Schumann's! The uncontainable rapturous fervor of "Du meine Seele, O du mein Herz!" ("Widmung") had more in it for the opera singer, and he made it in some sense effective; but one still felt the want of that magnetic, spiritual something from within, in which dwells the secret of true song, from the heart to the heart. It is but fair to say, however, that the singer bore off a plentiful crop of applause, and graciously granted an encore, for which he chose a rather lengthy song of Brahms's (op. 43, No. 1), entitled "Von ewiger Liebe," beginning "Dunkel, wie Dunkel in Wald und in Feld!" It has a sad, almost tragical Volksong mood in its somewhat monotonous melody and more monotonous accompaniment, beginning in C-sharp minor, three-four moderato, and after a prolonged dying interlude, passing inharmonically into D-flat major, six-eight measure, ending with the affirmation: "Our love is firm as steel and must stand forever!" This was insisted on with energy. The commendable shortness of the programme left room for the addition or interpolation on the score of length.

The date of the second concert is Nov. 24.

J. S. D.

The second popular concert in Music Hall will be given tomorrow evening. Miss Marion Manola will sing, and other musicians engaged are Messrs. Giuseppe Campanari and Leo Schultz, and the Salem Cadet Band.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three concerts in Steinert Hall on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1, and Jan. 5. The programme for the first concert is: Quartet in D minor, op. 11, Haydn; Wiegenlied for violin, Fitzenbragen; Theme and Variations for four violoncellos, Klingel; Quartet in C, op. 61, Dvorak.

The programme for the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, next Saturday night, is as follows: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark: pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moskowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 26, 1890.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A glance at the programme of last evening was, without doubt, sufficient to set many lovers of the "old classics" aghast at the bare idea of Wagner's "A Faust overture" being inserted between a Haydn symphony and that monumental product of Schubert's genius, his symphony in C, No. 10. And it certainly needed a performance of the three works in this order to justify Mr. Nikisch's almost unique idea. Whether or not he wished to prove to his audience how well these symphonies could hold their own with a work of one who had the resources of the modern orchestra at his command, and who knew well how to use them, matters little. It is enough to know that they did hold their own without the slightest difficulty This fact is not surprising when one thinks of the magnificence and the gorgeous scoring of the Schubert work. But that a work from the pen of that "Well-spring of joyous melody," dear old Haydn, should pass through such an ordeal unscathed—well, it must at least have excited a widespread desire to hear a good deal more of his music than has been vouchsafed the Symphony audiences of late years. Someone said, in speaking of the Bach violinduo concerto, that his music should appear much oftener on the Symphony programmes. That is true. As a matter of education alone we should be permitted to hear Bach, and Haydn as well, far more frequently. We all know how commonly the appellation of "child-like" has been attached to Haydn. To be sure, much of his music has that unsophisticated air about it that recalls vividly the untroubled happiness and innocence of youth. But there is little or nothing about it that can really be termed child-like; it has the freshness, the spontaneity of ever happy genius, not of childhood. The symphony performed, the last of the twelve that Haydn contracted to write for Salomon, the London manager (No. 2 in the Peters' edition) is one of the strongest, as well as one of those that are most familiar to Boston concert goers. The breadth and sonority of its introduction forcibly suggest Beethoven. With the entrance of the allegro, however, all thoughts of him vanish, and Haydn is himself again to the end of the work with all his tunefulness, simplicity, jollity, and his at times, cloudy, but never stormy, so to say, seriousness. The symphony was performed in a delightful manner. Mr. Nikisch was peculiarly happy in his tempi, and all four movements seemed to receive just the right sort of interpretation, without being unduly modernized. It was received with much enthusiasm. The "Faust" overture grows more interesting with each successive hearing. The subject itself is a fruitful one for the imagination to dwell upon, and, according to the correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, it was to them a fruitful theme for discussion. Musical purists to the contrary, notwithstanding, one's interest in "programme" music is inevitably enhanced by analyses that are in any way clever, or writings that throw any light upon the intended meaning of the music; and so we are glad to know that Wagner originally intended to write a full symphony on the subject, of which this overture was to be the first movement, and to represent Faust in solitude; that he gave up the idea, threw the manuscript aside, where it remained unnoticed for years, and finally, at the solicitation of Liszt, re-wrote it, and had it performed soon afterwards at Zurich. Like most programme music, it would be quite an easy matter to imagine a hundred other scenes in connection with this music of Wagner's, but it cannot be denied that the suggestions of infinite longing, despair, and the presence of the "ever womanly" influence, as Wagner himself describes the serene closing measures, are clearly made. Everyone knows the magic of Mr. Nikisch's manner in dealing with Wagner; therefore it is enough to say that he was as successful as usual in his reading of this work, and that the orchestra responded to his lead freely and effectively. Robert Schumann's enthusiastic words concerning Schubert are so characteristic of his warm heart and appreciative nature, and so delightfully discriminating, that to quote some of them gives us almost as much pleasure as does the music of the marvellous, youthful genius, who, being loved by the gods, died young. "There was a time when I was unwilling to talk about Schubert, and only dared mention him at night to the trees and stars." "But it is certain that similar periods of life always have a mutual attraction. Youthful inspiration will be appreciated by youth, and the force of the matured master by the grown man. Schubert will thus always be the delight of the young. His heart, like theirs, is full of the romantic legends of knights, ladies, and adventurers, of which youth is so fond; nor is he without wit and humor, though not enough to disturb the tender sentiment at the base of his whole nature." And writing of the symphony in question: "At the outset, the brilliancy, the novelty of the instrumentation, the width and breadth of form, the exquisite interchange of vivid emotion, the entire new world in which we are landed—all this is as bewildering as any unusual thing we look upon for the first time in our lives; but there ever remains that delicious feeling which we get from some lovely legend or fairy story." How many times we all wish that the privilege could be our's to know again for the first time a favorite book, or picture, or symphony. Above all, what a pleasure it would be to hear this masterpiece of Schubert's under such conditions, with the added one of never having listened to Schumann or Wagner. Through these and other later composers, most of Schubert's orchestral devices have become commonly known. Nevertheless, it is delightful to see with what strength and beauty he ever asserts himself, and how quickly and surely he touches those chords within us, which are ever ready to respond to the strains, however simple, of pure music. In the performance last evening both conductor and orchestra outdid themselves. As in the Haydn sypmphony the tempi were extremely appropriate and happily the reverse of wearisome. The introduction and the other movements as well were taken at a pace which allowed the players of the wind instruments—which form so important a part of the entire score—time to play with fulness and clearness of tone, and yet did not drive the listener into thinking with scorn and derision of the individual who applied the term "heavenly length" to Schubert's works. In other words, Mr. Nikisch did not permit the symphony to drag in the least. The work of the orchestra throughout was exceedingly fine; to us the phrasing of the wind players surpassed that of the strings in beauty and delicacy. There were moments when we could have wished the latter to imitate more exactly the delicate staccato ending of the many little phrases that are tossed back and forth from wind to strings. However, it was all thoroughly delightful; and we doubt if the Wagner overture received hardly more than a passing thought from the majority of the crowd that wended its way home after the concert.

FIRST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The accomplished members of the Kneisel Quartette must have felt sincerely gratified at the size and quality of the audience that greeted them at their first concert in Union Hall, Monday evening. Almost every seat was occupied, and the attention and appreciation shown indicated the presence of the cultivated set of people who are in the habit of attending these concerts year after year. The playing of the quartette easily demonstrated the fact that they had lost nothing of their perfection in ensemble work, and that in breadth and power they had made decided gains. The The unanimity of their attack, the accuracy with which detached chords were given, and their clean, well defined playing of polyphonic passages were at all times remarkable. Only when regarded from the high standard which they themselves assume could exceptions have been taken to the variety and delicacy of their phrasing which from this point of view were not always so apparent as one could have wished. The programme opened with Svenden's quartett in A minor, opus 1, given for the first time by the organization. From a single hearing of this work one gets the impression that there is more of scholarly, artistic effort than of strength or spontaneity in the first three movements. Contrary to the almost established precedent, so to say, the finale has an abundance of the last-named quality and strength as well. This movement, with frequent moments of beauty throughout the work, notably in the andantino, and the quaint humor of the allegro scherzando, with its unexpected pizzicato ending, combine to make it interesting and well worth doing. It was finely performed, except that, to us, the scherzo seemed to lose in character by reason of an over moderate tempo. The second quartette, Schumann's in A minor, opus 41, was also delightfully given, except for occasional evidences of hurry in the closing movement. Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the singer of the evening. His group of songs from Schumann, "The Lotus Flower," "Thou'rt like unto a Flower," and "Devotion," were all rendered with much artistic expressiveness, the last in particular, being so brilliantly sung as to cause an encore to be demanded, which was granted. Mr. Arthur Whiting played the accompaniments in an exceedingly tasteful manner.

[26]

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890

Whatever may be the merits of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor—and in directing works of the modern romantic school he certainly carries all before him—as a maker of programs he is a failure. His selections for the symphony concerts of last year showed that here in Boston he still breathed the air of the little town of Leipzig, and walked our streets clothed in its atmosphere. He either dislikes or ignores the writings of the French school; and in his arrangement of the familiar German compositions he pays no attention to space or time; that which is heaviest is kept for the final number, and throughout the programs there is no contrast—there is no relief. There was some excuse for the dreariness of the first concert of this season, for it was a memorial service; and the rites which attend the apotheosis or the canonization of the dead generally serve only to re-open the wounds and intensify the woe of the mourner.

* * * * *

The program of last Saturday's concert was made up of Volkmann's Overture, "Richard III.;" the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony, No. 4, in F; and Brahms' Symphony, No. 2, in D major. What can be said of the overture, except that as a whole it is a tiresome composition? Viewed as program music, it must suffer from the very choice of a subject; for the popular idea of the character of Richard, in spite of the whitewashing of modern historians, suggests only unrelieved cruelty, nor were there gentle episodes in his life which might furnish the musician with stuff for a musical contrast. It is true that the embodiment of this character upon the stage depends upon the actor's conception of the part. We are told by the enthusiastic Mrs. French that Kean's Richard "possessed a mine of humor and pleasantry, with all the grace of high breeding grafted on strong and brilliant intellect;" and Barry Sullivan made him half brute, half clown. Volkmann's Overture, however, is full of nothing but saturnine savageness and the tumult of battle. The battle scene is naturally full of sound and fury, and it is interesting to learn from Mr. Volkmann's score that the familiar air, "The Campbell's are coming," was heard on Bosworth Field above the clash of arms and groans of the dying.

* * * * *

The recipe for concocting a musical battle is of ancient date. In 1544 Clément Jannequin published "The Battle of Marignan" and "The War" for voices, and whoever is interested in studying the history of program music will find in the second volume of Weckerlin's "Musiciana" a list of musical battle-pieces, where among the names of composers, are found those of Beethoven, Pacini, Steibelt, and Diabelli.

* * * * *

The two movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony are so interesting that it is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch did not give the composer his due by playing the whole work. The andantino is beautiful in idea and in workmanship; it is thoroughly individual and characteristic; the scherzo is most ingenious as regards instrumentation and will serve as a test piece for an orchestra. These numbers were exceedingly well played, as was, in fact, the whole orchestral program.

* * * * *

The Brahms Symphony, with the exception of the adagio, is a noble work; probably the slavish worshippers of Brahms regret that the other movements of the symphony do not rise to the "high intellectual level" of this adagio. But when the vague quantity ycleped "intellectuality" enters into a musical composition, music itself will not endure a rival and disappears. Metaphysics and music cannot dwell together, nor will the most cunning contrapuntal exercises awaken emotions. Does any one suppose that Mozart, or Haydn, or Beethoven bothered himself about the expression of any ideas save musical ideas? They were content to write music. They were music makers. And in the first and two last movements Brahms too has followed their example.

* * * * *

But Mr. Nikisch made a mistake, a mistake which often happens, in putting this symphony at the end of the concert; and the mistake was the more serious upon this occasion, for the ears had been tortured by the false intonation of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, the soloist of the evening. Nature was kind to Mr. Reichmann and gave him a rich and powerful voice which he has sadly abused. When he sang in Munich he constantly forced it; and when he went to Vienna his faults became more marked and more grievous with each performance. As he began to lose his hold upon the public, he naturally looked towards America and readily became a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, the life-saving station, the asylum of so many worn out and exhausted singers of Germany. He sang the dreary song from "Tannhauser," a song which should have cost the bard his position at court, even before he had avowed his relations with Venus; and songs by Brahms and Schubert. His singing has been praised for its "intellectuality" and "musicianly spirit"; but surely it is not the mark of a musician to sing one phrase with full voice, the next with a wretched falsetto which apes the true piano, and thus make of a song "one vile antithesis." The audience was so enthusiastic and Mr. Reichmann seemed so contented that the scene must have reminded him of the happy state of affairs at ancient Thebes where it was an indictable offense to disturb a musician in the exercise of his art.

* * * * *

So far as concerts of an instrumental nature are concerned the chamber concerts given by the Kneisel quartet are easily first. The quartet playing is well nigh perfection; the programs are worthy of the players. It has been said that it is the fashion to attend these concerts and that the many who attend are coerced, and secretly wish themselves anywhere but in Union Hall. Yet if it is only a fashion, it is one which should be kept alive. The program of the first concert which took place Monday evening was made up of Svendsen's Quartet in A minor op. 1 and Schumann's Quartet in A minor op. 41 No. 1. The quartet of the Norwegian composer, written when he was studying at Leipzig, is a pleasing work of which the first movement is the least agreeable, in fact it is for the most part dry and conventional; in the scherzando, the most original portion of the quartet, whimsicalness is but within a step of catch-penny clap-trap. Although the composition is worth the playing, it has not the true character of a string-quartet and it continually suggests the orchestra. It was a novelty so far as the Kneisel concerts are concerned.

* * * * *

A very select audience gathered in Union hall on Monday night to enjoy the first Kneisel quartet concert of the season. Among them were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mrs. Edward Robinson, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Edward Jackson, Miss Emma Rice, Mrs. B. T. Olcott, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank Johns, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. Howard Ticknor and Mr. Louis Elson. The group of songs of Schumann, including H. Heine's "Du bist wie eine blume," by Mr. Reichmann was exceedingly well received.

Mr. Nikisch will doubtless accept more invitations this year than last if Mrs. Nikisch be included in them. Mrs. Nikisch, by the way, speaks English fluently with scarcely any accent.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The first chamber concert of the sixth season was given last Monday evening, in Union Hall, before the old-time large, attentive and appreciative audience. The same four finished and congenial artists, who seem to have grown together, as by some true affinity of musical artistic nature, into rare unity of style and feeling and fine mutual understanding, still compose the quartet: Franz Kneisel, the "Vorgeiger" or leading violinist in the Symphony Orchestra; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola: Anton Hekking, violoncello; all likewise members of the orchestra. The programme was as follows:

Svendsen—Quartet in A minor, Op. 1.
Schumann—Songs, with piano:
"Lotos Blume."
"Du bist wie eine Blume."
"Widmung."
Schumann—Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1.
Singer, Theodor Reichmann, baritone.

Johan Severin Svendsen, a Norwegian composer of strong individuality, but of by no means so fine a genius as the Danish Gade, who was born in 1840 at Christiania, where he is now living as conductor of the musical association and teacher of composition. He became a violinist in his early youth, and in 1863 studied at the Conservatory in Leipzig under Hauptmann, David, Richter and Reinecke, owing most, he always said, to the first. While there he composed his three only works of chamber music—Op. 1, the quartet in A minor, played last Monday; Op. 3, octet for strings in A minor; Op. 5, string quintet in C. The octet seems to have made the greatest impression in Germany. His other principal compositions are two symphonies, a violin and a violoncello concerto, several overtures, romances, rhapsodies, etc., and songs. Indeed, the list is not a long one, nor does it seem peculiarly rich. He travelled a good deal in Europe, married in America, spent some time in Paris, also at Bayreuth, where he became intimate with Wagner, but is now settled at his Norwegian birthplace. His violin concerto (in A) was played here in a Harvard musical concert by Wulf Fries, who has lived so long in Norway. It did not make a very agreeable impression, which was no fault of the interpreter.

It is a little singular that his opus 1 has not been followed by any further effort in the way of string quartet composition, considering how well it has been received. It has been given several times in Boston by the Listemann Quartet, we believe, but we did not chance to hear it. Of course we cannot offer a mature opinion of it after a single hearing; nor can we speak by book, since there is no score published; it is only available in separate parts. Admirably played, as it was, it sounded euphonious, rich, free, clear and full of verve; a work of striking character for one beginning his career. The strongly contrasted middle movements interested us most. The finale was spirited and brilliant, one might say dashing, yet a little commonplace, winding up in the usual manner of a theatre overture. We noticed nothing peculiarly Scandinavian or local in its melody or flavor. All was within the bounds of harmony and form, and free from wild extravagance.

In the Schumann quartet, also in A minor, the first of the three quartets in op. 41—the only ones he wrote—we have finer metal. Schumann was not a violinist, but he wrote here in the spirit of the violin, whether he was hampered by the technique or not; at any rate, all flows freely, easily and gracefully in all the movements of this lovely composition. If he did not write for the violin family par excellence, he did write for music. Each movement is a breath from the essential life and soul of music. It is music for its own sake, representing nothing that could be expressed in words, conforming to no programme, advocating no idea or principle or faith, hinting no history, no drama through the medium of tones. It is music pure and self-sufficing — music, itself "more definite than words," as Mendelssohn once wrote when asked to explain the meaning of one of his wordless songs.

A peculiar feature in the Andante introduction is, that while in A minor, and while the quartet is said to be in A minor, it soon shows a bias toward the key of F major, and in that key the allegro is openly written. Its six-eight movement is serene, pensive, graceful, genial, presenting at least three distinct and interesting melodic motives, which are contrasted and worked up together so artistically that they seem to spring forth spontaneously. It is a charming movement, making one feel at peace and at home in a better world of which music is the atmosphere and revelation. The Scherzo, in A minor, is in the same rhythm, only presto, has a family relationship of character and is equally delightful. The flow of it is broken only once by a short intermezzo in four-part measure in the key of C, which forms a refreshing episode. The Adagio is in F again, in common time. It is substantially a Lied, a serious melody of great beauty and depth of feeling, sung now by the first violin, now by the other instruments in turn, introduced accompanied and followed by imaginative fantasia-like figures, which gives it all an air of reverie, pathetic and profound. The Presto, beginning in A minor, alla breve, is brisk, decided, the parts running, chasing, diving, with great vivacity. Before the close occurs an exquisite surprise, where suddenly the heavens seem to open and you are caught up into a mystic element of light and beauty, an effect somewhat, on a smaller scale, like that of the marvellous trio to the Scherzo in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. On a long sustained drone bass, or organ point, keynote of A major, reflected in upper octaves, a simple, charming strain of hurdy-gurdy melody is heard, but like a hurdy-gurdy strain transfigured, glorified; then a piece of mystic harmony in equal whole notes for the four parts. All this is in a more moderate tempo; then the vision fades, the quick time returns, with the original motive, and, still in the major, hastens to a close. The quartet was exquisitely played, in the true Schumann spirit. It is perhaps not generally known that a four-hand arrangement of the three quartets was made with Schumann's commendation, by Otto Dresel, and published by Breitkopf & Härtel. The group of Schumann songs between the two quartets were more beautiful in themselves than in the treatment they received from the singer, Mr. Reichmann, who was fairly well accompanied by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with the exception of one or two momentary disagreements in the last song of the three. Mr. Reichmann has a splendid voice, and great force of delivery as well as much coolly, finely calculated shading. But hearing him in that smaller hall, "at closer range" we missed that feeling and that true and pure expression for which we gave him credit in the Music Hall. There was too much stage [illegible] were overdone, as if to carry the audience by sheer tours de force. Schumann's songs are from the heart; the rendering was not so; it was cold and lacked fire from within. This especially in the "Lotos Blume" and the one beginning "Du bist wie eine Blume"—words to which everybody makes a song, but not a song like Schumann's! The uncontainable rapturous fervor of "Du meine Seele, O du mein Herz!" ("Widmung") had more in it for the opera singer, and he made it in some sense effective; but one still felt the want of that magnetic, spiritual something from within, in which dwells the secret of true song, from the heart to the heart. It is but fair to say, however, that the singer bore off a plentiful crop of applause, and graciously granted an encore, for which he chose a rather lengthy song of Brahms's (op. 43, No. 1), entitled "Von ewiger Liebe," beginning "Dunkel, wie Dunkel in Wald und in Feld!" It has a sad, almost tragical Volksong mood in its somewhat monotonous melody and more monotonous accompaniment, beginning in C-sharp minor, three-four moderato, and after a prolonged dying interlude, passing inharmonically into D-flat major, six-eight measure, ending with the affirmation: "Our love is firm as steel and must stand forever!" This was insisted on with energy. The commendable shortness of the programme left room for the addition or interpolation on the score of length.

The date of the second concert is Nov. 24.

J. S. D.

The second popular concert in Music Hall will be given tomorrow evening. Miss Marion Manola will sing, and other musicians engaged are Messrs. Giuseppe Campanari and Leo Schultz, and the Salem Cadet Band.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three concerts in Steinert Hall on Monday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 1, and Jan. 5. The programme for the first concert is: Quartet in D minor, op. 11, Haydn; Wiegenlied for violin, Fitzenbragen; Theme and Variations for four violoncellos, Klingel; Quartet in C, op. 61, Dvorak.

The programme for the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, next Saturday night, is as follows: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark; pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moskowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 26, 1890.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A glance at the programme of last evening was, without doubt, sufficient to set many lovers of the "old classics" aghast at the bare idea of Wagner's "A Faust overture" being inserted between a Haydn symphony and that monumental product of Schubert's genius, his symphony in C, No. 10. And it certainly needed a performance of the three works in this order to justify Mr. Nikisch's almost unique idea. Whether or not he wished to prove to his audience how well these symphonies could hold their own with a work of one who had the resources of the modern orchestra at his command, and who knew well how to use them, matters little. It is enough to know that they did hold their own without the slightest difficulty This fact is not surprising when one thinks of the magnificence and the gorgeous scoring of the Schubert work. But that a work from the pen of that "Well-spring of joyous melody," dear old Haydn, should pass through such an ordeal unscathed—well, it must at least have excited a widespread desire to hear a good deal more of his music than has been vouchsafed the Symphony audiences of late years. Someone said, in speaking of the Bach violinduo concerto, that his music should appear much oftener on the Symphony programmes. That is true. As a matter of education alone we should be permitted to hear Bach, and Haydn as well, far more frequently. We all know how commonly the appellation of "child-like" has been attached to Haydn. To be sure, much of his music has that unsophisticated air about it that recalls vividly the untroubled happiness and innocence of youth. But there is little or nothing about it that can really be termed child-like; it has the freshness, the spontaneity of ever happy genius, not of childhood. The symphony performed, the last of the twelve that Haydn contracted to write for Salomon, the London manager (No. 2 in the Peters' edition) is one of the strongest, as well as one of those that are most familiar to Boston concert goers. The breadth and sonority of its introduction forcibly suggest Beethoven. With the entrance of the allegro, however, all thoughts of him vanish, and Haydn is himself again to the end of the work with all his tunefulness, simplicity, jollity, and his at times, cloudy, but never stormy, so to say, seriousness. The symphony was performed in a delightful manner. Mr. Nikisch was peculiarly happy in his tempi, and all four movements seemed to receive just the right sort of interpretation, without being unduly modernized. It was received with much enthusiasm. The "Faust" overture grows more interesting with each successive hearing. The subject itself is a fruitful one for the imagination to dwell upon, and, according to the correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, it was to them a fruitful theme for discussion. Musical purists to the contrary, notwithstanding, one's interest in "programme" music is inevitably enhanced by analyses that are in any way clever, or writings that throw any light upon the intended meaning of the music; and so we are glad to know that Wagner originally intended to write a full symphony on the subject, of which this overture was to be the first movement, and to represent Faust in solitude; that he gave up the idea, threw the manuscript aside, where it remained unnoticed for years, and finally, at the solicitation of Liszt, re-wrote it, and had it performed soon afterwards at Zurich. Like most programme music, it would be quite an easy matter to imagine a hundred other scenes in connection with this music of Wagner's, but it cannot be denied that the suggestions of infinite longing, despair, and the presence of the "ever womanly" influence, as Wagner himself describes the serene closing measures, are clearly made. Everyone knows the magic of Mr. Nikisch's manner in dealing with Wagner; therefore it is enough to say that he was as successful as usual in his reading of this work, and that the orchestra responded to his lead freely and effectively. Robert Schumann's enthusiastic words concerning Schubert are so characteristic of his warm heart and appreciative nature, and so delightfully discriminating, that to quote some of them gives us almost as much pleasure as does the music of the marvellous, youthful genius, who, being loved by the gods, died young. "There was a time when I was unwilling to talk about Schubert, and only dared mention him at night to the trees and stars." "But it is certain that similar periods of life always have a mutual attraction. Youthful inspiration will be appreciated by youth, and the force of the matured master by the grown man. Schubert will thus always be the delight of the young. His heart, like theirs, is full of the romantic legends of knights, ladies, and adventurers, of which youth is so fond; nor is he without wit and humor, though not enough to disturb the tender sentiment at the base of his whole nature." And writing of the symphony in question: "At the outset, the brilliancy, the novelty of the instrumentation, the width and breadth of form, the exquisite interchange of vivid emotion, the entire new world in which we are landed—all this is as bewildering as any unusual thing we look upon for the first time in our lives; but there ever remains that delicious feeling which we get from some lovely legend or fairy story." How many times we all wish that the privilege could be our's to know again for the first time a favorite book, or picture, or symphony. Above all, what a pleasure it would be to hear this masterpiece of Schubert's under such conditions, with the added one of never having listened to Schumann or Wagner. Through these and other later composers, most of Schubert's orchestral devices have become commonly known. Nevertheless, it is delightful to see with what strength and beauty he ever asserts himself, and how quickly and surely he touches those chords within us, which are ever ready to respond to the strains, however simple, of pure music. In the performance last evening both conductor and orchestra outdid themselves. As in the Haydn sympphony the tempi were extremely appropriate and happily the reverse of wearisome. The introduction and the other movements as well were taken at a pace which allowed the players of the wind instruments—which form so important a part of the entire score—time to play with fulness and clearness of tone, and yet did not drive the listener into thinking with scorn and derision of the individual who applied the term "heavenly length" to Schubert's works. In other words, Mr. Nikisch did not permit the symphony to drag in the least. The work of the orchestra throughout was exceedingly fine; to us the phrasing of the wind players surpassed that of the strings in beauty and delicacy. There were moments when we could have wished the latter to imitate more exactly the delicate staccato ending of the many little phrases that are tossed back and forth from wind to strings. However, it was all thoroughly delightful; and we doubt if the Wagner overture received hardly more than a passing thought from the majority of the crowd that wended its way home after the concert.

FIRST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The accomplished members of the Kneisel Quartette must have felt sincerely gratified at the size and quality of the audience that greeted them at their first concert in Union Hall, Monday evening. Almost every seat was occupied, and the attention and appreciation shown indicated the presence of the cultivated set of people who are in the habit of attending these concerts year after year. The playing of the quartette easily demonstrated the fact that they had lost nothing of their perfection in ensemble work, and that in breadth and power they had made decided gains. The The unanimity of their attack, the accuracy with which detached chords were given, and their clean, well defined playing of polyphonic passages were at all times remarkable. Only when regarded from the high standard which they themselves assume could exceptions have been taken to the variety and delicacy of their phrasing which from this point of view were not always so apparent as one could have wished. The programme opened with Svenden's quartett in A minor, opus 1, given for the first time by the organization. From a single hearing of this work one gets the impression that there is more of scholarly, artistic effort than of strength or spontaneity in the first three movements. Contrary to the almost established precedent, so to say, the finale has an abundance of the last-named quality and strength as well. This movement, with frequent moments of beauty throughout the work, notably in the andantino, and the quaint humor of the allegro scherzando, with its unexpected pizzicato ending, combine to make it interesting and well worth doing. It was finely performed, except that, to us, the scherzo seemed to lose in character by reason of an over moderate tempo. The second quartette, Schumann's in A minor, opus 41, was also delightfully given, except for occasional evidences of hurry in the closing movement. Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the singer of the evening. His group of songs from Schumann, "The Lotus Flower," "Thou'rt like unto a Flower," and "Devotion," were all rendered with much artistic expressiveness, the last in particular, being so brilliantly sung as to cause an encore to be demanded, which was granted. Mr. Arthur Whiting played the accompaniments in an exceedingly tasteful manner.

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

[27]

Boston Daily Traveller.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1890.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Meteoric Career of the Boston Musician.

Toasted by Liszt and Complimented by Von Buelow.

His Ideas of American Music and Boston Audiences.

Herr Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in the little village of Szt. Miklos, Hungary. It is an unimportant little place, dependent very largely upon a sugar refinery for the measure of prosperity it enjoys. Herr Nikisch's father was the treasurer of the refinery, so that the future musician was born into a comfortable—a more than comfortable—a well-to-do home.

"My parents' families on neither side had shown any marked predilection for music," said Herr Nikisch to a Traveller reporter a day or two ago, "though my father was very fond of it as an amateur, and we often had Viennese musicians come to our house to stay. These occasional visits I shall always look back upon as the red-letter days of my early childhood. My enjoyment of their music was intense, and to the visits I trace back the course which my life has taken.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Beginning his Education.

"At six years of age," said the musician in answer to the continued questionings of the reporter "I began to take lessons on the pianoforte and in composition. At the age of seven we removed to a Moravian town, and I was placed under the tutorship of Herr Procharka, a Slavic musician, who taught me in pianoforte playing, harmony and counterpoint.

"At the age of eight I made my first public appearance as a musician in concert. It was at the town of Butschowitz, and my instrument was the piano.

"By this time my bent had clearly demonstrated itself to be musical, and my father decided to give me a musical education. In accordance with this I was sent at the age of 11 to Vienna to attend the conservatory.

"Here I devoted most of my attention to the violin, and to a somewhat lesser degree to composition and the pianoforte. For teachers, I had in these three subjects, Helmesberger, Dessoff and Schenner, respectively. At graduation I was awarded three first prizes, one in each subject. The composition for which I was given the prize was a sextette for strings. I conducted the conservatory orchestra and symphony, rendering my own compositions. I was also the recipient of another honor, of which I am very proud: my fellow-students presented me with a handsome leader's baton to use on the occasion.

Acquaintance With Wagner.

"In 1872 I first went to Baireuth, to take part in the music in connection with the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of Wagner's theatre. Our playing was under Wagner's own conducting, and the piece rendered was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The symphony orchestra was made up of individuals from the first orchestras of Europe. I went from Vienna, accompanying 22 members of the Royal Imperial Orchestra, and playing a first violin. From this visit dates my personal acquaintance with Richard Wagner.

"In Vienna, as a member of the Imperial Palace Orchestra, I played a first violin till January, 1876, when I removed to Leipzig to avail myself of an offer of the conductorship in the Opera House. I conducted for a few months here, producing light operas and operettas. I was then appointed head conductor and gave Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' as my first piece.

"In Leipzig I was paid the high compliment, after one year's residence, of being asked to conduct for Herr Reinecke at the Gewandhaus concerts when that gentleman was unable to do so.

Me Meets Liszt.

"Here I made the acquaintance of Abbe Franz Liszt, an acquaintance that ripened into a friendship that is now one of the [illegible] things in my rememfestivals of the Allgemeiner deutcher Musikverein in Magdeburg in 1881 and in Leipzig in 1883. Following the latter was a banquet at which Abbe Liszt was present, and he did me the distinguished honor of proposing my health, drinking, as he said, 'to the health of the elect of the elect.'

"While conducting these and other concerts I was made the recipient of several decorations from European sovereigns. During my Leipzig engagement I conducted in nearly every important musical centre of Europe, notably Vienna, Berlin, Hamburg and Frankfurt, and was offered several excellent positions as head conductor elsewhere, but preferred remaining in Leipzig where I was very pleasantly situated.

"My first negotiations with Boston with a view to taking the leadership of the Symphony Orchestra were opened in 1881, by the way, before Mr. Gericke's coming. Obstacles which were afterwards removed, prevented my accepting the position at that time.

The Baireuth Story.

"In 1889 considerable talk was occasioned by my being unofficially approached on the subject of taking the leadership at Baireuth during Herr Levy's illness. At the time Herr von Bülow presented me to a large party of musicians as the interpreter of Wagner's works.

"One of my greatest successes was a remarkable performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with a chorus of 500. It was a tremendous success, and I was after it elected a member of the Directorium of the Allgemeine deutcher Musik-verein and an honorary member of several musical corporations in Germany, notably the Liszt Verein. From Leipzig I came directly to Boston."

From this point the conversation became more general. In answer to a question of the comparative merits of the Boston orchestra and those of Europe, Herr Nikisch said: "I cannot speak for the English and French symphony orchestras, but I am familiar with the work done in Italy and Germany, and Austro-Hungary, and of all of them there are only two which are worthy of being compared with it."

Estimate of Boston's Taste.

When asked his opinion of Boston audiences, he said: "I can say without the least flattery that I never found such an attentive, earnest audience for good, high-class music as in Boston."

A question as to his opinion of the work of the German opera in New York, Wagner's works, brought from him the statement that he had never been able to hear opera in New York, and indeed had never heard any of its productions save one, that of "Lohengrin," in the Boston Theatre last spring, in regard to which Herr Nikisch said: "It was one of the worst I ever heard in the world."

Herr Nikisch lives in Brookline, and has two children. He brought his family to this country on his return this autumn. He says that he felt very much at home in Boston last year, but that now that the cause of his keenest regret at being away from Germany has been removed, he is very happy indeed. When in Europe this summer he said he used frequently to feel homesick for America.

Herr Nikisch says, in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he proposes to keep on in his present policy, viz., to bring out a high class of music, giving fair values to all classes and neglecting none. He says: "If the music is good, it does not matter to me whether it is German, French, or Italian; if it is not good enough, I hate it. I like best the works of Beethoven, Mozart, and Schubert, but I am fond of the interesting works of the other masters, of whatever nationality they may be. I have no intention of allowing our music to become one-sided. I am studying hard all the time all the scores in the libraries, and such music as is sent me."

Herr Nikisch has no special fads or anything of that kind. He keenly enjoys a game of chess, but, as he explains it, the game is such a study of itself that he has not the time to devote to it.

CALL.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, OCT. 27.

MUSIC?—OR MANOLA?

Music Hall Crowded with People Who Were Interested.

If any one doubts that music is dear to Bostonians he should have seen the Music Hall audience last night. Nearly every seat was taken.

Perhaps the zeal for sacred music was spurred somewhat by the announcement that Marion Manola was to make her last appearance—before the next one.

Marion refrained from singing "All Love Jack," instead she gave the "Ave Maria," "'Tis Eventide" and "Douglas Green," besides operatic airs for two encores. Her pure voice bubbled forth in trills and warbles as clear and sweet as any songbird's on a dewy morning.

She has seldom looked better. Her short hair is in light-colored fluffy billows over her brow; her arms and neck were bare; her costume was of pink, overclouded with black lace.

Campanari sang Ponchielli's "Lituanfby" for the first time in America. Leo Schultz on the 'cello, N. R. Amelotte on the clarinet and the Salem Cadet band did the rest. Applause for them was fully as hearty as for Manola.

THE BOSTON TIMES.
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

Two symphonies and an overture read as follows on the programme performed at the third symphony concert last evening:—

Haydn—Symphony in D major [No. 2, Bd. H.]
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Schubert—Symphony in C major No. 9.

Any discriminations that may hypercritically be made against the above programme and its performance, making all due allowance for the musical nothingness of the "Faust Overture," will not prevent the occasion from being justly remembered as one of the most artistic and delightful symphony concerts ever given in this city.

The overture, which is a marvel so far as its technical orchestration is concerned but otherwise intrinsically illogical, incoherent and unmusical, was wondrously played. The symphonies were both admirably read and the performances corresponded. As they were written at a time when music and melody were universally regarded as inseparable, it seemed an inexplicable piece of intrusion to have the Wagner overture performed in the same concert. Any four measures of the prelude to Gounod's "Faust" are worth a dozen of it.

The first Symphony concert, Saturday night, was the signal for the reappearance of a large number of the swagger set, who always want to be on hand to inaugurate this eminently fashionable institution, says the Bostonian. A little coterie of clever society women, composed of Mrs. F. Gordon Dexter, Mrs. Helen Bell and her sister, Mrs. E. E. Pratt, Mrs. B. J. Lang and Mrs. Arthur Foote, made the end of the left-hand balcony present quite a gay appearance, to be made gayer still when Mrs. Gardner claims her seat there. Mr. Lang, Mr. Foote, Mr. Theodore Chase and Mr. Causten Brown being the men of the party. In the opposite balcony sat Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with her faithful attendant, Mr. John Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Fay, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Mr. George Osgood, and others of that musical set; while scattered over the hall below were Mrs. Louis Agassiz with her daughter Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Colonel Higginson, Mrs. Nikisch, and Mrs. Shaw, all grouped together; Mr. Josiah Bradlee and family, just home from Europe, Mrs. John E. Lodge, Mrs. Lithgow Devens, looking very pretty in grey; the Lowells, from Chestnut Hill; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Codman, Mr. Louis Curtis and his fiancée, Miss Richardson; Mr. Berthold Schlesinger and family, the Misses Fairchild and brother, Mr. George Inches, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mrs. J. W. Wheelwright and her daughter, just returned from Europe also, the latter looking extremely pretty in a black and gold gown; Mrs. John V. Apthorp and family, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mrs. Seth Sprague and her son, Mr. Richard Sprague; Mrs. John A. Andrew and Miss Bessie Andrew, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Russell and daughter, and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

This season's concerts by the Kneisel quartette had for the initial programme in Union hall, Monday evening, the following répertoire:

Quartette in A minor, op. 1.....Svendsen
Songs with piano—
a. "Lotosblume."—b. "Du bist wie eine Blume."—c. Widmung.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
Quartette in A minor, op. 41, No. 1..Schumann

Although Svendsen's student-life in Leipzig was no less contemporaneous with his earliest than with some of his very best works in musical composition, yet his opus 1 which he composed there is only great in its finale. Otherwise the work is a somewhat ordinary quartette. The first movement especially seldom rises above the academic level and the musical canons of the sonata form constantly impressed upon the hearer to the exclusion of anything more praiseworthy.

In the scherzo a futile attempt is apparently made at nothing less than a quaint and fanciful piece of writing, but instead the composer is often open to the charge of being simply fanatical and grotesque. The andatino is a very pleasing and melodious movement but it is not until the finale that the well-known originality, skill and artistic virility of the composer find their fullest expression, and thereby redeem the work from only such inferior rank as its first three movements would imply.

The Schumann songs that followed were sung by Mr. Reichmann in a very careless and even slovenly manner, with but the slightest artistic integrity and expression. The artist's intonation was frequently false and his phrasing was no less intolerable than it was radically different from the composer's requirements. We all know that Mr. Reichmann can sing superbly when he will, and he is yet too young to be regarded as a broken-down singer; but wherein he has shown himself to be otherwise of late it would be very difficult to determine.

The noble Schumann quartette ended the concert. Both quartettes were delightfully played.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, OCTOBER 26, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

For the third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Nikisch presented a programme consisting of Haydn's symphony in D major (No. 2, B. & H.), Wagner's "Faust" overture, and Schubert's symphony in C major.

It is difficult to understand the action of Mr. Nikisch in putting forward such a programme, and a plain statement of his reasons for such a combination of works would make a very interesting preface to the analytical comments of the programme book. No exception can be taken to the character of either of the three compositions of the evening or to the desirability of including them in the season's scheme; but to put the three compositions upon the same programme shows, at least, a peculiar estimate of the demands of the patrons of these concerts.

The reading of the Haydn symphony was most enjoyable, and the lighter passages of the graceful movements were given with all possible delicacy and refinement, and the variations upon the tuneful themes were brought out with admirable clearness. The performance of the "Faust" overture was one to be recalled with much satisfaction, as no previous hearing of the composition has made its characteristics more distinct and presented its musical ideas with greater success. The applause called out by this portion of the programme was most enthusiastic, and deservedly so.

It is but natural that Mr. Nikisch should desire to give his own ideas of the great Schubert symphony, and it is only to be regretted that so good a performance of the work should be given at the end of such a programme. The grand tone pictures of the several movements were most happily depicted, and the splendid resources of the orchestra were prominently shown in this portion of the evening's programme. The good work done in this symphony was heartily appreciated, despite the late hour at which the concert ended.

Next Saturday the soloist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, pianist, and the programme will include Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

A correspondent queries: "Why is it that the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts are never permitted to hear any of those charming novelties announced for the Berlin concerts, but must listen year after year to a repetition of the same programmes, while conductors like Bulow and Seidl are ever on the alert to bring out the choicest and most attractive novelties of modern composers?" The question is often asked in many forms, and a reply from Mr. Nikisch would give general satisfaction.

THE MUSIC HALL POPULAR.

The Music Hall popular concerts will be continued this evening with a programme of vocal and instrumental music well calculated to please the patrons of these entertainments. The Salem Cadet band has been secured for the evening, and the soloists will be Miss Marion Manola, who makes her last appearance in this city; Mr. Guiseppi Campanari, baritone; Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cello, and Mr. Amelotte, clarinet. The selections of the evening are as follows:

1. Overture, "Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Salem Cadet band.
2. Solo for clarinet.....Selected
Mr. Amelotte.
3. Ballad, "Douglas Green".....Keller
Miss Manola.
4. (a) "Moment Musical".....Schubert
(b) "Oriental Patrol".....Asch
Salem Cadet band.
5. Romanza, "Lituaniby".....Ponchieli
(First time in America.)
Sig. Campanari.
6. Concert waltz, "L'Estudiantina"...Waldteufe
Salem Cadet band.
7. Fantasie on themes from "La Fille du Regimenti".....Servais
Mr. Schultz.
8. Ave Maria.....Gounod
(Piano, organ and cello accompaniment.)
Miss Manola.
9. Chilian dance, "Manana".....Missud
Salem Cadet band.
10. Song, "'Tis Eventide".....Chassaigne
Miss Manola.
11. Aria, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Sig. Campanari.
12. Selection, "The Gondoliers".....Sullivan
Salem Cadet band.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There was more hearty downright enthusiasm over the Symphony Concert Saturday evening, the third in the series, than anything that has been seen this season, and a very large share of it was manifested over Wagner's "Faust Overture" which served as an intermezzo between the No. 2 Symphony in D by Father Haydn and the glorious 10th Symphony of Schubert. There was contrast enough, surely, and whether the applause was due to the magnetic rendition of the overture or the fact that it was labeled Wagner may not be so easy to determine. The interpretation was an excellent one—and Mr. Nikisch is a good interpreter of Wagner. The two overtures were also in contrast, and yet both were melodious and pleasing. The Schubert symphony was a rather lengthy ending for a concert that had been preceded by the Haydn Symphony at the Faust Overture, but there were few who left until the close of the performance. No better rendition of either symphony has been heard in these concerts, and, under such circumstances, the length of the programme is pardonable. With the next concert begins the piano solos, Mr. Hiram G. Tucker being the artist. He will give a concerto, by Sgambati, for the first time at a symphony concert.

There was a very large audience last evening at Music Hall, the attractions being the Salem Cadet Band and the last appearance in this city of Miss Marion Manola, who gave, among other selections, Bach-Gounod's Ave-Maria.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

Wagner was never heard in such odd juxta position as in the concert of Saturday. The "Faust Overture" was sandwiched in between a melodious Haydn symphony and the altogether tuneful C major symphony of Schubert. Now the overture in question is by no means a fair representation of the school of the master; it has its grand moments, but Homer nods, in its measures, more than once, and if the mythical, ethical subject is far removed from ordinary comprehension when expressed by Goethe in words, it is still more so when interpreted in the meles and free modulation of Wagner, and here there can be no Wolzogen to make the path clear by a musical guide book.

The Haydn symphony was given a very fine reading, in fact, as regards the interpretations, the voice of adverse criticism may well be mute, and Mr. Nikisch has seldom appeared to better advantage than in this concert. That the Haydn work was somewhat modernized was self evident, but such a modernization can scarcely be classed as a fault. The tempi, for example, were given with an extreme application of their purport; now in Haydn's time all such marks were read in a conservative manner, and an andante became as a modern moderato, an allegro as an allegretto of the present; the quick movements were less quick, the slow movements less slow than they are with us. In addition to this innovation Mr. Nikisch gave some very dramatic pauses in the minuet, which I feel certain would not have occurred under Haydn's own direction, yet are to be approved of; in short the reading was a practical justification of Wagner's views of the right of individualization in conducting. Now came the "Faust Overture" and it was given a splendid performance. Grandly did the tuba and contrabasses give forth the sombre introductory phrase, and most expressively did the strings follow. The work reminds a little of Liszt's "Les Preludes" in its soaring after the infinite, and like Liszt, Wagner gives human self torture to the deepest bass instruments, and angelic contentment to the violins in highest positions. That one little staccato note which Wagner marked fortissimo on the kettledrum, became something stupendous and drowned out tuba, trumpets, horns (the trombones have a moment's rest here), woodwind, strings and all! Decidedly our new drummer is the leading man of the orchestra, according to the Marquis of Queensberry's rules. Especially well played was the theme on the four horns and woodwind, with the accompanying figure on the strings. The applause of a few neophites began at the chord in D minor, just before the first violins begin their soft passage alone, and are followed by a long-drawn-out C sharp on the first bassoon, but to a person unfamiliar with the score this ending is as deceptive almost as the ending of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and the fortunate ones who waited with their applause until the genuine finale arrived must hold the more zealous ones blameless.

Now came melody and to spare; Schubert could not give a Brahms development, but he could give a charm to his large sonata forms by the most beautiful contrasts of themes. The reading and the performance of the work was superb, and one feels especially grateful that the trombones were allowed to give forth their power in the coda of the first movement. I have never been quite in sympathy with the repression of these instruments in previous performances. Schubert meant something by the use of the trombones here, and they should ring out with a fiery clangor. This, too, is the first great use of the trombones in symphony. In the last century the misunderstood instruments were used in a barbaric manner to re-enforce the contrabasses; then Mozart showed their true tone-color in his Requiem and in "Don Giovanni," then Beethoven introduced them into symphony for the first time in his fifth symphony, swelled a few measures of his thunderstorm in the Pastoral symphony with their blatancy, and used them in the ninth symphony in a military manner; but in this work they come forth for the first time with independence and true effect in a symphony. The horn player deserves praise for the steadiness with which he blew the solo phrase with which the introduction begins, and the whole orchestra can share in the commendation for the broad manner in which they gave the augmentation of this same phrase at the end of the first movement. The oboe carries the weight of the second movement, and certainly the part was faultlessly played. The leading cello, too, was beautifully prominent in this. The trio of the scherzo began rather roughly, but made amends later on. In the finale the kettledrum again seemed too loud, but the four sforzando notes which form such a striking figure in this movement, were finely given by the orchestra: these portentous knocks, which seem like strokes of destiny, were taken directly from Beethoven, not, however, from the fifth symphony, but from the first and best movement of the master's violin concerto. In this connection it is as well to state that it is folly to try to attach special meanings to this masterwork of Schubert. When Beethoven was asked about the meaning of the first movement of his fifth symphony he gave a set, ranging, according to his mood, from the vulgarest joke up to the knocking of fate, and here in this work, we have one commentator seeking to represent Phaeton and the horses of the sun by the last movement, Schumann giving to the entire work a meaning totally different and imagining it a picture of gypsy life, and finally Forabo entering upon the programme book with gondolas, lovers, tournaments, sunset guns, weddings, and what not. This is not heavy food for the with contemporaneity. Let the [illegible] audience notice the beauty of the themes, the symmetry of the form, the contrasts of the movements, and let him yield himself freely to the exaltation consequent upon hearing good music. In such a case music will be a stimulant to all that is poetic within him, and he may wreath a thousand fancies around the composition, but let him not print the vision as a tangible result of the music, for his neighbor, differently organized, may have experienced entirely different thoughts; and, above all, let him not allow anybody else to do his dreaming for him, for, in doing this, he will lose the chief, though most intangible, charm of music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music Hall Popular.

The second concert in the Music Hall Sunday Popular course was given last evening before an audience that filled the immense auditorium. The programme presented was well arranged and presented by artists of the first order. Miss Marion Manola appeared for the second and last time this season, and received a most enthusiastic reception. Her rendition of "Ave Maria" with piano, organ and 'cello accompaniment, was the gem of the evening and merited the hearty encore it received. Sig. Campanari's vocal selections found high favor with the audience, and he was obliged to respond to a recall. Leo Schnetz upheld his fine reputation as a 'cello soloist, and his fantasie on themes from "La Fille du Regiment" was executed in a faultless manner.

The clarinet soloist, W. R. Amelotte, made a most favorable impression by the manner in which he rendered a very difficult solo. The Salem Cadet Band was at its best, and carried out its programme of instrumental selections in a masterly manner, and especially the "Oriental Patriot." The audience was very liberal in its applause, and encores were hearty and numerous.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, OCT. 26, 1890.

Symphony Delights and Lecocq's Lyric Harmonies.

From beginning to end, the programme at the Symphony concert last week was a delight. It was a little longer than Mr. Nikisch's offerings usually are, but the man or woman who could weary of Schubert's beautiful ninth symphony, so performed, is not worthy of the privilege of listening to such masterly interpretation of one of the most fascinating of musical classics. Father Haydn is heard at his best in the symphony in D major, and in this also Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra attained well deserved honors.

Between these larger works came Wagner's "A Faust overture." Nothing could be in stronger contrast to either Haydn or Schubert. It was a study to watch the director, as this strong, thoroughly characteristic overture went its course. Mr. Nikisch obviously had every measure by heart; and with constant watchfulness and swift, decisive gesture now and then, evoked from this wonderfully trained corps of players a succession of most brilliant, striking orchestral effects. But the third concert will chiefly be remembered for the Schubert symphony after all—a revelation, assuredly, to any in the great audiences who did not know the classic.

Mr. H. G. Tucker, the pianist, will perform Sgambati's concerto in G minor at the concerts this week, having, of course, the cooperation of the orchestra. For the first time in Boston, Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture will be heard. Moszkowski's brilliant suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" completes the attractive programme.

Music Hall's Offering Tonight.

By special arrangement, Marion Manola is to make one more concert appearance before leaving for Europe, and her songs will be one of the special attractions of the Music Hall entertainment tonight. Keller's ballad, "Douglas Green," Gounod's "Ave Maria," with piano, organ and cello accompaniment, and Chassaigne's "'Tis Eventide," will be the prima donna's selections. Mr. Amoeltte is to have a brilliant clarinet solo, and Mr. Schulz's cello fantasia on themes from "The Daughter of the Regiment," is likely to be very popular. The popular barytone, Mr. G. Campanari, will be heard in Ponchielli's "Lithuania" song, which is new to American audiences, and is to sing, also, a favorite air from "The Barber of Seville." The Salem Cadet band will add the "Bohemian Girl" overture, a Waldteufel waltz, Misud's "Chilian Dance," and selections from "The Gondoliers" to the programme. Mr. Leon Keach is to be the accompanist.

The Adamowski quartet will give the first of a series of three concerts in Steinert Hall, Nov. 3. The programme is to be Haydn's quartet in D minor, Fitzenhagen's "Cradle Song" and a Klingel theme arranged for four 'celli (Messrs. J. Adamowski, Schulz, Campanari and Mingels being the performers) and Dvorak's quartet in C major.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1890.

MUSIC.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B and H).....Haydn
A Faust overture.....Wagner
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

Here we have a programme made up first of a symphony of the old school; then an overture which, though it follows the scheme laid down for the construction of an overture, in many respects has the nature of a symphonic poem; and finally the great romantic symphony of Schubert. It is a curious programme, pitched together apparently without reason; unless the Wagner selection was intended as a sop to some who are tired of such music makers as Haydn, or as a resting place where they who care not for the ingenious instrumental combinations of Wagner could look back with pleasure upon the symphony of the last century and wait patiently for the music of Schubert.

The manner in which the Haydn symphony was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch gives rise to questions which are not perhaps of popular interest; and yet the interest felt and expressed by the public at the end of the performance depends upon the answers to these questions. They are the ever recurring ones: What is the proper tempo? Was this or that phrase rightly expressed? Did the spirit of the composer dwell for the moment in the body of the conductor? Admirable as was the playing of the orchestra, the symphony was not so well received by the audience as the Haydn symphony in G played about a year ago; and the cause of this was not in the music itself, but in the fact that the conductor last Saturday presented a modernized Haydn; not the Haydn of the last century, with periwig and powder, and writing music because he could not help it, but a man of this generation who tried to express by the instruments the psychological ideas of the radical German school; and so he spoke in strained, unnatural phrases. The audience did not know the kindly, simple old man, and viewed with suspicion the stranger who took his name.

Now, the great charm of Haydn is his frankness. Like Montaigne, he conceals nothing from you; he shows you his homely nature; he chats with you, he jokes with you; and never does he wish to appear better than he is. He is free from morbidness; he accepts nature and life and death with the laughing confidence of a child, and does not pother his head about them. And this frankness of the composer, when it is appreciated by the conductor, is contagious, and the hearer is soothed and cheered without knowing the reason or caring to analyze it. But Mr. Nikisch did not seem content with this simplicity of Haydn; and he tried by exaggeration in the tempos and in the nuances to express that which was not in Haydn's simple mind. A director of the positive genius of Mr. Nikisch should be allowed great latitude in his tempos and in his conceptions of the proper phrasing; and if he takes a movement faster or slower than is traditional, there is no harm done, provided the spirit of the movement be preserved. When, however, a simple melody is sung with affectation, when that which is calm is filled with unrest, when measures are so tortured that they shriek out untruths, effects may be gained, but they are effects foreign to the composer and his time; and in such a performance simplicity disappears. It is true that the meaning given to the words "piano" and "forte" depend upon the size of the hall, the number and position of the performers, the distance of the hearers from the stage, etc.; yet is it not true that Saturday evening the piano of Haydn became the forte of Mr. Nikisch, and the forte became a fortissimo? Was there not an exaggeration in even the length of the rests? And was there not throughout the work a straining after dramatic effect? Take, for instance, the menuetto. Haydn found the dance in the palaces of the nobility. He stripped it of patches and farthingales; he clothed it in jollity and gave it to the common people. Mr. Nikisch treated this dance as though it were a salon piece full of the rubato; and the honest country wench of Haydn became a court lady, who ogled her lover over a painted fan. In the final allegro his love of italicizing that which was intended to be simple was shown by his ruthlessly covering the passage given the first flute by exaggerating the flowing piano measures given to the strings. And so throughout the symphony he apparently disdained the detail of the composer that he might gain dramatic and illegitimate effects.

On the other hand, the peculiar genius of Mr. Nikisch was seen in the fine performance of Wagner's "Faust" overture and Schubert's C major symphony. The overture is, after all, a monstrous, misshapen work, although it is intended to set forth in music the idea of Faust. Mr. Lewes in his Life of Goethe remarks upon the folly of critics devoting their attention to an exposition of the idea of Faust and neglecting the natural explanation furnished by the work itself. "The reader will be aware that I have little sympathy with that philosophy of art which consists in translating art into philosophy. Experience tells me that the artists themselves had quite other objects in view than that of developing an idea; and experience further says that the Artist's public is by no means primarily anxious about the Idea, but leaves it entirely to the critics—who cannot agree upon the point among themselves." There is more philosophy than music in this overture of Wagner, and no efforts of adoring commentators who catch sight of Faust here and detect traces of the "ever womanly" there can save the composition from the charge of grotesque and bombastic stupidity. Many in the audience thought otherwise, and they were so eager to applaud that they anticipated the final chord.

The great symphony of Schubert needs no annotation, no guide-posts to tell the hearer where he is. It is not the exposition of an idea: it is simply music, and the only ideas expressed are musical ideas. Were it played with all the indicated repetitions, its length, which Schumann called "heavenly," would be unendurable; unless the ancient custom of introducing a song or light piece between the numbers were revived, and this was done in Vienna in the case of this very symphony as late as 1839. Its extreme length tempts directors to hurry the allegros, which are often taken at such a pace that the result is confusion. It is a pleasure to say that Mr. Nikisch showed great discretion in his choice of tempos and that the performance upon the whole left little to be desired. Perhaps objections might be raised to the treatment of the horn passage which opens the symphony and the famous horn measures in the andante, but both conductor and orchestra deserved the honest and hearty applause which was given at the end of each movement.

The programme of the next and fourth rehearsal and concert is as follows: Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor; Moszkowski's Suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Hiram G. Tucker is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 26.

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme for last night's Symphony concert was not especially well balanced. It opened with Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 2 B. & H) and ended with Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 9. This was well enough, and the two symphonies would have been sufficient for the concert, with a solo between them, but Wagner's "Faust" overture had the middle place on the programme, and anything more incongruous it would be hard to imagine. The purity, lucidity and naturalness of the older works were wholly out of sympathy with the groping the fogginess and the artificially, not to say the vulgar blatancy of the Wagner overture, of which the meaning, musical or sentimental, remains an unsolvable puzzle, from its opening, suggesting in tone the agonies of an æsthetic colic, to its end suggesting nothing in particular except the close of the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. However, it received the most enthusiastic plaudits of the evening, although the applauders palpitated with the right emotion at the wrong moment, through thinking the orchestra was over some bars before the conclusion really came. The work of the orchestra was well done throughout. The Haydn Symphony was finely read, except for the breaks in the time which gave to the old music now and then a modern Chopineaque color that it did not bear very well. The Schubert symphony was also beautifully interpreted and played, but it is a long work and would have been better enjoyed if it had not come after the Wagner overture which left the ear and the attention wearied. Verily the programme was not felicitously put together. We must make another reference to the programme book in connection with the Haydn symphony. It describes a symphony in D minor by Haydn, but the one that was played was in D major, and is quite at variance with this analysis. The selections for the next concert are something of a curiosity in the way of programme making for a symphony concert. They are: Overture, "Prometheus," Goldmark (new); Concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, Sgambati; Suite in F, Moskowski; and "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner! Mr. Hiram G. Tucker is to be the soloist!

The music critic of the Traveller has replied to some strictures made by us upon certain comments in last week's programme book of the Symphony concert, especially in connection with the words "pizzicato ostinato." We are by no means convinced that he has bettered the case by his explanation. The expression means, and means only, an obstinate or continuous plucking of the strings, and the "ostinato," in this instance, has no reference whatever "to some peculiar melodial figure or group of notes." It is merely an adjective qualifying the word that it follows, and it is absurd to insist that it qualifies other words that do not appear. The expression "basso ostinato" means obstinate adherence to "some peculiar melodial figure or group of notes," and is also known as "ground bass" and "passacaglia bass"; and "pizzicato ostinato" means an obstinate adhering to pizzicato, and nothing more. The Traveller critic quotes John Hills as an authority on the word "ostinato," and by so doing seems to imagine that he has quoted him in regard to "pizzicato ostinato" as well. He also quotes C. F. Pohl in order to show that the wind instruments can be blown staccato, but the words quoted show decidedly that they cannot be so blown; in fact, show that staccato on wind instruments is effected by an interruption of the blowing by the tongue. This sustains our statement that wind instruments cannot be blown staccato. His explanation that a misplaced parenthesis caused him to say that the brasses play pizzicato chords is well enough, as far it goes, but we cannot see that he has improved matters by placing the parenthesis where he thinks it should be. For example, "against a full harmony, pizzicato chords (in the strings) and soft brasses," does not make the matter much clearer, to say nothing of the fact that there can be no pizzicato chords except they are made by the strings. To explain the plainly evident is always to do something that is pre-eminently unnecessary. What he probably meant to say was: "A full harmony of pizzicarto chords and of the soft brasses." Having thus reasserted the position taken by us on the points debated, we will now afford the Traveller critic an opportunity to explain other peculiarities in the language of the same programme-book. He says: "A quick ascending arpeggio leads to the second principal phrase, meno mosso—played slower than the preceding—in the key of A." Now as meno mosso is a time indication, meaning "less fast," it is a matter of course that the meno mosso phrase is to be played slower. The parenthetical information is, therefore, quite superfluous. Then, too, we read of this same meno mosso phrase as a duet for oboes and bassoons! We can understand a duet for one oboe and one bassoon, or for two oboes, or for two bassoons; but a duet for oboes and bassoons strikes us as a novelty that even modern changes in the art of music have not made quite among the possibilities. We also read of "the unique accompaniment from the corps of brasses never changing from strict time." But if the accompaniment did change from strict time it would work fatal disaster to the theme accompanied. In short, it is not easy to imagine the conductor beating strict time for the theme and a time that is not strict for the accompaniment. Again, we read: "Through a series of alternating measures, the first theme is reached in the key of F." But why "alternating?" It will be taken for granted that the measures follow each other in order and in their due turns. It would be impossible to reach the first theme again by measures that did not alternate. There is no reason why music should not be discussed, even in a programme-book, in a clear, straightforward and sensible manner, and if technical terms must be used, it should be with a fair understanding of their meanings. In this, as in many other things, the homely advice of the late lamented Mr. David Crockett, is not to be despised: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead!" Many are brought to grief by that little learning which is a dangerous thing. With this limited possession it is always wise to move meno mosso ostinato.

At the second Sunday Popular Concert, to be given in Music Hall, to night, Miss Marion Manola, Sig. Campanari, Mr. Leo Schultz, Mr. N. R. Amelotte, Mr. Leon Keach, and the Salem Cadet Band will appear.

The first of the three chamber concerts to be given by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place Nov. 3 at Steinert Hall. The programme is Haydn's quartet in D minor, No. 11; Dvorak's quartet in C major, op. 61; a "Cradle Song," Fitzenhagen, and a "Theme and Variations" for four 'celli, by Julius Klengel.

[28]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

Wagner was never heard in such odd juxta position as in the concert of Saturday. The "Faust Overture" was sandwiched in between a melodious Haydn symphony and the altogether tuneful C major symphony of Schubert. Now the overture in question is by no means a fair representation of the school of the master; it has its grand moments, but Homer nods, in its measures, more than once, and if the mythical, ethical subject is far removed from ordinary comprehension when expressed by Goethe in words, it is still more so when interpreted in the melos and free modulation of Wagner, and here there can be no Wolzogen to make the path clear by a musical guide book.

The Haydn symphony was given a very fine reading, in fact, as regards the interpretations, the voice of adverse criticism may well be mute, and Mr. Nikisch has seldom appeared to better advantage than in this concert. That the Haydn work was somewhat modernized was self evident, but such a modernization can scarcely be classed as a fault. The tempi, for example, were given with an extreme application of their purport; now in Haydn's time all such marks were read in a conservative manner, and an andante became as a modern moderato, an allegro as an allegretto of the present; the quick movements were less quick, the slow movements less slow than they are with us. In addition to this innovation Mr. Nikisch gave some very dramatic pauses in the minuet, which I feel certain would not have occurred under Haydn's own direction, yet are to be approved of; in short the reading was a practical justification of Wagner's views of the right of individualization in conducting. Now came the "Faust Overture" and it was given a splendid performance. Grandly did the tuba and contrabasses give forth the sombre introductory phrase, and most expressively did the strings follow. The work reminds a little of Liszt's "Les Preludes" in its soaring after the infinite, and like Liszt, Wagner gives human self torture to the deepest bass instruments, and angelic contentment to the violins in highest positions. That one little staccato note which Wagner marked fortissimo on the kettledrum, became something stupendous and drowned out tuba, trumpets, horns (the trombones have a moment's rest here), woodwind, strings and all! Decidedly our new drummer is the leading man of the orchestra, according to the Marquis of Queensberry's rules. Especially well played was the theme on the four horns and woodwind, with the accompanying figure on the strings. The applause of a few neophites began at the chord in D minor, just before the first violins begin their soft passage alone, and are followed by a long-drawn-out C sharp on the first bassoon, but to a person unfamiliar with the score this ending is as deceptive almost as the ending of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and the fortunate ones who waited with their applause until the genuine finale arrived must hold the more zealous ones blameless.

Now came melody and to spare; Schubert could not give a Brahms development, but he could give a charm to his large sonata forms by the most beautiful contrasts of themes. The reading and the performance of the work was superb, and one feels especially grateful that the trombones were allowed to give forth their power in the coda of the first movement. I have never been quite in sympathy with the repression of these instruments in previous performances. Schubert meant something by the use of the trombones here, and they should ring out with a fiery clangor. This, too, is the first great use of the trombones in symphony. In the last century the misunderstood instruments were used in a barbaric manner to re-enforce the contrabasses; then Mozart showed their true tone-color in his Requiem and in "Don Giovanni," then Beethoven introduced them into symphony for the first time in his fifth symphony, swelled a few measures of his thunderstorm in the Pastoral symphony with their blatancy, and used them in the ninth symphony in a military manner; but in this work they come forth for the first time with independence and true effect in a symphony. The horn player deserves praise for the steadiness with which he blew the solo phrase with which the introduction begins, and the whole orchestra can share in the commendation for the broad manner in which they gave the augmentation of this same phrase at the end of the first movement. The oboe carries the weight of the second movement, and certainly the part was faultlessly played. The leading cello, too, was beautifully prominent in this. The trio of the scherzo began rather roughly, but made amends later on. In the finale the kettledrum again seemed too loud, but the four sforzando notes which form such a striking figure in this movement, were finely given by the orchestra: these portentous knocks, which seem like strokes of destiny, were taken directly from Beethoven, not, however, from the fifth symphony, but from the first and best movement of the master's violin concerto. In this connection it is as well to state that it is folly to try to attach special meanings to this masterwork of Schubert. When Beethoven was asked about the meaning of the first movement of his fifth symphony he gave a set, ranging, according to his mood, from the vulgarest joke up to the knocking of fate, and here in this work, we have one commentator seeking to represent Phaeton and the horses of the sun by the last movement, Schumann giving to the entire work a meaning totally different and imagining it a picture of gypsy life, and finally Perabo entering upon the programme book with gondolas, lovers, tournaments, sunset guns, weddings, and what not. This is not healthy food for the ...not higher; our ... full enough of sentiment, without overlaying it with sentimentality. Let the sensible audience notice the beauty of the themes, the symmetry of the form, the contrasts of the movements, and let him yield himself freely to the exaltation consequent upon hearing good music. In such a case music will be a stimulant to all that is poetic within Him, and he may wreath a thousand fancies around the composition, but let him not print the vision as a tangible result of the music, for his neighbor, differently organized, may have experienced entirely different thoughts; and, above all, let him not allow anybody else to do his dreaming for him, for, in doing this, he will lose the chief, though most intangible, charm of music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music Hall Popular.

The second concert in the Music Hall Sunday Popular course was given last evening before an audience that filled the immense auditorium. The programme presented was well arranged and presented by artists of the first order. Miss Marion Manola appeared for the second and last time this season, and received a most enthusiastic reception. Her rendition of "Ave Maria" with piano, organ and 'cello accompaniment, was the gem of the evening and merited the hearty encore it received. Sig. Campanari's vocal selections found high favor with the audience, and he was obliged to respond to a recall. Leo Achnetz upheld his fine reputation as a 'cello soloist, and his fantasie on themes from "La Fille du Regiment" was executed in a faultless manner.

The clarinet soloist, W. R. Amelotte, made a most favorable impression by the manner in which he rendered a very difficult solo. The Salem Cadet Band was at its best, and carried out its programme of instrumental selections in a masterly manner, and especially the "Oriental Patriot." The audience was very liberal in its applause, and encores were hearty and numerous.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, OCT. 26, 1890.

Symphony Delights and Lecocq's Lyric Harmonies.

From beginning to end, the programme at the Symphony concert last week was a delight. It was a little longer than Mr. Nikisch's offerings usually are, but the man or woman who could weary of Schubert's beautiful ninth symphony, so performed, is not worthy of the privilege of listening to such masterly interpretation of one of the most fascinating of musical classics. Father Haydn is heard at his best in the symphony in D major, and in this also Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra attained well deserved honors.

Between these larger works came Wagner's "A Faust overture." Nothing could be in stronger contrast to either Haydn or Schubert. It was a study to watch the director, as this strong, thoroughly characteristic overture went its course. Mr. Nikisch obviously had every measure by heart; and with constant watchfulness and swift, decisive gesture now and then, evoked from this wonderfully trained corps of players a succession of most brilliant, striking orchestral effects. But the third concert will chiefly be remembered for the Schubert symphony after all—a revelation, assuredly, to any in the great audiences who did not know the classic.

Mr. H. G. Tucker, the pianist, will perform Sgambati's concerto in G minor at the concerts this week, having, of course, the cooperation of the orchestra. For the first time in Boston, Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture will be heard. Moszkowski's brilliant suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" completes the attractive programme.

Music Hall's Offering Tonight.

By special arrangement, Marion Manola is to make one more concert appearance before leaving for Europe, and her songs will be one of the special attractions of the Music Hall entertainment tonight. Keller's ballad, "Douglas Green," Gounod's "Ave Maria," with piano, organ and cello accompaniment, and Chassaigne's "'Tis Even-tide," will be the prima donna's selections. Mr. Amoeltte is to have a brilliant clarinet solo, and Mr. Schulz's cello fantasia on themes from "The Daughter of the Regiment," is likely to be very popular. The popular barytone, Mr. G. Campanari, will be heard in Ponchielli's "Lithuania" song, which is new to American audiences, and is to sing, also, a favorite air from "The Barber of Seville." The Salem Cadet band will add the "Bohemian Girl" overture, a Waldteufel waltz, Missud's "Ohilian Dance," and selections from "The Gondoliers" to the programme. Mr. Leon Keach is to be the accompanist.

The Adamowski quartet will give the first of a series of three concerts in Steinert Hall, Nov. 3. The programme is to be Haydn's quartet in D minor, Fitzenhagen's "Cradle Song" and a Klingel theme arranged for four 'cellí (Messrs. J. Adamowski, Schulz, Campanari and Mingels being the performers) and Dvorak's quartet in C major.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1890

MUSIC.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B and H).....Haydn
A Faust overture.....Wagner
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

Here we have a programme made up first of a symphony of the old school; then an overture which, though it follows the scheme laid down for the construction of an overture, in many respects has the nature of a symphonic poem; and finally the great romantic symphony of Schubert. It is a curious programme, pitched together apparently without reason; unless the Wagner selection was intended as a sop to some who are tired of such music makers as Haydn, or as a resting place where they who care not for the ingenious instrumental combinations of Wagner could look back with pleasure upon the symphony of the last century and wait patiently for the music of Schubert.

The manner in which the Haydn symphony was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch gives rise to questions which are not perhaps of popular interest; and yet the interest felt and expressed by the public at the end of the performance depends upon the answers to these questions. They are the ever recurring ones: What is the proper tempo? Was this or that phrase rightly expressed? Did the spirit of the composer dwell for the moment in the body of the conductor? Admirable as was the playing of the orchestra, the symphony was not so well received by the audience as the Haydn symphony in G played about a year ago; and the cause of this was not in the music itself, but in the fact that the conductor last Saturday presented a modernized Haydn; not the Haydn of the last century, with periwig and powder, and writing music because he could not help it, but a man of this generation who tried to express by the instruments the psychological ideas of the radical German school; and so he spoke in strained, unnatural phrases. The audience did not know the kindly, simple old man, and viewed with suspicion the stranger who took his name.

Now, the great charm of Haydn is his frankness. Like Montaigne, he conceals nothing from you; he shows you his homely nature; he chats with you, he jokes with you; and never does he wish to appear better than he is. He is free from morbidness; he accepts nature and life and death with the laughing confidence of a child, and does not pother his head about them. And this frankness of the composer, when it is appreciated by the conductor, is contagious, and the hearer is soothed and cheered without knowing the reason or caring to analyze it. But Mr. Nikisch did not seem content with this simplicity of Haydn; and he tried by exaggeration in the tempos and in the nuances to express that which was not in Haydn's simple mind. A director of the positive genius of Mr. Nikisch should be allowed great latitude in his tempos and in his conceptions of the proper phrasing; and if he takes a movement faster or slower than is traditional, there is no harm done, provided the spirit of the movement be preserved. When, however, a simple melody is sung with affectation, when that which is calm is filled with unrest, when measures are so tortured that they shriek out untruths, effects may be gained, but they are effects foreign to the composer and his time; and in such a performance simplicity disappears. It is true that the meaning given to the words "piano" and "forte" depend upon the size of the hall, the number and position of the performers, the distance of the hearers from the stage, etc.; yet is it not true that Saturday evening the piano of Haydn became the forte of Mr. Nikisch, and the forte became a fortissimo? Was there not an exaggeration in even the length of the rests? And was there not throughout the work a straining after dramatic effect? Take, for instance, the menuetto. Haydn found the dance in the palaces of the nobility. He stripped it of patches and farthingales; he clothed it in jollity and gave it to the common people. Mr. Nikisch treated this dance as though it were a salon piece full of the rubato; and the honest country wench of Haydn became a court lady, who ogled her lover over a painted fan. In the final allegro his love of italicizing that which was intended to be simple was shown by his ruthlessly covering the passage given the first flute by exaggerating the flowing piano measures given to the strings. And so throughout the symphony he apparently disdained the detail of the composer that he might gain dramatic and illegitimate effects.

On the other hand, the peculiar genius of Mr. Nikisch was seen in the fine performance of Wagner's "Faust" overture and Schubert's C major symphony. The overture is, after all, a monstrous, misshapen work, although it is intended to set forth in music the idea of Faust. Mr. Lewes in his Life of Goethe remarks upon the folly of critics devoting their attention to an exposition of the Idea of Faust and neglecting the natural explanation furnished by the work itself. "The reader will be aware that I have little sympathy with that philosophy of art which consists in translating art into philosophy. Experience tells me that the artists themselves had quite other objects in view than that of developing an Idea; and experience further says that the Artist's public is by no means primarily anxious about the Idea, but leaves it entirely to the critics—who cannot agree upon the point among themselves." There is more philosophy than music in this overture of Wagner, and no efforts of adoring commentators who catch sight of Faust here and detect traces of the "ever womanly" there can save the composition from the charge of grotesque and bombastic stupidity. Many in the audience thought otherwise, and they were so eager to applaud that they anticipated the final chord.

The great symphony of Schubert needs no annotation, no guide-posts to tell the hearer where he is. It is not the exposition of an idea: it is simply music, and the only ideas expressed are musical ideas. Were it played with all the indicated repetitions, its length, which Schumann called "heavenly," would be unendurable; unless the ancient custom of introducing a song or light piece between the numbers were revived, and this was done in Vienna in the case of this very symphony as late as 1839. Its extreme length tempts directors to hurry the allegros, which are often taken at such a pace that the result is confusion. It is a pleasure to say that Mr. Nikisch showed great discretion in his choice of tempos and that the performance upon the whole left little to be desired. Perhaps objections might be raised to the treatment of the horn passage which opens the symphony and the famous horn measures in the andante, but both conductor and orchestra deserved the honest and hearty applause which was given at the end of each movement.

The programme of the next and fourth rehearsal and concert is as follows: Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Hiram G. Tucker will ...baritone; Mr. Schulz, the 'cellist, and the Salem Cadet Band appeared in selections which gave much pleasure to the large audience. The feature of the evening was Gounod's "Ave Maria," sung by Miss Manola, with piano, organ and 'cello accompaniment.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 26.

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme for last night's Symphony concert was not especially well balanced. It opened with Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 2 B. & H) and ended with Schuber's Symphony in C major, No. 9. This was well enough, and the two symphonies would have been sufficient for the concert, with a solo between them, but Wagner's "Faust" overture had the middle place on the programme, and anything more incongruous it would be hard to imagine. The purity, lucidity and naturalness of the older works were wholly out of sympathy with the groping the fogginess and the artificially, not to say the vulgar blatancy of the Wagner overture, of which the meaning, musical or sentimental, remains an unsolvable puzzle, from its opening, suggesting in tone the agonies of an æsthetic colic, to its end suggesting nothing in particular except the close of the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. However, it received the most enthusiastic plaudits of the evening, although the applauders palpitated with the right emotion at the wrong moment, through thinking the orchestra was over some bars before the conclusion really came. The work of the orchestra was well done throughout. The Haydn Symphony was finely read, except for the breaks in the time which gave to the old music now and then a modern Chopineaque color that it did not bear very well. The Schubert symphony was also beautifully interpreted and played, but it is a long work and would have been better enjoyed if it had not come after the Wagner overture which left the ear and the attention wearied. Verily the programme was not felicitously put together. We must make another reference to the programme book in connection with the Haydn symphony. It describes a symphony in D minor by Haydn, but the one that was played was in D major, and is quite at variance with this analysis. The selections for the next concert are something of a curiosity in the way of programme making for a symphony concert. They are: Overture, "Prometheus," Goldmark (new); Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Sgambati; Suite in F, Moskowski; and "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner! Mr. Hiram G. Tucker is to be the soloist!

The music critic of the Traveller has replied to some strictures made by us upon certain comments in last week's programme book of the Symphony concert, especially in connection with the words "pizzicato ostinato." We are by no means convinced that he has bettered the case by his explanation. The expression means, and means only, an obstinate or continuous plucking of the strings, and the "ostinato," in this instance, has no reference whatever "to some peculiar melodial figure or group of notes." It is merely an adjective qualifying the word that it follows, and it is absurd to insist that it qualifies other words that do not appear. The expression "basso ostinato" means obstinate adherence to "some peculiar melodial figure or group of notes," and is also known as "ground bass" and "passacaglia bass"; and "pizzicato ostinato" means an obstinate adhering to pizzicato, and nothing more. The Traveller critic quotes John Hills as an authority on the word "ostinato," and by so doing seems to imagine that he has quoted him in regard to "pizzicato ostinato" as well. He also quotes C. F. Pohl in order to show that the wind instruments can be blown staccato, but the words quoted show decidedly that they cannot be so blown; in fact, show that staccato on wind instruments is effected by an interruption of the blowing by the tongue. This sustains our statement that wind instruments cannot be blown staccato. His explanation that a misplaced parenthesis caused him to say that the brasses play pizzicato chords is well enough, as far it goes, but we cannot see that he has improved matters by placing the parenthesis where he thinks it should be. For example, "against a full harmony, pizzicato chords (in the strings) and soft brasses," does not make the matter much clearer, to say nothing of the fact that there can be no pizzicato chords except they are made by the strings. To explain the plainly evident is always to do something that is pre-eminently unnecessary. What he probably meant to say was: "A full harmony of pizzicarto chords and of the soft brasses." Having thus reasserted the position taken by us on the points debated, we will now afford the Traveller critic an opportunity to explain other peculiarities in the language of the same programme-book. He says: "A quick ascending arpeggio leads to the second principal phrase, meno mosso—played slower than the preceding—in the key of A." Now as meno mosso is a time indication, meaning "less fast," it is a matter of course that the meno mosso phrase is to be played slower. The parenthetical information is, therefore, quite superfluous. Then, too, we read of this same meno mosso phrase as a duet for oboes and bassoons! We can understand a duet for one oboe and one bassoon, or for two oboes, or for two bassoons; but a duet for oboes and bassoons strikes us as a novelty that even modern changes in the art of music have not made quite among the possibilities. We also read of "the unique accompaniment from the corps of brasses never changing from strict time." But if the accompaniment did change from strict time it would work fatal disaster to the theme accompanied. In short, it is not easy to imagine the conductor beating strict time for the theme and a time that is not strict for the accompaniment. Again, we read: "Through a series of alternating measures, the first theme is reached in the key of F." But why "alternating?" It will be taken for granted that the measures follow each other in order and in their due turns. It would be impossible to reach the first theme again by messures that did not alternate. There is no reason why music should not be discussed, even in a programme-book, in a clear, straightforward and sensible manner, and if technical terms must be used, it should be with a fair understanding of their meanings. In this, as in many other things, the homely advice of the late lamented Mr. David Crockett, is not to be despised: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead!" Many are brought to grief by that little learning which is a dangerous thing. With this limited possession it is always wise to move meno mosso ostinato.

At the second Sunday Popular Concert, to be given in Music Hall, to night, Miss Marion Manola, Sig. Campanari, Mr. Leo Schultz, Mr. N. R. Amelotte, Mr. Leon Keach, and the Salem Cadet Band will appear

The first of the three chamber concerts to be given by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place Nov. 3 at Steinert Hall. The programme is Haydn's quartet in D minor, No. 11; Dvorak's quartet in C major, op. 61; a "Cradle Song," Fitzenhagen, and a "Theme and Variations" for four 'cellí. by Julius Klengel.

[29]

...ON HERALD

...Music Hall Sunday Popular Concert.

...'Sunday Pops" at Music Hall appear ...ccurat the element in the community ...ich they were planned, and last evening ... audience of patrons turned out to enjoy ... programme arranged. The artists en... included Miss Marion Manola, so... Sig. Giuseppe Campanari, baritone; ... R. Amelotte, clarinet soloist; Mr. Leo ...ltz, 'cello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, ac...nist, and the Salem Cadet band, Jean ... director. The same interest was ...n Miss Manola's numbers as was ex... ...d the previous Sunday evening, and she ... pleased her audience greatly by her ...ng of a number of English ballads, as ... the "Ave Maria" of Gounod, which ... acceptably interpreted.

...Campanari has, evidently, not been for... by the lovers of good singing during ... summer vacation, and he got a right ...ty welcome upon making his appear... His numbers were the romanza "Litu...y," by Ponchielli, a very pleasing novelty, ... the familiar aria from the "Barber of ...ville." In both these numbers the singer's ...rous vocal gifts found full opportunity, ... he sang as if the melodious measures in... him, his voice ringing out with grand ...ect in both selections. Recalls rewarded ... of his appearances, and he merited all ... favor shown him.

Mr. Schultz gave a very pleasing solo num... in the 'cello fantasie on themes from "La ...lle du Regiment," and Mr. Amelotte ...proved himself a very capable clarinet player ... the solo he contributed to the programme. ... Salem band, always an excellent con... organization, was heard with especial ...isfaction in the "Gondoliers" selection, the ...chottel waltz "L'Estudiantina" and the ...ban dance "Manana," all of which were ...enthusiastically applauded. A brilliant pro...amme is announced for next Sunday even...

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

Haydn, Wagner and Schubert at the Symphony.

The programme of the third symphony concert was:

...Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. & H.)
...."A Faust Overture"
Schubert.....Symphony in C major, No. 9

There was no soloist.

These are familiar works but rather curiously placed. What greater contrast could be offered to the genial, gentle Haydn, and the spontaneous and buoyant Schubert, than this restless, passionate, turbulent "Faust" of Wagner! The style of the three composers is so opposed that neither appeared to the best advantage by the arrangement. The Haydn symphony is one of the most familiar. It was not played quite as well as the one from the same pen heard last year. But the beauty and the power of Schubert's gloriously long and greatest work were felt at their utmost. Especially in the first and closing movements did the genius of the man stand out anew under the glowing reading Mr. Nikisch gave. Imbued with the loveliest color, nothing that the orchestra has done more clearly demonstrated the art of individual players and groups of players; the first horn and the oboe and flute are deserving particular compliments. The next programme is a truly modern one, containing works by three living composers, and one by the man whose works can never die. It is Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the soloist.

SUNDAY "POPS."

Miss Manola and the Salem Cadet Band at Music Hall.

The second concert in the course of Sunday Music Hall Populars occurred last night to the eminent satisfaction of a large audience. The stars of the evening were Sig. Campanari, who is too well known here to need mention, and Miss Marion Manola, the ex-comic opera singer.

The numbers offered by the Salem Cadet Band were well received, as were also Miss Manola's "Ave Maria," and the 'cello solo, "La Fille du Regement," by Mr. Schultz.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of Saturday evening leaves undisturbed the comfortable assurance in which we have become accustomed to rest that excellence of performance on the part of this noble orchestra, fired and guided by so thoroughly musical and able a conductor, may be taken for granted, leaving for criticism only the programmes, the matter rather than the manner of interpretation. The programme this time, like that of the opening concert, was a trefoil—a strange one, the three leaves being:

Haydn—Symphony in D major (No. 2, Breitkopf & Härtel edition).
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Schubert—Symphony in C major.

It was a happy thought to bring together these two symphonies. It was far from a happy thought to separate them, to cross the current of affinity between them by the huge dissonance of a Wagnerian conception or perversion of Goethe's "Faust." The two symphonies stood for the first spring promise and the ripest manhood of the great Vienna cradle and school of the symphonic art. Father Haydn, whom they call so "childlike" in his music, as in his life, was indeed the father of the symphony, and enriched the world with its first models in their fair completeness. Fair and enlivening they were, fresh, sweet messengers preaching the gospel of beauty through tones. If they were simple compared with more modern elaborations; if their conceptions were naive, cheerful, natural, innocent, rather than profound or grand; if the orchestra was small, the instruments comparatively few in kind, yet they were put together to the best advantage, the intertwining polyphony was perfect, gracefully and easily employed as if it were a second nature with him, or rather the first nature, the natural, spontaneous, unconscious language of his soul; and all so genuine, so real and sincere, so from the heart. Thence came the themes; and what consummate, subtle wisdom in the development and form! On Haydn followed Mozart, in a richer vein, of higher poetic genius. In Beethoven this great form of instrumental creation reached the climax of development. Schubert, in this posthumous chef-d'œuvre, of which Schumann was the delighted discoverer while ransacking his disorderly heaps of manuscript in Vienna, and who to his other glowing words of admiration added the much-quoted phrase, "And then its heavenly length," stood on the same high table-land, or scarcely down the hither slope of it; for, of all symphonies composed since Beethoven, this is the one which best bears comparison in originality, inspiration, nobility, copiousness of musical ideas, beauty and triumphant unity and persistency of purpose. It is almost superhuman in its energy; it is feminine in its sweet and lovely moods. Great genius always combines the masculine and feminine elements in itself. Is it not true of Shakspeare and of Goethe, of Homer and of Dante?

There was a still more special propriety in beginning with Haydn and ending with Schubert at his greatest. Schubert's earlier symphonies, slight in comparison with the great one in C, are strikingly in the style of Haydn; he seems to have been the model, it may have been unconsciously. You seem to be listening to Haydn when you hear one of them. So Mr. Nikisch gave us a pleasant opportunity to compare the slender sapling and the robust, rugged, full-grown oak. No two works could be more unlike, nor more in the same strain of true blood relationship. Schubert, as symphonist, began at the beginning, began with Haydn, went back, as it were, and lovingly grew up with him until he reached the crowning height, the wide, o'ershadowing majesty of this stupendous work.

It was undoubtedly the Schubert Symphony that went home with the audience as they left the hall. "A Faust Overture" might, did excite the most hand-clapping applause; the real great things are seldom stunningly applauded; they speak to heart and soul, and these seldom think, unless upon some outward prompting or disturbing sense of duty, of lifting hands. If the Faust overture was an incongruous monstrous nightmare in the way, Schubert could bear it, holding all his own in spite of it. Haydn after it might have suffered. He was well placed before; nothing to browbeat his innocent simplicity, nothing to put out his light.

It is indeed a wondrous symphony. The unfailing promise of every opening strain, in richer measure than you dared to dream; the way that it keeps faith with you to the very end of the four great movements; the fervor, the irresistible impulse of its never-flagging and majestic onsweep; the ruggedness of its bold outline ever melting into beauty; its superb euphony and exquisite play of color, never forced or coldly calculated, but gushing as naturally as springs from the rocks; the heroic, rousing tones of trumpets and trombones and distant mellow horns; the intimate, confiding, loving conversations of flutes, oboes and clarinets, with the trusty, friendly counsel of bassoons; the fine electricity of the violins penetrating and vivifying the whole mass, or breathing body, rather, of the organic whole; the startling and delicious surprises, beauties springing up like wildflowers; the charming episodes, which never interrupt, but only swell and enrich the volume of the steady, mighty flood which sweeps on to the end: the glory and excitement of the whole thing are food for thought and feeling for a long time after every hearing. Witching moments of it steal back and haunt your mind repeatedly: the theme of the andante as first sung by the oboe; the even lovelier melody of the celli obbligati, followed in the major by the running passage of the middle strings; in the scherzo those six bars in A-flat minor (said to have been an after-thought, an interpolation of Schubert), followed immediately by exactly the same passage set a half-tone higher, then, dimmest moment of the whole, the trio, opening into the clear sky of A major, with such an elated, inspiring and uplifting movement; and with more equally sure to come thronging back, equally worthy of notice; but as if climax could yet be out-climaxed, the titanic impetus and splendor, the breathless momentum yet perfect strength and poise of the finale, with the reiterated heavy thunder strokes in the basses near the end—does it not make you feel as if you had been carried safely over Niagara? Or, to use a homelier figure, do you not feel that sense of astonishment, of healthy glow and triumph with which they say one finds himself safe landed at the bottom of a steep toboggan slide?

D major appears to have been a favorite key with Haydn. Four of the twelve symphonies which he composed for Salomon's London concerts, the most important dozen, and most frequently performed, of his more than a hundred works in this form, are in this key. The one selected, the second of the twelve as published by Breitkopf and Härtel, is perhaps the best, certainly one of the largest, employing both clarinets and oboes, two horns, instead of the modern four, and no trombones, nor any of the monster instruments of brass, underpinning each kind with a contrabass of its own family; hence the portentous bass tubas, contrafagottos, etc., which swell the Berlioz and Wagner orchestra. We hardly think that Haydn and Mozart ever felt the need of such; they could make good music without them. This symphony has a grand adagio introduction in D minor; the allegro steals in softly in the major, a charming, graceful, cheerful strain, with pleasing secondary themes and modifications of the first cunningly, yet naturally, worked up into a consistent, interesting whole. The andante is lovely, flowering into graceful triplets as it unfolds its musing theme. The minuet is bolder, and the trio, with its smoothly running passage of oboes and bassoons as well as violins, afterwards staccato, is very captivating. The finale, allegro spirituoso, is in no way disappointing. Mr. Nikisch's handling of a Haydn symphony, however much he may disturb some orthodox preconceived notions of the way in which certain passages or phrases in Beethoven or Schumann ought to go, always wins unanimous applause. He seems to take to it by nature; and is it not greatly to his credit? So heartily at home there, so cognate at the root, what may he not build up as he develops with experience!

As to the dragon that lay for us on the road between those two symphonies, let us frankly say, The time was when on a first hearing of "A Faust Overture" we o'erwillingly and credulously yielded to the claims of its admirers. As we heard it again and again we felt surprised and rebuked that we could even have begun to take into our musical sympathies anything so outré and pretentious. As a musical reproduction of Goethe's Faust it had a human, deep and noble subject. It is now understood to have been intended as the first movement, or first act, of a Faust symphony in several parts. This part was to express the restless yearning and dissatisfaction which underlies the whole experience of an aspiring, earnest, deep, inquiring soul; the vanity of all intellectual as well as all outward acquirements; the "divine discontent" of one so learned and so wise and capable, so full of genius, as Goethe makes his Faust appear in the opening scene in his laboratory. But the "divine discontent" which vents itself in the loud, coarse groans and colic agonies, the floundering, deep-bass bloated harmonies of this overture, seems mainly physical, not fine or intellectual at all. It is a muscular and not a moral struggle which the instruments are waging. It is not poetry, but melodrama of the kind to please the groundlings. It is grandiloquently empty. It seems less like Goethe's "Faust" than like the monster "Polyphemus"—floundering, bellowing, raging in the darkness of his cavern, with his one eye put out in crafty self-defence by Ulysses and his crew, whom he intended to devour. That image suggested itself to us once in listening to the work, and no subsequent elucidation of the music has chased the image from our mind. Why not the line of Virgil: "Monstrum, horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum" (monster horrid, misformed, huge, bereft of light, i. e., with eye put out) for a motto to "A Polyphemus Overture," instead of Goethe's lines prefixed to this strange, would-be musical exhibition of the unhappiness of Faust? To be sure, there are a few measures of sweeter and more feminine suggestiveness at the conclusion. But Polyphemus also had his Margaret, that is to say, his Galatea. Instead of barring the transition from the simpler to the grander symphony by such a huge abortion, how much more welcome and more wholesome would have been a bridge more gentle and more graceful, and quite unpartisan, like a good aria, or a repetition of that Bach concerto for two violins, which hundreds would be glad to hear again! J. S. D.

The programme for the fourth concert to be given next Saturday night, is as follows: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark; pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moskowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

A well-advertised soprano, a popular baritone and a capital band were the attractions that served to draw a large audience to Music Hall last evening at the second of the course of popular concerts, for which the following programme was prepared:

Overture, "Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Clarinet solo.
Ballad for soprano, "Douglas Green".....Keller
Moment Musical.....Schubert
Oriental Patrol.....Asch
Romance for baritone, "Lituaniby".....Ponchielli
Waltz, "L'Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia for 'cello, theme from "La Fille du Regiment".....Servais
Air for Soprano, "Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
Chilian Dance, "Manana".....Missud
Song for soprano, "'T is Eventide".....Chassaigne
Aria for baritone, "Largo il factotum".....Rossini
Selections, "The Gondoliers".....Sullivan

Mr. N. R. Amelotte, clarinet; Miss Marion Manola, soprano; Mr. G. Campanari, baritone; Mr. L. Schultz, violoncello; Mr. L. Keach, accompanist.

The gems of the evening were the violoncello solo by Mr. Schultz and the two selections by Mr. Campanari, who well deserved the hearty recalls which he received. Miss Manola's voice and style are familiar to Bostonians. Her selections greatly pleased the audience last evening, her greatest success being the "Ave Maria," which was sung with piano, organ and 'cello accompaniment. The playing of the Salem Cadet Band is always pleasing, and their execution of the "Oriental Patrol" and the "Chilian Dance" was particularly good.

MORE AIR IN MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: May I use your columns for the purpose of voicing a grievance shared in by all who frequent the Music Hall? I refer to the absolute lack o fresh air. In the days when gas was used several of the windows were open of necessity at each concert; but since oxygen is no longer needed for the gas, the management seem to think the audience can exist without it, for they do all in their power to shut it out. Since the introduction of electric light and the practice of using lights for the Symphony Rehearsals, the curtains to the windows are drawn and the windows tightly closed. Usually two or three of the little transoms on the floor are open, but often they are shut, and at no time is there any place for the escape of bad air save through the ventilator in the roof, which are entirely inadequate. If ventilation in the Music Hall necessitates draughts, let us have the draughts; but I do not think it does. In old times the trouble was not as bad as at present. But better one here and there who suffers from draughts than that all in the crowded audience should suffer from the insidious but equally real effects of foul air

Evening Journal

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 28, 1890.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The enterprise of the management of the Y. M. C. A. in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Bedford is deserving of the highest commendation. It speaks ill for the love of the highest art among us that there were a good many vacant seats in the house. Such a performance is in every way a feast and seats for it should have been at a premium. When the orchestra makes its second visit, in March, it is to be hoped they will be greeted by a much larger house.

The people of New Bedford owe last night's entertainment and many others to the untiring energy and enterprise of Secretary Lougee. People often predict failure for Mr. Lougee's schemes, but he always "gets there."

Henry L. Higginson, the financial prop of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has the reputation of being a very modest man. It is said that he positively objects to his name being used in connection with that organization, and the notices gotten out by the manager wherein the financial head is mentioned, generally refer to him simply as "a wealthy gentleman." A story is told of him to the effect that when he arrives late at a symphony concert, he always waits in the corridor for the completion of the number that the orchestra is performing, going to his seat during the intermission between selections. This is considered an evidence of his modesty, but it looks more like a Christian regard for the comfort of others. SCOTT.

Mr. Comee Pleased with the Journal.

F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, was so well pleased with the cut of Herr Nikisch in yesterday's JOURNAL that he ordered six electrotypes made from it. Mr. Comee is also greatly satisfied with the JOURNAL'S promptness in executing job work. Through a misunderstanding the programmes for last night's concert did not reach the city in time. At 5 55 o'clock he placed an order with the JOURNAL for 1000 programmes, and at 7 15 they were in the Opera House ready for distribution.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1890.

——The sale of subscription tickets for the four concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall—the dates being Tuesday evenings, November 11 December 9, January 13 and February 4—opened last Monday evening.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1890

MUSICAL NOTES.

Miss Pauline Hall, the favorite operatic soprano, will make her only appearance in concert this season at the next Sunday's Music Hall Popular Concert. The Imperial Quartette of maudolin and guitar performers, Baldwin's famous Cadet Band and several other attractions will take part on this occasion.

Palladium, New Haven Ct
Date 10-29

Entertainments.

HYPERION THEATER.

The sale of seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra continues active, and in order to secure good locations purchases should be made as soon as possible. The sale is in progress at Steinert's music store.

[29]

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

The Music Hall Sunday Popular Concert.

The "Sunday Pops" at Music Hall appear to have caught the element in the community for which they were planned, and last evening a big audience of patrons turned out to enjoy the programme arranged. The artists engaged included Miss Marion Manola, soprano; Sig. Guiseppe Campanari, baritone; Mr. N. R. Amelotte, clarinet soloist; Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, accompanist, and the Salem Cadet band, Jean Missud, director. The same interest was shown in Miss Manola's numbers as was exhibited the previous Sunday evening, and she again pleased her audience greatly by her singing of a number of English ballads, as well as the "Ave Maria" of Gounod, which was acceptably interpreted.

Sig. Campanari has, evidently, not been forgotten by the lovers of good singing during the summer vacation, and he got a right hearty welcome upon making his appearance. His numbers were the romanza "Lituaniby," by Ponchielli, a very pleasing novelty, and the familiar aria from the "Barber of Seville." In both these numbers the singer's glorious vocal gifts found full opportunity, and he sang as if the melodious measures inspired him, his voice ringing out with grand effect in both selections. Recalls rewarded both of his appearances, and he merited all the favor shown him.

Mr. Schultz gave a very pleasing solo number in the 'cello fantasie on themes from "La Fille du Regiment," and Mr. Amelotte proved himself a very capable clarinet player in the solo he contributed to the programme.

The Salem band, always an excellent concert organization, was heard with especial satisfaction in the "Gondoliers" selection, the Waldteufel waltz "L'Estudiantina" and the Chilian dance "Manana," all of which were enthusiastically applauded. A brilliant programme is announced for next Sunday evening.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

Haydn, Wagner and Schubert at the Symphony.

The programme of the third symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. & H.)
Wagner......"A Faust Overture"
Schubert.. .....Symphony in C major, No. 9

There was no soloist.

These are familiar works but rather curiously placed. What greater contrast could be offered to the genial, gentle Haydn, and the spontaneous and buoyant Schubert, than this restless, passionate, turbulent "Faust" of Wagner! The style of the three composers is so opposed that neither appeared to the best advantage by the arrangement. The Haydn symphony is one of the most familiar. It was not played quite as well as the one from the same pen heard last year. But the beauty and the power of Schubert's gloriously long and greatest work were felt at their utmost. Especially in the first and closing movements did the genius of the man stand out anew under the glowing reading Mr. Nikisch gave. Imbued with the loveliest color, nothing that the orchestra has done more clearly demonstrated the art of individual players and groups of players; the first horn and the oboe and flute are deserving particular compliments. The next programme is a truly modern one, containing works by three living composers, and one by the man whose works can never die. It is Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the soloist.

SUNDAY "POPS."

Miss Manola and the Salem Cadet Band at Music Hall.

The second concert in the course of Sunday Music Hall Populars occurred last night to the eminent satisfaction of a large audience. The stars of the evening were Sig. Campanari, who is too well known here to need mention, and Miss Marion Manola, the ex-comic opera singer.

The numbers offered by the Salem Cadet Band were well received, as were also Miss Manola's "Ave Maria," and the 'cello solo, "La Fille du Regement," by Mr. Schultz.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of Saturday evening leaves undisturbed the comfortable assurance in which we have become accustomed to rest that excellence of performance on the part of this noble orchestra, fired and guided by so thoroughly musical and able a conductor, may be taken for granted, leaving for criticism only the programmes, the matter rather than the manner of interpretation. The programme this time, like that of the opening concert, was a trefoil—a strange one, the three leaves being:

Haydn—Symphony in D major (No. 2, Breitkopf & Härtel edition).
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Schubert—Symphony in C major.

It was a happy thought to bring together these two symphonies. It was far from a happy thought to separate them, to cross the current of affinity between them by the huge dissonance of a Wagnerian conception or perversion of Goethe's "Faust." The two symphonies stood for the first spring promise and the ripest manhood of the great Vienna cradle and school of the symphonic art. Father Haydn, whom they call so "childlike" in his music, as in his life, was indeed the father of the symphony, and enriched the world with its first models in their fair completeness. Fair and enlivening they were, fresh, sweet messengers preaching the gospel of beauty through tones. If they were simple compared with more modern elaborations; if their conceptions were naive, cheerful, natural, innocent, rather than profound or grand; if the orchestra was small, the instruments comparatively few in kind, yet they were put together to the best advantage, the intertwining polyphony was perfect, gracefully and easily employed as if it were a second nature with him, or rather the first nature, the natural, spontaneous, unconscious language of his soul; and all so genuine, so real and sincere, so from the heart. Thence came the themes; and what consummate, subtle wisdom in the development and form! On Haydn followed Mozart, in a richer vein, of higher poetic genius. In Beethoven this great form of instrumental creation reached the climax of development. Schubert, in this posthumous chef-d'dœuvre, of which Schumann was the delighted discoverer while ransacking his disorderly heaps of manuscript in Vienna, and who to his other glowing words of admiration added the much-quoted phrase, "And then its heavenly length," stood on the same high table-land, or scarcely down the hither slope of it; for, of all symphonies composed since Beethoven, this is the one which best bears comparison in originality, inspiration, nobility, copiousness of musical ideas, beauty and triumphant unity and persistency of purpose. It is almost superhuman in its energy; it is feminine in its sweet and lovely moods. Great genius always combines the masculine and feminine elements in itself. Is it not true of Shakspeare and of Goethe, of Homer and of Dante?

There was a still more special propriety in beginning with Haydn and ending with Schubert at his greatest. Schubert's earlier symphonies, slight in comparison with the great one in C, are strikingly in the style of Haydn; he seems to have been the model, it may have been unconsciously. You seem to be listening to Haydn when you hear one of them. So Mr. Nikisch gave us a pleasant opportunity to compare the slender sapling and the robust, rugged, full-grown oak. No two works could be more unlike, nor more in the same strain of true blood relationship. Schubert, as symphonist, began at the beginning, began with Haydn, went back, as it were, and lovingly grew up with him until he reached the crowning height, the wide, o'ershadowing majesty of this stupendous work.

It was undoubtedly the Schubert Symphony that went home with the audience as they left the hall. "A Faust Overture" might, did excite the most hand-clapping applause; the real great things are seldom stunningly applauded; they speak to heart and soul, and these seldom think, unless upon some outward prompting or disturbing sense of duty, of lifting hands. If the Faust overture was an incongruous monstrous nightmare in the way, Schubert could bear it, holding all his own in spite of it. Haydn after it might have suffered. He was well placed before; nothing to browbeat his innocent simplicity, nothing to put out his light.

It is indeed a wondrous symphony. The unfailing promise of every opening strain, in richer measure than you dared to dream; the way that it keeps faith with you to the very end of the four great movements; the fervor, the irresistible impulse of its never-flagging and majestic onsweep; the ruggedness of its bold outline ever melting into beauty; its superb euphony and exquisite play of color, never forced or coldly calculated, but gushing as naturally as springs from the rocks; the heroic, rousing tones of trumpets and trombones and distant mellow horns; the intimate, confiding, loving conversations of flutes, oboes and clarinets, with the trusty, friendly counsel of bassoons; the fine electricity of the violins penetrating and vivifying the whole mass, or breathing body, rather, of the organic whole; the startling and delicious surprises, beauties springing up like wildflowers; the charming episodes, which never interrupt, but only swell and enrich the volume of the steady, mighty flood which sweeps on to the end: the glory and excitement of the whole thing are food for thought and feeling for a long time after every hearing. Witching moments of it steal back and haunt your mind repeatedly: the theme of the andante as first sung by the oboe; the even lovelier melody of the celli obbligati, followed in the major by the running passage of the middle strings; in the scherzo those six bars in A-flat minor (said to have been an after-thought, an interpolation of Schubert), followed immediately by exactly the same passage set a half-tone higher, then, dinest moment of the whole, the trio, opening to the clear sky of A major, with such an ted, inspiring and uplifting movement; and h more equally sure to come thronging back, equally worthy of notice; but as if climax could yet be out-climaxed, the titanic impetus and splendor, the breathless momentum yet perfect strength and poise of the finale, with the reiterated heavy thunder strokes in the basses near the end—does it not make you feel as if you had been carried safely over Niagara? Or, to use a homelier figure, do you not feel that sense of astonishment, of healthy glow and triumph with which they say one finds himself safe landed at the bottom of a steep toboggan slide?

D major appears to have been a favorite key with Haydn. Four of the twelve symphonies which he composed for Salomon's London concerts, the most important dozen, and most frequently performed, of his more than a hundred works in this form, are in this key. The one selected, the second of the twelve as published by Breitkopf and Härtel, is perhaps the best, certainly one of the largest, employing both clarinets and oboes, two horns, instead of the modern four, and no trombones, nor any of the monster instruments of brass, underpinning each kind with a contrabass of its own family; hence the portentous bass tubas, contrafagottos, etc., which swell the Berlioz and Wagner orchestra. We hardly think that Haydn and Mozart ever felt the need of such; they could make good music without them. This symphony has a grand adagio introduction in D minor; the allegro steals in softly in the major, a charming, graceful, cheerful strain, with pleasing secondary themes and modifications of the first cunningly, yet naturally, worked up into a consistent, interesting whole. The andante is lovely, flowering into graceful triplets as it unfolds its musing theme. The minuet is bolder, and the trio, with its smoothly running passage of oboes and bassoons as well as violins, afterwards staccato, is very captivating. The finale, allegro spiritoso, is in no way disappointing. Mr. Nikisch's handling of a Haydn symphony, however much he may disturb some orthodox preconceived notions of the way in which certain passages or phrases in Beethoven or Schumann ought to go, always wins unanimous applause. He seems to take to it by nature; and is it not greatly to his credit? So heartily at home there, so cognate at the root, what may he not build up as he develops with experience!

As to the dragon that lay for us on the road between those two symphonies, let us frankly say, The time was when on a first hearing of "A Faust Overture" we o'erwillingly and credulously yielded to the claims of its admirers. As we heard it again and again we felt surprised and rebuked that we could even have begun to take into our musical sympathies anything so outré and pretentious. As a musical reproduction of Goethe's Faust it had a human, deep and noble subject. It is now understood to have been intended as the first movement, or first act, of a Faust symphony in several parts. This part was to express the restless yearning and dissatisfaction which underlies the whole experience of an aspiring, earnest, deep, inquiring soul; the vanity of all intellectual as well as all outward acquirements; the "divine discontent" of one so learned and so wise and capable, so full of genius, as Goethe makes his Faust appear in the opening scene in his laboratory. But the "divine discontent" which vents itself in the loud, coarse groans and colic agonies, the floundering, deep-bass bloated harmonies of this overture, seems mainly physical, not fine or intellectual at all. It is a muscular and not a moral struggle which the instruments are waging. It is not poetry, but melodrama of the kind to please the groundlings. It is grandiloquently empty. It seems less like Goethe's "Faust" than like the monster "Polyphemus"—floundering, bellowing, raging in the darkness of his cavern, with his one eye put out in crafty self-defence by Ulysses and his crew, whom he intended to devour. That image suggested itself to us once in listening to the work, and no subsequent elucidation of the music has chased the image from our mind. Why not the line of Virgil: "Monstrum, horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum" (monster horrid, misformed, huge, bereft of light, i, e., with eye put out) for a motto to "A Polyphemus Overture," instead of Goethe's lines prefixed to this strange, would-be musical exhibition of the unhappiness of Faust? To be sure, there are a few measures of sweeter and more feminine suggestiveness at the conclusion. But Polyphemus also had his Margaret, that is to say, his Galatea. Instead of barring the transition from the simpler to the grander symphony by such a huge abortion, how much more welcome and more wholesome would have been a bridge more gentle and more graceful, and quite unpartisan, like a good aria, or a repetition of that Bach concerto for two violins, which hundreds would be glad to hear again! J. S. D.

The programme for the fourth concert to be given next Saturday night, is as follows: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark; pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moskowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

A well-advertised soprano, a popular baritone and a capital band were the attractions that served to draw a large audience to Music Hall last evening at the second of the course of popular concerts, for which the following programme was prepared:

Overture, "Bohemian Girl".....Balfe
Clarinet solo.
Ballad for soprano, "Douglas Green".....Keller
Moment Musical.....Schubert
Oriental Patrol.....Asch
Romance for baritone, "Lituaniby".....Ponchielli
Waltz, "L'Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia for 'cello, theme from "La Fille du Regiment".....Servais
Air for Soprano, "Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
Chilian Dance, "Manana".....Missud
Song for soprano, "'T is Eventide".....Chassaigne
Aria for baritone, "Largo il factotum".....Rossini
Selections, "The Gondoliers".....Sullivan

Mr. N. R. Amelotte, clarinet; Miss Marion Manola, soprano; Mr. G. Campanari, baritone; Mr. L. Schultz, violoncello; Mr. L. Keach, accompanist.

The gems of the evening were the violoncello solo by Mr. Schultz and the two selections by Mr. Campanari, who well deserved the hearty recalls which he received. Miss Manola's voice and style are familiar to Bostonians. Her selections greatly pleased the audience last evening, her greatest success being the "Ave Maria," which was sung with piano, organ and 'cello accompaniment. The playing of the Salem Cadet Band is always pleasing, and their execution of the "Oriental Patrol" and the "Chilian Dance" was particularly good.

MORE AIR IN MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: May I use your columns for the purpose of voicing a grievance shared in by all who frequent the Music Hall? I refer to the absolute lack o fresh air. In the days when gas was used several of the windows were open of necessity at each concert; but since oxygen is no longer needed for the gas, the management seem to think the audience can exist without it, for they do all in their power to shut it out. Since the introduction of electric light and the practice of using lights for the Symphony Rehearsals, the curtains to the windows are drawn and the windows tightly closed. Usually two or three of the little transoms on the floor are open, but often they are shut, and at no time is there any place for the escape of bad air save through the ventilator in the roof, which are entirely inadequate. If ventilation in the Music Hall necessitates draughts, let us have the draughts; but I do not think it does. In old times the trouble was not as bad as at present. But better one here and there who suffers from draughts than that all in the crowded audience should suffer from the insidious but equally real effects of foul air

PUBLIC POLICY.

Evening Journal.

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 28, 1890.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The enterprise of the management of the Y. M. C. A. in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Bedford is deserving of the highest commendation. It speaks ill for the love of the highest art among us that there were a good many vacant seats in the house. Such a performance is in every way a feast and seats for it should have been at a premium. When the orchestra makes its second visit, in March, it is to be hoped they will be greeted by a much larger house.

The people of New Bedford owe last night's entertainment and many others to the untiring energy and enterprise of Secretary Lougee. People often predict failure for Mr. Lougee's schemes, but he always "gets there."

Henry L. Higginson, the financial prop of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has the reputation of being a very modest man. It is said that he positively objects to his name being used in connection with that organization, and the notices gotten out by the manager wherein the financial head is mentioned, generally refer to him simply as "a wealthy gentleman." A story is told of him to the effect that when he arrives late at a symphony concert, he always waits in the corridor for the completion of the number that the orchestra is performing, going to his seat during the intermission between selections. This is considered an evidence of his modesty, but it looks more like a Christian regard for the comfort of others.

SCOTT.

Mr. Comee Pleased with the Journal.

F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, was so well pleased with the cut of Herr Nikisch in yesterday's JOURNAL that he ordered six electrotypes made from it. Mr. Comee is also greatly satisfied with the JOURNAL'S promptness in executing job work. Through a misunderstanding the programmes for last night's concert did not reach the city in time. At 5 55 o'clock he placed an order with the JOURNAL for 1000 programmes, and at 7 15 they were in the Opera House ready for distribution.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1890.

——The sale of subscription tickets for the four concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall—the dates being Tuesday evenings, November 11 December 9, January 13 and February 4—opened last Monday evening.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1890

MUSICAL NOTES.

Miss Pauline Hall, the favorite operatic soprano, will make her only appearance in concert this season at the next Sunday's Music Hall Popular Concert. The Imperial Quartette of mandolin and guitar performers, Baldwin's famous Cadet Band and several other attractions will take part on this occasion.

Pa[illegible]
Date 10-29

Entertainments.

HYPERION THEATER.

The sale of seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra continues active, and in order to secure good locations purchases should be made as soon as possible. The sale is in progress at Steinert's music store.

[30]

MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

History of the Organization Which is to Play Here Tonight.

The Hub's Inactivity in the Matter of Orchestral Music, Mr. Higginson to the Rescue. The Three Conductors Who Have Made the "Symphony" Famous.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra whose performance at the Opera House tonight is looked forward to with so much interest by all music lovers in New Bedford, is one of the greatest organizations of the kind in the world. Its history, like that of the men who have been most closely associated with it, is a most interesting one. It is a record of an uphill struggle, crowned at length with success such as is rarely attained.

To the outside world Boston has the reputation of being the fountainhead of American culture and it is generally understood that all arts and sciences are comfortably provided for within its circumference, while the nine muses are supposed to abide permanently within its walls in the utmost luxury. It must be confessed, however, that orchestral music has not been so tenderly cared for by the Hub as its many beauties deserve, for although the city contains one of the four or five finest orchestras in the world, it has one of its liberal minded and liberal handed citizens to thank for it, and not its own musical demands.

For several years previous to 1881 the Harvard Musical Association attempted to establish an orchestra which should interpret classical music, but it found the path to success an exceedingly thorny one. The Association would raise what money it could by subscription, and arrange its orchestra according to the amount so collected. If it desired to produce a certain musical work that called for 60 musicians, and the treasurer only reported sufficient funds to employ 50 musicians, the music would have to be trimmed to fit the orchestra. The Association was, consequently, unable to retain the same players throughout the season or to command the exclusive services of those who were employed. Owing, therefore, to lack of support by the public, the Association, after a brave fight, quietly expired, and Boston practically had no standing orchestra worthy of the name. Then the man for the occasion appeared on the scene. It is said that this gentleman, through his modesty, strongly objects to being paraded before the public in reference to the noble work he has so successfully carried out, but a sketch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot be written without mentioning his name.

HEER NIKISCH.

Some time during the summer of 1881 a letter appeared in the Boston Transcript over the signature of Henry L. Higginson, in which the writer called attention to the lack of a permanent first-class orchestra in the city, stated his belief that Boston would support such an organization, and announced his intention of giving 24 orchestral concerts of classical music during the following winter. Mr. Georg Henschel, then a resident of Boston, and a musician of world-wide standing, was intrusted with the conductorship, and on Saturday evening, October 22, 1881, the first concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then numbering 60 performers. The prices for season tickets were placed at $12 and $6, according to location, and the prices of single admissions were in the same proportion. The scheme met with popular approval, and this led to a second and subsequent seasons until the Symphony concert became one of the established institutions of Boston. It also became fashionable and has so continued to the dience. There are very few orchestral leaders who could so successfully have formed the nucleus of a perfect orchestra, as did Mr. Henschel.

At the end of the third season Mr. Henschel removed to London, England, and Mr. Higginson obtained the services of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who made his first appearance before a Boston audience at the opening of the season of 1884-5. Mr. Gericke was one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera in Vienna, where he was associated with Richter, the noted conductor, and he is one of the best, if not the best, orchestral drill masters in the world. He, too, proved to be the right man in the right place, for the Boston orchestra had reached a point where it needed the firm discipline and thorough drill which the new leader at once proceeded to enforce. It was during Mr. Gericke's five years' reign at the conductor's desk that the sounding board was built over the stage at Music Hall. This innovation provoked so much discussion that its utility must remain a matter of individual taste, while its lack of grace and beauty can hardly be questioned. Mr. Gericke also provoked considerable criticism by his importation of German musicians to take the place of some of the resident members of the orchestra, which by the way was organized with what would commonly be called an American personnel, although many of the members were of foreign birth and education. Considerable fault was found, also, with the new conductor's conservatism, as shown in the arrangement of his programmes, a certain class of critics charging him with undue partiality towards German composers. In his interpretations he was accused of a lack of warmth and feeling and a disposition to sacrifice breadth and strength to finish and detail. But his most severe critics were forced to acknowledge that the technical work he obtained from the organization was near, very near, perfection. Musical America owes a great obligation to Mr. Gericke, for, although the orchestra is a local organization, the influence of its good work cannot but extend throughout our country. But Mr. Gericke found his labors so arduous that his health began to suffer, and at the end of the season of 1888-89 he returned to Germany.

Again Mr. Higginson demonstrated his possession of that rare faculty—the art of finding the right man. He engaged Mr. Arthur Nikisch to succeed Mr. Gericke, and that gentleman is still acceptably filling the position and will wield the baton at the concert this evening.

When Mr. Higginson engaged Mr. Nikisch the latter was conductor at the Stadt Theatre, Leipsic, Germany. His first appearance in this city was awaited with great interest, as the reputation that preceded him pronounced him one of the finest orchestral leaders in the world. He made his first appearance before a Boston audience at the first concert in the season of 1889-90. He produced a thoroughly favorable impression, the leading musicians of the city unhesitatingly proclaiming his great ability as a leader. The programme critics soon began to complain and to call the new leader's attention to the programmes arranged by Mr. Henschel, but even they were soon compelled to look for faults in other directions, being finally obliged to criticize his manner of standing while at the conductor's desk.

In the matter of programmes Mr. Nikisch has certainly shown a liberal spirit. All good music is considered by him, whether it be German, or Russian, or American, or of any other nationality. He has also shown considerable originality in that respect, one of his concerts last season consisting of three symphonies.

In his readings Mr. Nikisch has been very original, somewhat to the horror of the hardshelled conservatives in his audiences. But his interpretations are full of life, and he thoroughly understands the art of communicating his individuality to his men. In short he possesses the prime requisites of a great conductor.

The symphony orchestra is certainly unexcelled in this country at least. And there is good reason for it. The members belong to this orchestra exclusively and are, therefore, continually under the baton of the same conductor. They know that their positions are permanent, and that is an excellent reason for their desiring to retain them. They are given four private and one public rehearsals a week, and the orchestra fills many out of town engagements, like the present one.

As a proof of the excellence of the organization it may be said that every previous season some changes have been made for the purpose of strengthening it, but this season no chance for improvement could be discovered, so no changes were made. It is now composed of 85 men classified as follows: Sixteen first violins, 14 second violins, 12 violas, 8 'cellos, 8 double basses, 12 wood wind instruments, 10 brass wind instruments, 2 drums, 1 cymbal, 1 harp, 1 triangle. On the tours through the coun-

[illegible] is Mr. T. Adamowski, who is well known as a soloist. Mr. Anton Heckking is at the head of the 'cellists, while Messrs. Mohr, Sautel and Muller are noted performers on the flute, oboe, and first trumpet, respectively.

An instance of the popularity of the concerts is shown in the great demand for seats. The season tickets were formerly sold at the box-office. On one occasion the line of purchasrers began to form five days before the opening of the sale. Of course the purchasers remained in line only by proxy, hiring district telegraph messengers, boys, and members of the great army of the unemployed. Some were furnished with stools or chairs, while the others rested and slept while lying on the pavement, or sitting propped up against the wall of the adjoining building. Two years ago the experiment of selling the seats by auction was tried, and this proved so satisfactory to the patrons that it was permanently adopted. This year every seat in the house was sold for the season in this manner, the highest premium paid being $150, the prices of the tickets being $12 and $7.50, according to location. Speculators buy these tickets in large numbers, and place such a heavy price upon them that music lovers of moderate means are practically debarred from the privilege of attending the concerts. True, they can procure "standing room," but unless they are at the hall early, and are willing to take part in a grand rush at the opening of the doors, this privilege is a source of great discomfort. The public rehearsals on Friday afternoons are fully as well attended as the regular Saturday night concerts. Last season an irregular matinee series of four "Young People's Popular Concerts" was given, which was very successful and will probably be repeated this season if the time of the orchestra will allow.

The programme for the concert this evening is as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian). Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.

Aria from "Herodiade." Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time). Tschaikowsky

Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

a. Prelude—"Lohengrin." } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

With such an orchestra and such a programme the treat in store for New Bedford people this evening cannot fail to be a great one.

Grand Opera House,

NEW BEDFORD.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

Monday Evening, October 27, 1890.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony in A (Italian). . . . . Mendelssohn

Allegro vivace.

Andante con moto.

Con moto moderato.

Saltarello.

Aria from "Herodiade." . . . . Massenet

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time), Tschaikowsky

Song with Piano,

"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

a. Prelude, "Lohengrin," } . . . Wagner

b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

SOLOIST:

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

Journal Press, 88-92 Purchase Street.

Evening Journal.

MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 27, 1890.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

History of the Organization Which is to Play Here Tonight.

The Hub's Inactivity in the Matter of Orchestral Music, Mr. Higginson to the Rescue. The Three Conductors Who Have Made the "Symphony" Famous.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra whose performance at the Opera House tonight is looked forward to with so much interest by all music lovers in New Bedford, is one of the greatest organizations of the kind in the world. Its history, like that of the men who have been most closely associated with it, is a most interesting one. It is a record of an uphill struggle, crowned at length with success such as is rarely attained.

To the outside world Boston has the reputation of being the fountainhead of American culture and it is generally understood that all arts and sciences are comfortably provided for within its circumference, while the nine muses are supposed to abide permanently within its walls in the utmost luxury. It must be confessed, however, that orchestral music has not been so tenderly cared for by the Hub as its many beauties deserve, for although the city contains one of the four or five finest orchestras in the world, it has one of its liberal minded and liberal handed citizens to thank for it, and not its own musical demands.

For several years previous to 1881 the Harvard Musical Association attempted to establish an orchestra which should interpret classical music, but it found the path to success an exceedingly thorng one, The Association would raise what money it could by subscription, and arrange its orchestra according to the amount so collected. If it desired to produce a certain musical work that called for 60 musicians, and the treasurer only reported sufficient funds to employ 50 musicians, the music would have to be trimmed to fit the orchestra. The Association was, consequently, unable to retain the same players throughout the season or to command the exclusive services of those who were employed. Owing, therefore, to lack of support by the public, the Association, after a brave fight, quietly expired, and Boston practically had no standing orchestra worthy of the name. Then the man for the occasion appeared on the scene. It is said that this gentleman, through his modesty, strongly objects to being paraded before the public in reference to the noble work he has so successfully carried out, but a sketch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot be written without mentioning his name.

HEER NIKISCH.

Some time during the summer of 1881 a letter appeared in the Boston Transcript over the signature of Henry L. Higginson, in which the writer called attention to the lack of a permanent first-class orchestra in the city, stated his belief that Boston would support such an organization, and announced his intention of giving 24 orchestral concerts of classical music during the following winter. Mr. Georg Henschel, then a resident of Boston, and a musician of world-wide standing, was intrusted with the conductorship, and on Saturday evening, October 22, 1881, the first concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then numbering 60 performers. The prices for season tickets were placed at $12 and $8, according to location, and the prices of single admissions were in the same proportion. The scheme met with popular approval, and this led to a second and subsequent seasons until the Symphony concert became one of the established institutions of Boston. It also became fashionable and has so continued to the present season—the tenth.

[illegible] season, and was very popular, the selection and arrangement of programmes finding much favor with the audiences. There are very few orchestral leaders who could so successfully have formed the nucleus of a perfect orchestra, as did Mr. Henschel.

At the end of the third season Mr. Henschel removed to London, England, and Mr. Higginson obtained the services of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who made his first appearance before a Boston audience at the opening of the season of 1884-5. Mr. Gericke was one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera in Vienna, where he was associated with Richter, the noted conductor, and he is one of the best, if not the best, orchestral drill masters in the world. He, too, proved to be the right man in the right place, for the Boston orchestra had reached a point where it needed the firm discipline and thorough drill which the new leader at once proceeded to enforce. It was during Mr. Gericke's five years' reign at the conductor's desk that the sounding board was built over the stage at Music Hall. This innovation provoked so much discussion that its utility must remain a matter of individual taste, while its lack of grace and beauty can hardly be questioned. Mr. Gericke also provoked considerable criticism by his importation of German musicians to take the place of some of the resident members of the orchestra, which by the way was organized with what would commonly be called an American personnel, although many of the members were of foreign birth and education. Considerable fault was found, also, with the new conductor's conservatism, as shown in the arrangement of his programmes, a certain class of critics charging him with undue partiality towards German composers. In his interpretations he was accused of a lack of warmth and feeling and a disposition to sacrifice breadth and strength to finish and detail. But his most severe critics were forced to acknowledge that the technical work he obtained from the organization was near, very near, perfection. Musical America owes a great obligation to Mr. Gericke, for, although the orchestra is a local organization, the influence of its good work cannot but extend throughout our country. But Mr. Gericke found his labors so arduous that his health began to suffer, and at the end of the season of 1888-89 he returned to Germany.

Again Mr. Higginson demonstrated his possession of that rare faculty—the art of finding the right man. He engaged Mr. Arthur Nikisch to succeed Mr. Gericke, and that gentleman is still acceptably filling the position and will wield the baton at the concert this evening.

When Mr. Higginson engaged Mr. Nikisch the latter was conductor at the Stadt Theatre, Leipsic, Germany. His first appearance in this city was awaited with great interest, as the reputation that preceded him pronounced him one of the finest orchestral leaders in the world. He made his first appearance before a Boston audience at the first concert in the season of 1889-90. He produced a thoroughly favorable impression, the leading musicians of the city unhesitatingly proclaiming his great ability as a leader. The programme critics soon began to complain and to call the new leader's attention to the programmes arranged by Mr. Henschel, but even they were soon compelled to look for faults in other directions, being finally obliged to criticize his manner of standing while at the conductor's desk.

In the matter of programmes Mr. Nikisch has certainly shown a liberal spirit. All good music is considered by him, whether it be German, or Russian, or American, or of any other nationality. He has also shown considerable originality in that respect, one of his concerts last season consisting of three symphonies.

In his readings Mr. Nikisch has been very original, somewhat to the horror of the hardshelled conservatives in his audiences. But his interpretations are full of life, and he thoroughly understands the art of communicating his individuality to his men. In short he possesses the prime requisites of a great conductor.

The symphony orchestra is certainly unexcelled in this country at least. And there is good reason for it. The members belong to this orchestra exclusively and are, therefore, continually under the baton of the same conductor. They know that their positions are permanent, and that is an excellent reason for their desiring to retain them. They are given four private and one public rehearsals a week, and the orchestra fills many out of town engagements, like the present one.

As a proof of the excellence of the organization it may be said that every previous season some changes have been made for the purpose of strengthening it, but this season no chance for improvement could be discovered, so no changes were made. It is now composed of 85 men classified as follows: Sixteen first violins, 14 second violins, 12 violas, 8 'cellos, 8 double basses, 12 wood wind instruments, 10 brass wind instruments, 2 drums, 1 cymbal, 1 harp, 1 triangle. On the tours through the country 60 to 65 men are taken.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, a violinist of considerable reputation, and among the violinists is Mr. T. Adamowski, who is well known as a soloist. Mr. Anton Heckking is at the head of the 'cellists, while Messrs. Mole, Sautel and Muller are noted performers on the flute, oboe, and first trumpet, respectively.

An instance of the popularity of the concerts is shown in the great demand for seats. The season tickets were formerly sold at the box-office. On one occasion the line of purchasrers began to form five days before the opening of the sale. Of course the purchasers remained in line only by proxy, hiring district telegraph messengers, boys, and members of the great army of the unemployed. Some were furnished with stools or chairs, while the others rested and slept while lying on the pavement, or sitting propped up against the wall of the adjoining building. Two years ago the experiment of selling the seats by auction was tried, and this proved so satisfactory to the patrons that it was permanently adopted. This year every seat in the house was sold for the season in this manner, the highest premium paid being $150, the prices of the tickets being $12 and $7.50, according to location. Speculators buy these tickets in large numbers, and place such a heavy price upon them that music lovers of moderate means are practically debarred from the privilege of attending the concerts. True, they can procure "standing room," but unless they are at the hall early, and are willing to take part in a grand rush at the opening of the doors, this privilege is a source of great discomfort. The public rehearsals on Friday afternoons are fully as well attended as the regular Saturday night concerts. Last season an irregular matinee series of four "Young People's Popular Concerts" was given, which was very successful and will probably be repeated this season if the time of the orchestra will allow.

The programme for the concert this evening is as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian). Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.

Aria from "Herodiade." Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time). Tschaikowsky

Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

a. Prelude—"Lohengrin." } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

With such an orchestra and such a programme the treat in store for New Bedford people this evening cannot fail to be a great one.

Grand Opera House,

NEW BEDFORD.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

Monday Evening, October 27, 1890.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony in A (Italian). . . . . Mendelssohn

Allegro vivace.

Andante con moto.

Con moto moderato.

Saltarello.

Aria from "Herodiade." . . . . Massenet

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time), Tschaikowsky

Song with Piano,

"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

a. Prelude, "Lohengrin." } . . . Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

SOLOIST:

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

Journal Press, 88-92 Purchase Street.

Date 10/28

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Splendid Concert Before a Large Audience.

Of the four or five concerts which the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in this city that of last evening easily stands at the head for genuine interest, not merely for the professional musician, who revels in the technicalities of harmony and orchestration, in much the same spirit that a statistician is fascinated by a big book full of figures, but for those who know nothing of the science of music, and who frankly declare that Gilmore's Band or a minstrel show pleases them better than Herr Nikisch and his players' yet who have souls attuned to the melody of sweet sounds. A fine audience, not indeed filling the Opera House, but still coming near to that desirable proportion, listened with unaffected delight to the rendering of the following programme:

Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn.
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time.).....Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano,
"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice,"
Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude, "Lohengrin." } .....Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

The symphony by Mendelssohn is a fine example of that composer's smooth and flowing manner, and was performed with grace and delicacy which constituted a revelation to the hearers. The contrast is not great in the four movements, but the composition is admirably adapted for the exhibition of subtle and dreamy effects which under the guidance of the skilled conductor were marvellously brought out. This is a symphony which is particularly interesting to the unskilled hearer, while the trained ear finds it filled with the rarest beauties. In marked contrast were the selections from Wagner, full of spirit and fire, very tempests of orchestral effects. The second of the movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor was novel to most of the hearers, and so was especially attractive.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, the soloist, came for the second time before a New Bedford audience. This accomplished lady, who is winning a way to a position among the leading singers of New England, is a vocalist of fine presence, of a well trained voice of good quality, and of a brilliant manner. She received the compliment of a re-call [illegible] each of her selections.

Standard New Bedford M

Date 10/28

The Great Boston Orchestra Delights a New Bedford Audience.

Last evening the first of the Symphony concerts under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association was given in the Opera House, and was largely attended, nearly every seat in the house being filled. Shortly after 8 o'clock the musicians filed in and took their places, followed a short time later by their famous conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who led them with his usual grace and power through the following programme:

Symphony in A (Italian,) Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time,) Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude, "Lohengrin," } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres, }

All the numbers delighted the audience, as [illegible] strains and dulcet chords rose and fell in gentle modulations from the quiet flowing [illegible] passages up to the wild and boisterous [illegible], then returning gradually and smoothly [illegible] they died away in the faintest lingering suggestions of a tone. The four movements in the Italian symphony called forth hearty applause at each interval, perhaps the con moto moderato movement being as much enjoyed as any. The quartet of bassoons and French horns in this part was excellently rendered and is beautifully introduced in the work.

The pizzicato movement in Symphony No. 4 probably pleased the audience more than anything else on the programme. In it not a bow was used, but all the strings were picked. [illegible] playing was manifest, the interpretations of the music being remarkably well worked out. The movement also introduced [illegible] and clarinet solos, and a rich, [illegible] of brass instruments.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" is a beautiful [illegible]. It starts off with soft, fine strains [illegible] and clarinets, after which the [illegible] a long and intricate duet, the tones [illegible] falling in chords of remarkable [illegible]. At the close it works up broader, [illegible] by the other instruments till it [illegible] and bursts of rich harmony. The [illegible] movement of the "Ride of the [illegible] was excellently portrayed, and the [illegible] of the music made the subject [illegible].

[illegible] Walker is always well received [illegible], as in fact she was last [illegible], as her low voice was shown to [illegible] good advantage. Hers, and each [illegible] hearty encore, to which she [illegible] declined to respond.

[illegible] passed off successfully [illegible] a worthy inaugural for the coming [illegible] season, and it is to be hoped the [illegible] will not fall too far below [illegible].

Clipping from Journal
New Bedford
Date 28

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is only at rare intervals that the people of New Bedford have the good fortune to listen to the performance of a first class orchestra in their own city. It is all the more a source of regret that such is the case, as orchestral music is the most powerful means of educating and elevating the musical taste of a community that is known to musical art. The infinite and wonderful effects to be obtained by the grouping and combining of instruments so different in character, give ample opportunity for the expression of the deepest emotions of the human soul and the portrayal of nature in all its varied aspects. Last evening's performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of those rare occasions referred to above, and the memory of it will linger long in the minds of those who were fortunate enough to hear it.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the gifted conductor of this magnificent band of musicians, provided a programme worthy in all respects of the best efforts of his men, and they responded to the task in their best style. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian). Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade." Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, (first time). Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude—"Lohengrin." } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyries. }

The bright, joyous theme with which the symphony opens brings like a flash before the mind's eye the warm, sunny atmosphere of Italy, with its deep blue sky reflected in the lovely lakes and the glorious Mediterranean. Who can doubt that it was these emotions of joy and happiness that called into being this beautiful movement, for Mendelssohn himself has given evidence in his own letters that such is the case. On approaching the Bay of Naples he said: "To me the finest object in nature is and always will be the sea. I love it almost more than the sky."

We were sorry Mr. Nikisch omitted the repeat at the double bar, but soon forgot it in noting the delicate skill with which he managed the orchestra in the development of the movement, making everything very clear and yet so soft, where the theme is tossed about, now to the flute, then the clarinet and again to the strings, in ceaseless play, until the movement gradually works around to the chord of the dominant and the first theme appears again.

The second movement with its plaintive air in the minor, accompanied by the crisp staccato of the double basses, was played with beautiful expression. It is in such movements as this that the artistic playing of individual members of the orchestra shows off to advantage, for however talented a conductor may be, unless he has men who can understand the inner meaning of the music, much of his work goes to waste. The con moto moderato movement also held the audience spellbound. There was a slight jar after the French horn and bassoon quartette, but that was all.

The Saltarello, a Roman dance, was another exhibition of wonderfully clear and rapid execution. The two movements from the Tschaikowsky Symphony were exceedingly interesting. It being the first hearing of the work, and not having seen it, the details are somewhat lost to mind; but it is a work one wishes to hear again and study, as it contains many original and beautiful effects. The first period of the Andantino was given out by the oboe, with pizzicato accompaniment. There were several beautiful melodies for bassoon; some very striking changes of harmony were noticeable, and a fine melody ran through the whole. The Scherzo began with the full string orchestra pizzicato, the wind and brass parts following later in a sort of march style.

The most thrilling performance of the evening was the prelude to "Lohengrin." Although we have heard it again and again, we cannot recall a performance so satisfactory in every respect. Something is generally a shade out of tune where even the slightest flaw is noticeable. There seemed to be nothing of the sort last evening. From the opening chords on the high notes of the violins and flutes, representing the heavenly origin of Lohengrin, all through the gradual entrance of the lower and more worldly instruments, the great current of tone flowed on, increasing in intensity until at last the full body of brass burst forth with an electrifying effect. It was glorious! For once at least the Opera House was filled with the grandeur of music without its being half swallowed up by the stage. The prelude [illegible] in which it was begun. A moment of silence and then a spontaneous burst of applause showed how moved the audience had been.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, who sang an Aria from "Herodiade," a sacred opera by Massenet, with orchestral accompaniment, and also a song with piano accompaniment by Saint-Saens. Mrs. Walker is a well known artist of high standing and evidently gave great satisfaction, being recalled after each number, twice after the last one. She sang with ease and power, although the Opera House must be a hard place to sing in with so large an audience present. It may have been this which made her voice sound a trifle harsh at times, and we were also a little annoyed by too much tremolo, but aside from this she sang true to the pitch, in a broad style and with good taste. The Massenet Aria is richly scored for orchestra, and has many fine effects. It was well played, as also the piano accompaniment to the Saint Saens song.

The concert came to a close with the "Ride of the Walkyries" by Wagner. This wild piece represents the flight of the Walkyries during a tremendous storm at the time Wotan condemns Brunhilde to be deprived of her immortality and put into a charmed sleep surrounded by fire, never to be awakened except by some hero who may break through the flames and rescue her.

The Walkyries, of whom Brunhilde is one, are the daughters of Wotan, and their office is to bear the corpses of warriors to Walhalla, the abode of the gods. The wild cries of these unearthly creatures and the howling of the storm are depicted with startling effect by Wagner, and the orchestra did full justice to the work.

The audience was a large and appreciative one and listened to the entire programme with the closest attention.

ALLEN W. SWAN.

THE REGISTER.
THE NEW HAVEN

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30,

Those interested in the cause of good music should give abundant support to the series of concerts announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given at the Hyperion theater during the coming season. This organization is everywhere recognized as the finest of its kind ever known in this country and in the opinion of competent judges has few equals in Europe. Mr. Nikisch has prepared for his New Haven patrons programs of great attractiveness and the appearance of able solo artists at each concert will add to the interest of the occasions. Season tickets are now on sale at Steinert's music store. The dates of the concerts are November 20, December 8, January 12 and February 23.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has no gift of wisdom in making up of programmes and he does not seem any likelier to acquire it than was his predecessor. Last Saturday night's combination was thoroughly injudicious in its length alone, and no less so in its choice of music. Haydn's gay and genial D-major symphony, well played, in spite of some "impressionist" eccentricities of tempo, occupied about forty minutes at the beginning of the evening, and nearly an hour at the end was devoted to Schubert's great C-major, which, in spite of its exhilarating temper and its splendor of style, yet should be heard when the mind has not already been supplied with the matter for a whole evening's digestion. Between these was placed that long, wandering and labored "Faust" overture of Wagner, which is not worth anything like the pains which its author and Liszt gave to its composition or the admiration which the adorers of Wagner, right or wrong, lavish upon it. If Volkmann's "Richard III." overture is to be criticzed because it begins with harshness, gloom and erratic progress, seemingly formless and void, shall not as much be said of this overture? If Faust, instead of being only an unhappy, unsatisfied philosopher, lamenting the past and vague as to the future, had been steeped in every despairing, hideous woe and subjected to every torment, material and spiritual, these pages might have described him,—not otherwise. They are a kind of luxury in nightmares, as if Wagner had tried to be as horrible and despressing as he could and then had cast about until he found Faust to bear the burden of responsibility for it all. Mr. Nikisch gave the overture the best possible reading, and must have impressed by it sensuously even those who could not accept it as a reasonable tone-pictures of the moods it professes to depict.

For tonight's concert two new works are promised—Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture and Sgambati's pianoforte concerto in G-minor, the latter to be played by Mr. H. G. Tucker. The other selections are old—"The Ride of the Valkyres" and Moszkowski's suite in F.

Boston Post

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 1, 1890

Miss Pauline Hall will sing at the Sunday popular concert to be given tomorrow evening at Music Hall. Attractive selections will be played by the Imperial Quartette (mandolins and guitars), Baldwin's Band and Messrs. Partridge and Daggett.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1890.

[31]

OUR BOSTON BUDGET.

Kneisel Quartette.

This organization still consists of Mr. Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Sverenski, Anton Hekking. The first of their concerts, for this sixth season, was given at Christian Union Hall, October 20. There were three divisions in the program.

There was a first performance, at these concerts, of Svendsen's quartet in A-minor. The Allegro fails to impress itself strongly upon the mind; but thereafter the composition is increasingly beautiful, through the lovely Andantino, and the quaint Scherzando, with its arabesque of cello work and abrupt ending, to the graceful Finale.

The other instrumental piece was Schumann's A-minor Quartet, a second Kneisel performance of its brilliant and independent musical antitheses. Would there could be more such independence!

Between these numbers came Theodore Reichmann, the operatic soloist, in a group of Schumann songs. Though in better voice than at the Symphony Concerts of the week before, he was still discordant in some passages. These were redeemed by sundry outbursts of his resonant baritone, and an encore was demanded; yet we have heard so many better renditions of these German songs as to "feel a longing void, which Reichmann doth not fill." The songs were the Lotos Flower, "Thou art so like a Flower," and Widmung, the second and third titles being curiously transposed in the program.

Despite a rainy night, the hall was filled with nobby citizens. In this hall there is only one drawback to the enjoyment of a concert—its wretched seats, which offer a disagreeable contrast to the comfortable ones in the hall of the Christian Association.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert in Music hall last evening was: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark; pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moszkowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

Surely Conductor Nikisch himself must have felt ill at ease with his selection of this programme which was strangely made up, lugubrious and tiresome. The overture and the concerto were heard for the first time in these concerts and were both very uninteresting. Goldmark's "Prometheus" compares most unfavorably with his Sakuntalla, and the work is totally void of either the great strokes or the refined and tender touches of genius. As for the concerto, it is as some hideous nightmare, and it is as inexplicable that a pianist of Mr. Tucker's intelligence should have made it a serious study as that Mr. Nikisch should have consented to its performance. Mr. Tucker played it admirably, having its many intricate difficulties under perfect control, but even the integrity of his performance was unsuccessful in suggesting anything more meritorious in the work than the superfluous amount of difficulty that it contains. The orchestra was at its best and played magnificently.

Date 10/25 1888

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Splendid Concert Before a Large Audience.

Of the four or five concerts which the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in this city that of last evening easily stands at the head for genuine interest, not merely for the professional musician, who revels in the technicalities of harmony and orchestration, in much the same spirit that a statistician is fascinated by a big book full of figures, but for those who know nothing of the science of music, and who frankly declare that Gilmore's Band or a minstrel show pleases them better than Herr Nikisch and his players' yet who have souls attuned to the melody of sweet sounds. A fine audience, not indeed filling the Opera House, but still coming near to that desirable proportion, listened with unaffected delight to the rendering of the following programme:

Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn.
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time,).....Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano,
"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice,"
Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude, "Lohengrin." } .....Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres. }

The symphony by Mendelssohn is a fine example of that composer's smooth and flowing manner, and was performed with grace and delicacy which constituted a revelation to the hearers. The contrast is not great in the four movements, but the composition is admirably adapted for the exhibition of subtle and dreamy effects which under the guidance of the skilled conductor were marvellously brought out. This is a symphony which is particularly interesting to the unskilled hearer, while the trained ear finds it filled with the rarest beauties. In marked contrast were the selections from Wagner, full of spirit and fire, very tempests of orchestral effects. The second of the movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor was novel to most of the hearers, and so was especially attractive.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, the soloist, came for the second time before a New Bedford audience. This accomplished lady, who is winning a way to a position among the leading singers of New England, is a vocalist of fine presence, of a well trained voice of good quality, and of a brilliant manner. She received the compliment of a re-call after each of her selections.

Standard New Bedford M

Date 10/28

The Great Boston Orchestra Delights a New Bedford Audience.

Last evening the first of the Symphony concerts under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association was given in the Opera House, and was largely attended, nearly every seat in the house being filled. Shortly after 8 o'clock the musicians filed in and took their places, followed a short time later by their famous conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who led them with his usual grace and power through the following programme:

Symphony in A (Italian,) Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, F minor, (first time,) Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude, "Lohengrin," } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyres, }

All the numbers delighted the audience, as the rich strains and dulcet chords rose and fell in gentle modulations from the quiet flowing piano passages up to the wild and boisterous fortes, then returning gradually and smoothly till they died away in the faintest lingering suggestions of a tone. The four movements in the Italian symphony called forth hearty applause at each interval, perhaps the con moto moderato movement being as much enjoyed as any. The quartet of bassoons and French horns in this part was excellently rendered and is beautifully introduced in the work.

The pizzicato movement in Symphony No. 4 probably pleased the audience more than anything else on the programme. In it not a bow was used, but all the strings were picked. Much fine playing was manifest, the interpretations of the music being remarkably well worked out. The movement also introduced several flute and clarinet solos, and a rich, grand chorus of brass instruments.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" is a beautiful production. It starts off with soft, fine strains from the flutes and clarinets, after which the violins play a long and intricate duet, the tones rising and falling in chords of remarkable sweetness. At the close it works up broader, being joined by the other instruments till it bursts in grand bursts of rich harmony. The third, weird movement of the "Ride of the Walkyres" was excellently portrayed, and the descriptiveness of the music made the subject peculiarly obvious.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker is always well received in New Bedford, as in fact she was last evening. Her rich, mellow voice was shown to great advantage in her selections, and each received a hearty encore, to which she however rather unkindly declined to respond.

The entire programme passed off successfully, forming a worthy inaugural for the coming musical season, and it is to be hoped the events which follow will not fall too far below the standard which has now been set.

Clipping from Journal New Bedford Mass

Date 10/28

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is only at rare intervals that the people of New Bedford have the good fortune to listen to the performance of a first class orchestra in their own city. It is all the more a source of regret that such is the case, as orchestral music is the most powerful means of educating and elevating the musical taste of a community that is known to musical art. The infinite and wonderful effects to be obtained by the grouping and combining of instruments so different in character, give ample opportunity for the expression of the deepest emotions of the human soul and the portrayal of nature in all its varied aspects. Last evening's performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of those rare occasions referred to above, and the memory of it will linger long in the minds of those who were fortunate enough to hear it.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the gifted conductor of this magnificent band of musicians, provided a programme worthy in all respects of the best efforts of his men, and they responded to the task in their best style. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian). Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace.
Andante con moto.
Con moto moderato.
Saltarello.
Aria from "Herodiade." Massenet
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, (first time). Tschaikowsky
Song with Piano—"My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice." Saint-Saens
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.
a. Prelude—"Lohengrin." } Wagner
b. Ride of the Walkyries. }

The bright, joyous theme with which the symphony opens brings like a flash before the mind's eye the warm, sunny atmosphere of Italy, with its deep blue sky reflected in the lovely lakes and the glorious Mediterranean. Who can doubt that it was these emotions of joy and happiness that called into being this beautiful movement, for Mendelssohn himself has given evidence in his own letters that such is the case. On approaching the Bay of Naples he said: "To me the finest object in nature is and always will be the sea. I love it almost more than the sky."

We were sorry Mr. Nikisch omitted the repeat at the double bar, but soon forgot it in noting the delicate skill with which he managed the orchestra in the development of the movement, making everything very clear and yet so soft, where the theme is tossed about, now to the flute, then the clarinet and again to the strings, in ceaseless play, until the movement gradually works around to the chord of the dominant and the first theme appears again.

The second movement with its plaintive air in the minor, accompanied by the crisp staccato of the double basses, was played with beautiful expression. It is in such movements as this that the artistic playing of individual members of the orchestra shows off to advantage, for however talented a conductor may be, unless he has men who can understand the inner meaning of the music, much of his work goes to waste. The con moto moderato movement also held the audience spellbound. There was a slight jar after the French horn and bassoon quartette, but that was all.

The Saltarello, a Roman dance, was another exhibition of wonderfully clear and rapid execution. The two movements from the Tschaikowsky Symphony were exceedingly interesting. It being the first hearing of the work, and not having seen it, the details are somewhat lost to mind; but it is a work one wishes to hear again and study, as it contains many original and beautiful effects. The first period of the Andantino was given out by the oboe, with pizzicato accompaniment. There were several beautiful melodies for bassoon; some very striking changes of harmony were noticeable, and a fine melody ran through the whole. The Scherzo began with the full string orchestra pizzicato, the wind and brass parts following later in a sort of march style.

The most thrilling performance of the evening was the prelude to "Lohengrin." Although we have heard it again and again, we cannot recall a performance so satisfactory in every respect. Something is generally a shade out of tune where even the slightest flaw is noticeable. There seemed to be nothing of the sort last evening. From the opening chords on the high notes of the violins and flutes, representing the heavenly origin of Lohengrin, all through the gradual entrance of the lower and more worldly instruments, the great current of tone flowed on, increasing in intensity until at last the full body of brass burst forth with an electrifying effect. It was glorious! For once at least the Opera House was filled with the grandeur of music without its being half swallowed up by the stage. The prelude was completed in the same perfect style in which it was begun. A moment of silence and then a spontaneous burst of applause showed how moved the audience had been.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, who sang an Aria from "Herodiade," a sacred opera by Massenet, with orchestral accompaniment, and also a song with piano accompaniment by Saint-Saens. Mrs. Walker is a well known artist of high standing and evidently gave great satisfaction, being recalled after each number, twice after the last one. She sang with ease and power, although the Opera House must be a hard place to sing in with so large an audience present. It may have been this which made her voice sound a trifle harsh at times, and we were also a little annoyed by too much tremolo, but aside from this she sang true to the pitch, in a broad style and with good taste. The Massenet Aria is richly scored for orchestra, and has many fine effects. It was well played, as also the piano accompaniment to the Saint Saens song.

The concert came to a close with the "Ride of the Walkyries" by Wagner. This wild piece represents the flight of the Walkyries during a tremendous storm at the time Wotan condemns Brunhilde to be deprived of her immortality and put into a charmed sleep surrounded by fire, never to be awakened except by some hero who may break through the flames and rescue her.

The Walkyries, of whom Brunhilde is one, are the daughters of Wotan, and their office is to bear the corpses of warriors to Walhalla, the abode of the gods. The wild cries of these unearthly creatures and the howling of the storm are depicted with startling effect by Wagner, and the orchestra did full justice to the work.

The audience was a large and appreciative one and listened to the entire programme with the closest attention.

ALLEN W. SWAN.

THE REGISTER.
THE NEW HAVEN

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30,

Those interested in the cause of good music should give abundant support to the series of concerts announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given at the Hyperion theater during the coming season. This organization is everywhere recognized as the finest of its kind ever known in this country and in the opinion of competent judges has few equals in Europe. Mr. Nikisch has prepared for his New Haven patrons programs of great attractiveness and the appearance of able solo artists at each concert will add to the interest of the occasions. Season tickets are now on sale at Steinert's music store. The dates of the concerts are November 10, December 8, January 12 and February 23.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has no gift of wisdom in making up of programmes and he does not seem any likelier to acquire it than was his predecessor. Last Saturday night's combination was thoroughly injudicious in its length alone, and no less so in its choice of music. Haydn's gay and genial D-major symphony, well played, in spite of some "impressionist" eccentricities of tempo, occupied about forty minutes at the beginning of the evening, and nearly an hour at the end was devoted to Schubert's great C-major, which, in spite of its exhilarating temper and its splendor of style, yet should be heard when the mind has not already been supplied with the matter for a whole evening's digestion. Between these was placed that long, wandering and labored "Faust" overture of Wagner, which is not worth anything like the pains which its author and Liszt gave to its composition or the admiration which the adorers of Wagner, right or wrong, lavish upon it. If Volkmann's "Richard III." overture is to be criticzed because it begins with harshness, gloom and erratic progress, seemingly formless and void, shall not as much be said of this overture? If Faust, instead of being only an unhappy, unsatisfied philosopher, lamenting the past and vague as to the future, had been steeped in every despairing, hideous woe and subjected to every torment, material and spiritual, these pages might have described him,—not otherwise. They are a kind of luxury in nightmares, as if Wagner had tried to be as horrible and despressing as he could and then had cast about until he found Faust to bear the burden of responsibility for it all. Mr. Nikisch gave the overture the best possible reading, and must have impressed by it sensuously even those who could not accept it as a reasonable tone-picture of the moods it professes to depict.

For tonight's concert two new works are promised—Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture and Sgambati's pianoforte concerto in G-minor, the latter to be played by Mr. H. G. Tucker. The other selections are old—"The Ride of the Valkyres" and Moszkowski's suite in F.

Boston Post

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 1, 1890

Miss Pauline Hall will sing at the Sunday popular concert to be given tomorrow evening at Music Hall. Attractive selections will be played by the Imperial Quartette (mandolins and guitars), Baldwin's Band and Messrs. Partridge and Daggett.

PUBLIC OPINION

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1890.

[31]

OUR BOSTON BUDGET.

Kneisel Quartette.

This organization still consists of Mr. Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Sverenski, Anton Hekking. The first of their concerts, for this sixth season, was given at Christian Union Hall, October 20. There were three divisions in the program.

There was a first performance, at these concerts, of Svendsen's quartet in A-minor. The Allegro fails to impress itself strongly upon the mind; but thereafter the composition is increasingly beautiful, through the lovely Andantino, and the quaint Scherzando, with its arabesque of cello work and abrupt ending, to the graceful Finale.

The other instrumental piece was Schumann's A-minor Quartet, a second Kneisel performance of its brilliant and independent musical antitheses. Would there could be more such independence!

Between these numbers came Theodore Reichmann, the operatic soloist, in a group of Schumann songs. Though in better voice than at the Symphony Concerts of the week before, he was still discordant in some passages. These were redeemed by sundry outbursts of his resonant baritone, and an encore was demanded; yet we have heard so many better renditions of these German songs as to "feel a longing void, which Reichmann doth not fill." The songs were the Lotos Flower, "Thou art so like a Flower," and Widmung, the second and third titles being curiously transposed in the program.

Despite a rainy night, the hall was filled with nobby citizens. In this hall there is only one drawback to the enjoyment of a concert—its wretched seats, which offer a disagreeable contrast to the comfortable ones in the hall of the Christian Association.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert in Music hall last evening was: Overture to "Prometheus," Goldmark; pianoforte concerto, op. 15, Sgambati, Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; suite, F major, Moszkowski; "The Valkyries' Ride," Wagner.

Surely Conductor Nikisch himself must have felt ill at ease with his selection of this programme which was strangely made up, lugubrious and tiresome. The overture and the concerto were heard for the first time in these concerts and were both very uninteresting. Goldmark's "Prometheus" compares most unfavorably with his Sakuntalla, and the work is totally void of either the great strokes or the refined and tender touches of genius. As for the concerto, it is as some hideous nightmare, and it is as inexplicable that a pianist of Mr. Tucker's intelligence should have made it a serious study as that Mr. Nikisch should have consented to its performance. Mr. Tucker played it admirably, having its many intricate difficulties under perfect control, but even the integrity of his performance was unsuccessful in suggesting anything more meritorious in the work than the superfluous amount of difficulty that it contains. The orchestra was at its best and played magnificently.

ON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1890

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The program of last Saturday's Symphony concert at Music Hall was made up of two symphonies and an overture. Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 2 in Breitkopf and Haertel's catalogue), Schubert's great symphony in C and Wagner's "Faust" Overture; and of these works the overture received the heartiest applause. Had the selection from Wagner been the Prelude to "Lohengrin" or "The Ride of the Valkyries" or the Overture to "Tannhaeuser," this applause could be easily explained. But it was the "Faust" overture.

* * * * *

Now the "Faust" overture belongs to the class of music known as program music, and in the correspondence between Wagner and Liszt (in which the latter appears to greater advantage than the former so far as the qualities of a man and a true friend are concerned), Wagner makes many explanations of his intentions in writing the overture. Originally it was to have been the first movement of a symphony, and he calls it a "tone poem" descriptive of "a solitary Faust, longing, despairing, cursing." He afterwards abandoned the idea of the symphony, rewrote the overture and sent it out into the world with these lines of Gœthe as a descriptive tag:

"The God that in my breast is owned
Can deeply stir the inner sources;
The God above my powers enthroned,
He cannot change external forces.
So, by the burden of my days oppressed
Death is desired, and Life a thing unblest."

* * * * *

The coupling of the motto and music induced a celebrated European critic to remark that if all you demanded from a musical composition was that its performance should so affect you mentally and physically that "life was a thing unblest" and death a boon, the "Faust" overture satisfied the most importunate.

* * * * *

What does the hearer care for a composer's intentions, even if they are honorable? What concerns him is the actual music; not what the composer wished to express, but what he wrote. A German singer may have many admirable ideas concerning the proper singing of a song of Schubert. If nature has not given him a voice, if training has not given him the sufficient skill to sing the song and convey his meaning, the hearer does not hear the song, nor are the singer's intentions an apology for the failure. When Wagner wrote music and called it "Faust," as he might have called it "Hamlet" or "Othello," the first question is always, is the music itself good or bad? Is it music, or is it a straining after effect, an assumption of virility which is disguised impotence? For as Fétis wisely said, "music can only exist when the sentiments are moved, and that before any notice is taken of the composer's idea. In hearing a musical work, what has the reality of the object taken by the artist as a theme to do with the question. It is of importance that we are moved and by the simplest means." Where in this overture are traces of originality or beauty in the motives or in the working of them out? It begins with a snoring from a bass-tuba in the agony of a nightmare; and from the very start to the end of the composition, however ingenious certain instrumental combinations may be, is there in the whole work one salient musical idea, one purely musical conception?

* * * * *

And yet the greater part of the audience must have enjoyed it, for it was frenetically applauded. Some cheered before the end of the piece, so anxious were they to make public confession of their faith: an unfortunate occurrence, as it was displeasing to the true disciples of the "Master" who hissed their well meaning brethren. Hereafter to prevent a repetition of such accidents, it might be well for some Wagnerite of authority to sit in a commanding position, say, in the first balcony, where during the performance he might express by Delsartian methods the fitting emotion, and at the end serve as fugleman to the less experienced.

* * * * *

Supposing the "Faust" Overture had been written by an unknown composer, or by an American who was not fortunate enough to live in Boston, how would it have been received? We are all under the sway of great names, and we are too apt to indiscriminately praise all that which has been handed down to us by the mighty dead. And strangest of all, that which is obscure and dull is regarded by idolaters as pregnant with celestial fire. It is unintelligible; therefore, it is great.

* * * * *

To such persons the symphony of Haydn with its charming effects gained by the simplest means (and therein lies the truest art) probably seemed light, if not absolutely trivial. For poor Haydn, as Mozart, was a "music-maker" a class of people held in contempt by the radical Germans of the new dispensation. It is true that a few of them have kindly tried to help him and have found in his music "the personification of modern philosophy, breaking away from the yoke of established religions." Others have tried to show that he wished "to glorify in all his works the democratic Idea." These are brave words, but the lovers of music have been content to take Haydn in the spirit in which he wrote, to regard him as a genius who, to use the language of the Apocrypha, "found out musical tunes."

* * * * *

The symphony played last Saturday was given for the first time the 4th of May, 1795, in the great hall of the Opera at London. It was Haydn's last benefit concert, and the net receipts were 400 pounds. The program is an interesting one as showing the habits of the time; for the Military Symphony given the same evening was divided, the first movement being called the opening overture, the rest of the symphony coming in the second part.

Overture.....Haydn
Song by Sig Rovedino
Oboe concerto.....Ferlendis
Sig. Ferlendis.
Duet by Mad. Morichelli and Sig. Morelli.....Haydn
New Symphony (in D).....Haydn

PART II.

Military Symphony.....Haydn
Song by Mad. Morichelli
Violin Concerto.....Viotti
Mr. Viotti.
Scena nuova.....Haydn
Mad. Banti.
Finale.

* * * * *

It will be seen that even then there was confusion in the titles, Viotti being dubbed "Mr." and Rovedino "Sig." From Haydn's diary we learn that he was not pleased with Mad. Banti; "she sang very scanty." Rovedino was a bass singer who lies buried in a church yard at Chelsea, England. Morelli, an excellent buffo-bass, was for years a favorite; he beggared himself in playing lottery. Ferlendis came from Venice, and Mozart wrote for him a concerto. Morichelli was the most distinguished singer of her time, and in many ways a remarkable woman. "She never allowed herself to be swayed by passion, and although she was very dissolute, her bearing was so modest that she would have been taken for an artless maiden; the more bitter her heart, the more angelic was the smile of her lips." The Bandi or Banti began life as a street singer; she possessed a superb voice and was given to drink; and when she died they cut her body open to see where her powerful voice came from, and they found well developed lungs. Lorenzo da Ponte, who possibly had been slighted by the Banti and Morichelli, says of them: "They were the idols of the public and the terror of composers, poets, singers and directors. Either one would have brought trouble into the theater; imagine the plight of a director who hired the two. It is difficult to say which one was the more dangerous. Equal in vices, passions and knavish tricks, each lacking a heart, they were of diametrically opposite character, and they pursued by different means the same system for advancing their interests." Truly a noble pair of sisters, if the dissolute da Ponte can be believed.

* * * * *

Mr. Nikisch did not enter into the spirit of Haydn and he gave strange readings, or rather perverted passages that he might perhaps gain sensational effects. The music of Haydn does not lend itself to such purposes. Both the andante and finale were exaggerated respectively in slowness and speed; and the menuetto was painfully modernized by tricks played with its simple, straightforward measures. This is the more to be regretted as the playing of the orchestra throughout the evening was worthy of high praise.

* * * * *

The writers upon music who seem unable to receive with pleasure mere musical impressions, and are unhappy unless they find out what the composer meant, have seen in the great symphony of Schubert the likeness of everything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. And they were well represented in the program book of last Saturday. One man of excellent fantasy imagines that the finale illustrates the story of Phaëton and hears in the ending of the movement "the descending thunderbolts of Jove and a tremendous plunge of team, chariot and charioteers into the deep." But this is nothing to the discoveries made by Mr. Ernst Perabo, "in Leipzig, 1863, after a first hearing of the work." In the first movement Mr. Perabo notices the dawn of day and "wakening of all in Nature." In the andante Mr. Perabo hies to the woods and notices a "prevalence of purity" and a consequent "absence of illegitimate sounds"; there are "lakes and gondolas and lovers," and "friends" are performing the difficult feat of "uniting around the opening theme"; there is "a contest for a beautiful girl," there are "sweetly scented paths and adieus"; and all these are in one movement. The finale, according to Mr. Perabo, contains everything, from "sunset guns" to "clouds covering the entire sky," and the curtain falls on the gorgeous transformation scene of the Triumph of the Goddess of Night over Day! Why at this late day should such "bubbly spume," such balderdash written nearly thirty years ago in Mr. Perabo's "salad days, when he lacked judgment" be brought to light? Do such combinations of words enhance the beauty of Schubert's glorious work? Is not the music itself all-sufficient?

* * * * *

The symphony was upon the whole superbly played, the work of the wood-wind being particularly to be commended. It might be asked why Mr. Nikisch began the celebrated horn passage in the andante forte instead of pianissimo as Schubert marked it, and possibly the first allegro was taken a little too fast for the clearness of certain passages, but for several reasons the temptation to hurry the allegros of this symphony is well nigh irresistible. Certain conductors in Germany, men of renown, conduct this work as though it were a colossal bore, and hurry from the very beginning as though impatient for the end. There is no question but that the symphony is too long, and this is true of nearly all of Schubert's instrumental works, for he was never tired of repeating the same phrases; but there are few phrases of others which bear so well a repetition. It would be impertinent to dwell upon the beauties of the work; they are known to all and loved by all; and it would be hard to name a greater symphony written since the death of Beethoven. And yet there is an unearthly charm about the symphony which Schubert left unfinished which is not found in the one in C.

* * * * *

There were Sunday evening concerts at Music Hall and the Boston Theater. At the first named concert, which was well attended, the music was furnished by the Salem Cadet Band, Miss Manola, soprano, Mr. Campanari, baritone, and Mr. Schulz, 'cellist. At the Boston Theater the Philharmonic Orchestra was assisted by Miss Belle Botsford, the violinist, and Mr. George J. Parker, the tenor. Miss Botsford played the Ballade and Polonaise of Vieuxtemps, and she was loudly applauded. This young lady has an agreeable stage presence, and her playing showed the good results of patient study under competent masters, but her intonation was not always correct. Mr. Parker, admirable singer and accomplished musician, sang the well known recitative and aria from Jephtha with unexaggerated dramatic power and feeling.

Mrs. Nikisch attracted much attention at the Conservatory concert Thursday evening, and won enthusiastic praise by her beauty and her cordiality to all. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were given a reception in the parlors after the concert.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, NOV. 3.

STATELY PAULINE THE MAGNET.

Miss Hall Delights Boston Audience at Music Hall.

Stately Pauline Hall, the favorite operatic soprano, formerly leading lady at the New York Casino, and now at the head of an opera company of her own, was the particular attraction for a majority of the large audience of music-loving Bostonians who patronized the third in the series of Music Hall Sunday "pops" last evening.

She gave a charming rendition of two pretty love songs, "Amorita" and "Memory," and was recalled after the second number.

The remainder of a genuinely enjoyable concert programme was contributed by Baldwin's famous Cadet band, the Imperial quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Frank Partridge, cornet soloist and H. C. Daggett, pianist. The mandolin solo by [illegible] was one of the especially pleasing numbers.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in B flat, No. 4. Adagio.—Allegro vivace.— Adagio.—Allegro vivace,— Allegro ma non troppo.
WAGNER.	PRELUDE. "Lohengrin."
SAINT-SAENS.	RONDO CAPRICCIOSO for VIOLIN.
SAINT-SAËNS.	DANSE MACABRE.
MENDELSSOHN.	WEDDING MARCH from "Midsummer-night's Dream."

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 2.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the fourth Symphony concert, in Music Hall, last night, was devoted wholly to modern composers, and consisted of Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," op. 38, given for the first time in Boston; Sgambati's concerto for piano and orchestra, in G minor, op.15, heard for the first time at these concerts; Moskowski's Suite in F, No. 1, op. 39, which, had, if we are not mistaken, its third hearing here on this occasion, and Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries." The Goldmark overture is full of dignity in its general character, has strong dramatic fire, and is gorgeously instrumented. Unfortunately it does not make its meaning clear on a first hearing, and the music does not speak for itself as far as Prometheus is concerned. It is of course understood that the pilferer of Jove's fire is chained to a rock, and that a bird is pecking at his liver; but the music is of the programme sort, and for lack of a guide the hearer is left to his own unaided resources to discover the details of the composer's intention. There are some fine moments of orchestral color, especially in the first movement, where the strings, minus the double basses, and the wind instruments indulge in an outburst that is as thrilling as it is original. The working out portion of the overture is confused, and ear tearing, but the second half of the work is full of passion and brilliancy. The performance by the orchestra was magnificent, throughout. The melodious and daintily artistic Miskowski Suite was exquisitely read and played, the sprightly and fascinating second movement in particular, the wood wind excelling itself by the delicacy and precision of its work. The lovely andante and variations also received masterly treatment. The hideous Walkyrie Ride, with its four bars of common-place repeated to infinity likewise obtained a splendidly colored interpretation, on the whole, perhaps the best it has ever had here. The Sgambati concerto is not a particularly interesting work. It is in the ultra modern style. It is on the whole an orchestral work in to which the piano intrudes now and then with enormous demands upon the technique of the soloist; demands which are quite out of proportion to any effect that can possibly be produced by filling them. When the piano does come in the player, as a rule, has to exert his fullest force in order to be heard. The first movement is full of ugliness, and what it is all about is not easily discovered. It is always reaching out for something or other without ever grasping it. A little burst of melody breaks in suddenly, but before the hearer's surprise is over the composer darts off into the obscure again, as if he were afraid of his own daring. The second movement is better, inasmuch as it is clearer, but its greatest merit is its brevity. The finale, taken altogether, is the best movement. It is brilliant and fairly interesting, and besides is rhythmical and passably natural; probably by reason of its little reminiscences of Chopin and Mendelssohn. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the soloist, and he played the work in a straightforward, industrious and creditable manner, not extracting much meaning from the concerto; but as there is not much meaning in it, he is not to be blamed for that. It must have cost him great trouble to overcome its difficulties, but it is be regretted that he did not expend the labor on a better work; or, perhaps still better, that he did not find its difficulties impossible. He was cordially applauded and recalled. At the next concert will be given Gade's "Ossian" overture, Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman is to be the soloist.

At tonight's "Sunday Popular" in Music Hall, Miss Pauline Hall, the Imperial Quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Mr. F. G. Partridge, the cornet soloist; Mr. H. C. Daggett, the pianist, and Baldwin's Cadet Band will be the attractions in a carefully prepared programme.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth symphony concert, Saturday evening, consisted of an entire programme of modern music, opening with Goldmark's overture "Prometheus Bound," its first performance in Boston. It is rich in coloring and was magnificently rendered, and to this was largely due the applause that followed the rendition. Moszkowski's Suite in F had been heard at these concerts and it was a very agreeable contrast to the opening number by the orchestra, and the closing number, the celebrated "Ride of the Walkueries," by Wagner, probably afforded the greatest enjoyment of all, despite the clanging of the brass instruments, which are allowed full play under Mr. Nikisch in the Wagner selections.

The piano soloist, Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, gave a selection by Sgambati, whose name, we are informed by the notes, appeared Saturday night for the first time on the programme. His concerto in G minor had its first introduction in Boston at one of the concerts of B. J. Lang last winter, and is heavily scored for orchestra with very brilliant portions arranged for the solo instrument. The rendition calls for a good technique, and an equal command over the piano. For the interpretation along these lines Mr. Tucker is entitled to much commendation, and the second movement, which was the briefest, was the best enjoyed. The entire ensemble was excellent throughout. The concert was too long—the piano concerto being nearly the entire length of a symphony, and the Moszkowski suite as well. To this the addition of two other numbers was an error. There were more vacant seats and fewer standers Saturday night than have been noticed for some time. At the next concert Mrs. Walter C. Wyman of Chicago is to be the soloist, and the symphony the Scotch of Mendelssohn.

[32]

ON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1890

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The program of last Saturday's Symphony concert at Music Hall was made up of two symphonies and an overture. Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 2 in Breitkopf and Haertel's catalogue), Schubert's great symphony in C and Wagner's "Faust" Overture; and of these works the overture received the heartiest applause. Had the selection from Wagner been the Prelude to "Lohengrin" or "The Ride of the Valkyries" or the Overture to "Tannhaeuser," this applause could be easily explained. But it was the "Faust" overture.

* * * * *

Now the "Faust" overture belongs to the class of music known as program music, and in the correspondence between Wagner and Liszt (in which the latter appears to greater advantage than the former so far as the qualities of a man and a true friend are concerned), Wagner makes many explanations of his intentions in writing the overture. Originally it was to have been the first movement of a symphony, and he calls it a "tone poem" descriptive of "a solitary Faust, longing, despairing, cursing." He afterwards abandoned the idea of the symphony, rewrote the overture and sent it out into the world with these lines of Gœthe as a descriptive tag:

"The God that in my breast is owned
Can deeply stir the inner sources;
The God above my powers enthroned,
He cannot change external forces.
So, by the burden of my days oppressed
Death is desired, and Life a thing unblest."

* * * * *

The coupling of the motto and music induced a celebrated European critic to remark that if all you demanded from a musical composition was that its performance should so affect you mentally and physically that "life was a thing unblest" and death a boon, the "Faust" overture satisfied the most importunate.

* * * * *

What does the hearer care for a composer's intentions, even if they are honorable? What concerns him is the actual music; not what the composer wished to express, but what he wrote. A German singer may have many admirable ideas concerning the proper singing of a song of Schubert. If nature has not given him a voice, if training has not given him the sufficient skill to sing the song and convey his meaning, the hearer does not hear the song, nor are the singer's intentions an apology for the failure. When Wagner wrote music and called it "Faust," as he might have called it "Hamlet" or "Othello," the first question is always, is the music itself good or bad? Is it music, or is it a straining after effect, an assumption of virility which is disguised impotence? For as Fétis wisely said, "music can only exist when the sentiments are moved, and that before any notice is taken of the composer's idea. In hearing a musical work, what has the reality of the object taken by the artist as a theme to do with the question. It is of importance that we are moved and by the simplest means." Where in this overture are traces of originality or beauty in the motives or in the working of them out? It begins with a snoring from a bass-tuba in the agony of a nightmare; and from the very start to the end of the composition, however ingenious certain instrumental combinations may be, is there in the whole work one salient musical idea, one purely musical conception?

* * * * *

And yet the greater part of the audience must have enjoyed it, for it was frenetically applauded. Some cheered before the end of the piece, so anxious were they to make public confession of their faith: an unfortunate occurrence, as it was displeasing to the true disciples of the "Master" who hissed their well meaning brethren. Hereafter to prevent a repetition of such accidents, it might be well for some Wagnerite of authority to sit in a commanding position, say, in the first balcony, where during the performance he might express by Delsartian methods the fitting emotion, and at the end serve as fugleman to the less experienced.

* * * * *

Supposing the "Faust" Overture had been written by an unknown composer, or by an American who was not fortunate enough to live in Boston, how would it have been received? We are all under the sway of great names, and we are too apt to indiscriminately praise all that which has been handed down to us by the mighty dead. And strangest of all, that which is obscure and dull is regarded by idolaters as pregnant with celestial fire. It is unintelligible; therefore, it is great.

* * * * *

To such persons the symphony of Haydn with its charming effects gained by the simplest means (and therein lies the truest art) probably seemed light, if not absolutely trivial. For poor Haydn, as Mozart, was a "music-maker" a class of people held in contempt by the radical Germans of the new dispensation. It is true that a few of them have kindly tried to help him and have found in his music "the personification of modern philosophy, breaking away from the yoke of established religions." Others have tried to show that he wished "to glorify in all his works the democratic Idea." These are brave words, but the lovers of music have been content to take Haydn in the spirit in which he wrote, to regard him as a genius who, to use the language of the Apocrypha, "found out musical tunes."

* * * * *

The symphony played last Saturday was given for the first time the 4th of May, 1795, in the great hall of the Opera at London. It was Haydn's last benefit concert, and the net receipts were 400 pounds. The program is an interesting one as showing the habits of the time; for the Military Symphony given the same evening was divided, the first movement being called the opening overture, the rest of the symphony coming in the second part.

Overture.....Haydn
Song by Sig Rovedino
Oboe concerto.....Ferlendis
Sig. Ferlendis.
Duet by Mad. Morichelli and Sig. Morelli.....Haydn
New Symphony (in D).....Haydn

PART II.

Military Symphony.....Haydn
Song by Mad. Morichelli
Violin Concerto.....Viotti
Mr. Viotti.
Scena nuova.....Haydn
Mad. Banti.
Finale.

* * * * *

It will be seen that even then there was confusion in the titles, Viotti being dubbed "Mr." and Rovedino "Sig." From Haydn's diary we learn that he was not pleased with Mad. Banti; "she sang very scanty." Rovedino was a bass singer who lies buried in a church yard at Chelsea, England. Morelli, an excellent buffo-bass, was for years a favorite; he beggared himself in playing lottery. Ferlendis came from Venice, and Mozart wrote for him a concerto. Morichelli was the most distinguished singer of her time, and in many ways a remarkable woman. "She never allowed herself to be swayed by passion, and although she was very dissolute, her bearing was so modest that she would have been taken for an artless maiden; the more bitter her heart, the more angelic was the smile of her lips." The Bandi or Banti began life as a street singer; she possessed a superb voice and was given to drink; and when she died they cut her body open to see where her powerful voice came from, and they found well developed lungs. Lorenzo da Ponte, who possibly had been slighted by the Banti and Morichelli, says of them: "They were the idols of the public and the terror of composers, poets, singers and directors. Either one would have brought trouble into the theater; imagine the plight of a director who hired the two. It is difficult to say which one was the more dangerous. Equal in vices, passions and knavish tricks, each lacking a heart, they were of diametrically opposite character, and they pursued by different means the same system for advancing their interests." Truly a noble pair of sisters, if the dissolute da Ponte can be believed.

* * * * *

Mr. Nikisch did not enter into the spirit of Haydn and he gave strange readings, or rather perverted passages that he might perhaps gain sensational effects. The music of Haydn does not lend itself to such purposes. Both the andante and finale were exaggerated respectively in slowness and speed; and the menuetto was painfully modernized by tricks played with its simple, straightforward measures. This is the more to be regretted as the playing of the orchestra throughout the evening was worthy of high praise.

* * * * *

The writers upon music who seem unable to receive with pleasure mere musical impressions, and are unhappy unless they find out what the composer meant, have seen in the great symphony of Schubert the likeness of everything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. And they were well represented in the program book of last Saturday. One man of excellent fantasy imagines that the finale illustrates the story of Phaëton and hears in the ending of the movement "the descending thunderbolts of Jove and a tremendous plunge of team, chariot and charioteers into the deep." But this is nothing to the discoveries made by Mr. Ernst Perabo, "in Leipzig, 1863, after a first hearing of the work." In the first movement Mr. Perabo notices the dawn of day and "wakening of all in Nature." In the andante Mr. Perabo hies to the woods and notices a "prevalence of purity" and a consequent "absence of illegitimate sounds"; there are "lakes and gondolas and lovers," and "friends" are performing the difficult feat of "uniting around the opening theme"; there is "a contest for a beautiful girl," there are "sweetly scented paths and adieus"; and all these are in one movement. The finale, according to Mr. Perabo, contains everything, from "sunset guns" to "clouds covering the entire sky," and the curtain falls on the gorgeous transformation scene of the Triumph of the Goddess of Night over Day! Why at this late day should such "bubbly spume," such balderdash written nearly thirty years ago in Mr. Perabo's "salad days, when he lacked judgment" be brought to light? Do such combinations of words enhance the beauty of Schubert's glorious work? Is not the music itself all-sufficient?

* * * * *

The symphony was upon the whole superbly played, the work of the wood-wind being particularly to be commended. It might be asked why Mr. Nikisch began the celebrated horn passage in the andante forte instead of pianissimo as Schubert marked it, and possibly the first allegro was taken a little too fast for the clearness of certain passages, but for several reasons the temptation to hurry the allegros of this symphony is well nigh irresistible. Certain conductors in Germany, men of renown, conduct this work as though it were a colossal bore, and hurry from the very beginning as though impatient for the end. There is no question but that the symphony is too long, and this is true of nearly all of Schubert's instrumental works, for he was never tired of repeating the same phrases; but there are few phrases of others which bear so well a repetition. It would be impertinent to dwell upon the beauties of the work; they are known to all and loved by all; and it would be hard to name a greater symphony written since the death of Beethoven. And yet there is an unearthly charm about the symphony which Schubert left unfinished which is not found in the one in C.

* * * * *

There were Sunday evening concerts at Music Hall and the Boston Theater. At the first named concert, which was well attended, the music was furnished by the Salem Cadet Band, Miss Manola, soprano, Mr. Campanari, baritone, and Mr. Schulz, 'cellist. At the Boston Theater the Philharmonic Orchestra was assisted by Miss Belle Botsford, the violinist, and Mr. George J. Parker, the tenor. Miss Botsford played the Ballade and Polonaise of Vieuxtemps, and she was loudly applauded. This young lady has an agreeable stage presence, and her playing showed the good results of patient study under competent masters, but her intonation was not always correct. Mr. Parker, admirable singer and accomplished musician, sang the well known recitative and aria from Jephtha with unexaggerated dramatic power and feeling.

Mrs. Nikisch attracted much attention at the Conservatory concert Thursday evening, and won enthusiastic praise by her beauty and her cordiality to all. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were given a reception in the parlors after the concert.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, NOV. 3.

STATELY PAULINE THE MAGNET.

Miss Hall Delights Boston Audience at Music Hall.

Stately Pauline Hall, the favorite operatic soprano, formerly leading lady at the New York Casino, and now at the head of an opera company of her own, was the particular attraction for a majority of the large audience of music-loving Bostonians who patronized the third in the series of Music Hall Sunday "pops" last evening.

She gave a charming rendition of two pretty love songs, "Amorita" and "Memory," and was recalled after the second number.

The remainder of a genuinely enjoyable concert programme was contributed by Baldwin's famous Cadet band, the Imperial quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Frank Partridge, cornet soloist, and H. C. Daggett, pianist. The mondolin solo by Sig. Carciotta was one of the especially pleasing numbers.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in B flat, No. 4. Adagio.—Allegro vivace.— Adagio.—Allegro vivace,— Allegro ma non troppo.
WAGNER.	PRELUDE. "Lohengrin."
SAINT-SAENS.	RONDO CAPRICCIOSO for VIOLIN.
SAINT-SAENS.	DANSE MACABRE.
MENDELSSOHN.	WEDDING MARCH from "Midsummer-night's Dream."

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 2.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the fourth Symphony concert, in Music Hall, last night, was devoted wholly to modern composers, and consisted of Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," op. 38, given for the first time in Boston; Sgambati's concerto for piano and orchestra, in G minor, op.15, heard for the first time at these concerts; Moskowski's Suite in F, No. 1, op. 39, which, had, if we are not mistaken, its third hearing here on this occasion, and Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries." The Goldmark overture is full of dignity in its general character, has strong dramatic fire, and is gorgeously instrumented. Unfortunately it does not make its meaning clear on a first hearing, and the music does not speak for itself as far as Prometheus is concerned. It is of course understood that the pilferer of Jove's fire is chained to a rock, and that a bird is pecking at his liver; but the music is of the programme sort, and for lack of a guide the hearer is left to his own unaided resources to discover the details of the composer's intention. There are some fine moments of orchestral color, especially in the first movement, where the strings, minus the double basses, and the wind instruments indulge in an outburst that is as thrilling as it is original. The working out portion of the overture is confused, and ear tearing, but the second half of the work is full of passion and brilliancy. The performance by the orchestra was magnificent, throughout. The melodious and daintily artistic Miskowski Suite was exquisitely read and played, the sprightly and fascinating second movement in particular, the wood wind excelling itself by the delicacy and precision of its work. The lovely andante and variations also received masterly treatment. The hideous Walkyrie Ride, with its four bars of common-place repeated to infinity likewise obtained a splendidly colored interpretation, on the whole, perhaps the best it has ever had here. The Sgambati concerto is not a particularly interesting work. It is in the ultra modern style. It is on the whole an orchestral work into which the piano intrudes now and then with enormous demands upon the technique of the soloist; demands which are quite out of proportion to any effect that can possibly be produced by filling them. When the piano does come in the player, as a rule, has to exert his fullest force in order to be heard. The first movement is full of ugliness, and what it is all about is not easily discovered. It is always reaching out for something or other without ever grasping it. A little burst of melody breaks in suddenly, but before the hearer's surprise is over the composer darts off into the obscure again, as if he were afraid of his own daring. The second movement is better, inasmuch as it is clearer, but its greatest merit is its brevity. The finale, taken altogether, is the best movement. It is brilliant and fairly interesting, and besides is rhythmical and passably natural; probably by reason of its little reminiscences of Chopin and Mendelssohn. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the soloist, and he played the work in a straightforward, industrious and creditable manner, not extracting much meaning from the concerto; but as there is not much meaning in it, he is not to be blamed for that. It must have cost him great trouble to overcome its difficulties, but it is be regretted that he did not expend the labor on a better work; or, perhaps still better, that he did not find its difficulties impossible. He was cordially applauded and recalled. At the next concert will be given Gade's "Ossian" overture, Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman is to be the soloist.

At tonight's "Sunday Popular" in Music Hall, Miss Pauline Hall, the Imperial Quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Mr. F. G. Partridge, the cornet soloist; Mr. H. C. Daggett, the pianist, and Baldwin's Cadet Band will be the attractions in a carefully prepared programme.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth symphony concert, Saturday evening, consisted of an entire programme of modern music, opening with Goldmark's overture "Prometheus Bound," its first performance in Boston. It is rich in coloring and was magnificently rendered, and to this was largely due the applause that followed the rendition. Moszkowski's Suite in F had been heard at these concerts and it was a very agreeable contrast to the opening number by the orchestra, and the closing number, the celebrated "Ride of the Walkuerios," by Wagner, probably afforded the greatest enjoyment of all, despite the clanging of the brass instruments, which are allowed full play under Mr. Nikisch in the Wagner selections.

The piano soloist, Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, gave a selection by Sgambati, whose name, we are informed by the notes, appeared Saturday night for the first time on the programme. His concerto in G minor had its first introduction in Boston at one of the concerts of B. J. Lang last winter, and is heavily scored for orchestra with very brilliant portions arranged for the solo instrument. The rendition calls for a good technique, and an equal command over the piano. For the interpretation along these lines Mr. Tucker is entitled to much commendation, and the second movement, which was the briefest, was the best enjoyed. The entire ensemble was excellent throughout. The concert was too long—the piano concerto being nearly the entire length of a symphony, and the Moszkowski suite as well. To this the addition of two other numbers was an error. There were more vacant seats and fewer standers Saturday night than have been noticed for some time. At the next concert Mrs. Walter O. Wyman of Chicago is to be the soloist, and the symphony the Scotch of Mendelssohn.

[32]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth Symphony concert last evening commenced with an overture to "Prometheus Bound," in C minor, opus 38, by Goldmark, it being the first performance of this work in Boston. The composer, confessing himself influenced by the play of Æschylus, has produced an overture that contrasts strongly with his gorgeous "Sakuntala," although its more pathetic and less stormy character is, in its way, perhaps fully as interesting; while it is much less conventional, if not so suggestive as the one entitled "Spring." It opens with the slow movement customarily used as an introduction to works of this class. Above the deep tones of the double basses and the roll of the tympni, a mournful figure is given out by the 'cellos, pianissimo, which, after rising through the different instruments to the flutes, is suddenly interrupted by a fortissimo passage of strongly marked chords. This continues for some measures, being followed by a decrescendo that leads to a sorrowfully expressive theme, upon which the rest of the introduction is based. It is brought to a close by a fortissimo chord, and then the allegro enters with a fiery subject which is effectively elaborated, and embellished with other figures, one in scale form being especially noticeable. The second theme, also first heard in the wood-wind, then taken up by the strings, is pathetically charming, appearing in G major, and soon modulating into B flat major. A long working-out at last terminates in a furious chromatic run which re-introduces the first subject scored for the full strength of the orchestra. Afterwards much of the previous matter is used again, the second theme reappearing in C major, E flat and G flat. More elaboration follows, and then a grand access of fury, so to say, brings about a change of the tempo to presto, which commences piano and grows more and more animated until the climax comes in a series of full, long sustained fortissimo chords. These chords are continued to the end, becoming gradually slower and softer; and with one last melancholy sounding of the second theme the conclusion is reached in C major. The performance was a fine one, the artistic and dramatic interpretation by Mr. Nikisch, the delightful purity of tone in the wood-wind and the expressive warmth of the strings leaving nothing to be desired. The second number was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, opus 15, by Sgambati, the composer, born an Italian, but with German predilections and training, musically. The programme announced it for the "first time at these concerts"; it might have said almost with truth "first time in Boston," since its sole performance previously, at Mr. Lang's concerto concerts, was so inadequate in many essentials as hardly to merit the name of anything more than a rehearsal. Mr. Hiram Tucker, who performed it on that occasion as well, was the soloist. The concerto might in a sense be termed cosmopolitan in character, for in it may be discovered reminders of Beethoven, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt. It opens with a long, old-fashioned tutti, after which the piano part appears in a series of passages in octaves and chords. The movement is long and elaborately difficult. The themes are interesting, especially the second, which recalls the second theme of the same movement of Rubinstein's D minor concerto. There is a long cadenza, difficult to render, technically and expressively; and the scoring is broad and symphonic in character. The second movement is called a romanza, and is quite short. The theme appears in the midst of a passage of chords that are played staccato with the exception of one note in each, which, being sustained, helps to form the melody. It is a pretty theme, but the composer has taken an ineffective mode of presenting it. The most skillful pianist would find difficulty in making it agreeably apparent in a large hall, for which the concerto was evidently written. It must either be forced or remain inaudible. The closing movement is both fiery and brilliant, the latter quality of which is rendered not less so by its strong resemblance to the last movement of Chopin's E minor concerto. Throughout the work, one is constantly reminded of Liszt, although the effects reminiscent of him are curiously mixed up with other effects that are usually associated with works by the more classic composers already mentioned. The scoring is generally full, and contains beautiful passages, notably in the romanza, and the second themes of the first and last movements. Still, there are at times "bald spots," that strike one as being dry as well as thin. Mr. Tucker's performance of the piano part was, in the main, adequate, and artistic. His playing was generally clean and brilliant, although at times somewhat cold and restrained; for instance, in the cadenza of the first movement, and in the opening theme of the last, both of which lacked fire and impetuosity. Some of the difficult running passages, although fluently given, were not rendered with the effect their character demands. On the other hand, the octave and chord passages were well played; his staccato touch was made clearly apparent, and the cantabile themes were rendered in a musical manner. As a whole, it was to us the most effective and well sustained effort that he has yet made before a Boston public. The audience displayed its usual regard for solo performers by recalling him with much cordiality. It is not unlikely that Moszkowski, when asked to write something for the Philharmonic Society of London, realized that he must lay himself out in dead earnest if he wished to make a distinct impression on the staid attendants of the concerts of that venerable institution, to penetrate the often-to-be-observed fogginess of their musical perceptions. One would think he could not have failed in this instance, for brighter, more tuneful or artistic or more charmingly scored "surface music" than his first suite, in F, dedicated to the society just mentioned, is hard to find. The opening movement alone is rather long drawn out, and somebody has not inaptly said its first measures recall the "Lancers Quadrille." For all that, it is a spirited theme, while the second, placed so delightfully with the wood-wind and horns, is altogether bewitching. The piquancy of the first theme of the "Allegretto Giojoso," which the addition of the glockchen, piccolo and triangle renders more piquant, with its graceful complementary theme, make this movement also very attractive. In the third movement, a theme with variations, a charming melody, with a happy, self-contented air about it, is given out, and wends its way through the eight ingeniously-conceived and never wearisome changes that are rung upon it without ever being lost to hearing, except in number five, "All' ongarese," which seems more like a diversion than a variation. The closing movement, a "perpetual motion," is also most ingenious and fascinating as well. All the instruments take their turn at the whirling figure in sixteen notes, with the exception of the trumpet; even the ponderous double basses and the lugubriously humorous bassoons make a not altogether fruitless effort to be "in the game." The entire work apparently was on the tips on the fingers and tongues of the orchestra, for it was beautifully played from beginning to end. The exquisite work of the flute, oboe, clarinet and horn players deserves especial mention. Still, to recall the also exquisite quality of the strings and the skill and fancy of the conductor, is to recall the fact that it was the perfection of the performance as a whole that deserves the highest praise. This truly popular concert closed with Wagner's concert arrangement of the "Ride of the Walkueries." Needless to say, it also was given superbly. T. P. CURRIER.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 2, 1890.

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERTS.

The high artistic idea that has been maintained by Mr. T. Adamowski, throughout his career as a member of the band of local musicians that have been prominently before the public of this city for the last ten years, has given him a reputation that ensures the character of any enterprise announced under his direction, and so the Adamowski quartet concerts of the season may be anticipated with pleasure by all patrons of such events. Mr. Adamowski has shown his rare skill in the training and direction of his quartet in former seasons, and in the concerts now announced he has again shown most commendable taste in the choice and arrangement of the works to be presented. The first of these concerts is announced at Union Hall tomorrow evening, when the programme will be: Quartet in D minor, Haydn; (a) Wiegenlied, Fitzenhagen; (b) theme and variations, Klingel (for four 'celli); quartet in C, Dvorak.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, chose as the programme: Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." The Goldmark overture was a novelty, having its first hearing here on this occasion, and proved to be, like much of the other work of his composer, interesting more because of the treatment of its ideas than on account of the value or originality of these ideas. It is a gorgeous bit of tone color, but the pictures it depicts are outlined so faintly that the imagination is severely tested to follow the subjects treated and put the correct interpretation upon the composer's intent. In its performance Mr. Nikisch showed all his sincere devotion to the composer, and gave with all possible clearness and beauty of outline the thoughts sought to be conveyed by the overture.

Mr. Tucker is at all times a conscientious artist, and he gave his best efforts in his performance of the solo part of the Sgambati concerto. The work has a hearing in the concerto concerts given by Mr. Lang last spring, and a second hearing confirmed the impressions gained of the composition at that time. Its subjects are somewhat fragmentary, but it is made constantly interesting by the treatment and embellishment of the themes, and Mr. Tucker's playing merited the commendation given him as he finished his task.

The repetition of the Moszkowski suite atoned for much of the dulness of other selections this season, and the almost faultless performance of this number together with the grand interpretation given the "Ride" brought the concert to a brilliant ending. Next Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be Gade's overture, "Ossian"; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso; and Mendelssohn's symphony, "Scotch," with vocal selections by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

THE MUSIC HALL POPULARS.

The Sunday night "Pops" at Music Hall have apparently caught the favor of the public, and the announcements made for this evening are calculated to sustain the interest shown in these entertainments. The artists engaged are Miss Pauline Hall, the operatic soprano, who will only be heard here this season on this occasion, the Imperial quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Mr. Frank E. Partridge, cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist, and Baldwin's Boston Cadet band, Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor. This is the programme:

Overture, "Raymond" ..... Ambroise Thomas
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for cornet, "Facile" ..... Levy
Mr. Frank E. Partridge.
Overture, "Comedy" ..... Kela Bela
(For three mandolins and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Song, "Amorita" ..... Czibulka
Miss Pauline Hall.
(a) Idylle, "Pure as Snow" ..... Lange
(b) Fantise, "A Southern Wedding" ..... Lansing
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for Mandolin, Overture, "Pique Dame" .. Suppe
Sig. Carl Carciotto.
Concert Waltz, "The Waltz King" ..... Baldwin
(Composed and dedicated to Herr Edward Strauss, by J. Thomas Baldwin.)
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Overture, "William Tell" ..... Rossim
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Song, "Memory" ..... Kelly
Miss Pauline Hall.
Selection, "Erminie" ..... Jakobowski
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Danse Ecossaise ..... Baker
(For banjorines, banjo and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Coronation March from "The Prophet" .. Meyerbeer

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture—"Prometheus Bound," op. 38 ..... Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15 ..... Sgambati
(First time at these concerts.)
Suite in F, No. 1, op. 39 ..... Moszkowski
"Ride of the Valkyrs" ..... Wagner

The man Goldmark in the overture "Sakuntala" and in the opera "The Queen of Sheba" was of the East, Eastern. His music was as his blood, Oriental, half Hungarian, half Hebraic. His melodies were like unto the century-old chants, solemnly intoned by heavy-eyed priests of the Orient who had eaten of the leaves and flowers of hemp. His harmonies, abounding in augmented fourths and diminished sixths and constant shiftings from major to minor, were as the stupefying perfumes of "charred frankincense and grated sandal root." And to Western people his music was as suggestive as was to De Quincey the Malay, who, amongst English mountains, knocked at his cottage door. But "Merlin" and the overture to "Prometheus" tell the world that Goldmark has left the synagogue and has pitched his tent at Bayreuth.

For the overture played Saturday evening, for the first time in Boston, shows plainly the influence of Wagner, and it is a question whether he has gained by sinking his own individuality. Yet this individuality is never completely lost; yet he is no slavish imitator. A composer who has been content to submit his works to severe self-inspection, a composer who so respects himself that he writes slowly and only permits his works to appear with long intervals between them, he has always written in earnestness and in sincerity; and even in his wildest moments, as in the "Penthesilea" overture, he has striven to express the truth as he felt it. He does not write "descriptive" music, yet his music is full of suggestion. He has not found it necessary to label his measures; he has not arrogantly called attention to any leit-motiv; he gives an overture a title, and the hearer may make of it what seems good to him. In the "Prometheus" overture the effects are gained more by glowing colors and unexpected contrasts than by originality or wealth of musical ideas; indeed, at times there is a suspicion that he has connected his episodes by padding, although he has tried to disguise the process. It is a highly dramatic, nerve-attacking composition, containing a few passages of real beauty and many pages of startling effects; and the instrumentation is gorgeous and never gaudy. In spite of surprising harmonies, were it stripped of its variegated instrumental garments and reduced to the nakedness of an arrangement for the pianoforte, its musical body would appear lank and poorly nourished. As an orchestral work it is most effective.

The pianoforte part of Sgambati's "Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, op. 15," was played by Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, who was the soloist when it was first played in Boston last spring at one of Mr. Lang's "pupils' concerts." There are musicians, men of authority, who protest against the very nature of a pianoforte concerto. They admit the general usefulness of the instrument as a means of accompanying a singer; they cheerfully give it a place in chamber concerts; they hear it gladly when pieces written for it alone are played upon it. They claim, however, and not without reason, that a concerto is an "impossible struggle" between a percussion instrument and an orchestra; that the pianoforte is not a solo instrument, as is the violin or the flute; that it is in itself a species of orchestra, and so in a concerto we have simply one ensemble opposed to another ensemble.

Surely such compositions as the concerto by Sgambati might serve these men as an example for quotation. It is for the most part incoherent; it is poor in thought; it is devoid of spontaneity; and portions of the work are ugly and without excuse. The instrumentation may be ingenious, but not even the art of the most cunning word-juggler can conceal barrenness of thought. The first movement is long and dull, full of pompous measures which mean nothing; everywhere is straining, everywhere is struggling. The romanza, the most interesting movement, is curiously, perhaps purposely, wanting in Italian song and in Italian color. The last movement is full of reminiscence. The technical difficulties do not repay the player's labor; nor is there any appeal made to an exhibition of a performer's temperament. The concerto shows the evil influence which Liszt and the men of the advanced German school have exerted upon Sgambati, who is certainly a man of talent. He admired the modern radical German school; he studied the works of this school; he has tried to shake off his nationality, and in trying to imitate and outstrip the men of his choice he out-herods Herod.

Mr. Tucker attacked the concerto with courage, and he pursued the contest to the bitter end. He showed faithfulness, industry, perseverance, in his ungrateful task. That it was a task was evident from his performance, and the audience would indeed have been churlish had it not rewarded his labor with hearty applause. It is to be regretted that Mr. Tucker chose this concerto for his appearance as soloist at the Symphony concerts, for it was surely a composition of similar dulness which moved Voltaire to write to Mme. du Deffand, "the piano is only an instrument for coppersmiths."

The Moszkowski suite and the Wagner selection were exceedingly well played by the orchestra. The "Ride of the Valkyrs" is one of the few extracts from the Wagner operas which does not lose in value when taken from its proper place.

The programme for the concert to be given next Saturday includes the "Ossian," overture by Gade; Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso"; Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and an aria and songs which will be sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. PHILIP HALE.

.....

The first of the Adamowski quartette concerts takes place this evening at Steinert Hall. The programme is exceedingly interesting.

.....

Miss Pauline Hall sang at the popular concert at Music Hall last evening.

.....

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 2, 1890.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

A New Goldmark Overture—Sgambati, Moszkowski and Wagner Represented on the Programme.

While the new overture, "Prometheus Bound," seems as a tone picture to be less vivid in coloring than certain of Goldmark's familiar works, it is unquestionably a strong, effective composition. One does not have to read between the notes to find here set fourth the "storm and stress" of the old Greek tragedy which Goldmark had in mind. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance of this novelty with the score before him, and under his evoking baton a singularly forceful and impressive hearing was given the overture, which is scored for a very large orchestra.

Mr. H. G. Tucker, whose merits as a pianist of ability and earnestness have long been recognized in Boston, was the soloist at the fourth concert. Sgambati's concerto in G minor found its first hearing before any considerable audience in Boston. It opens with a long orchestral introduction—beautifully played by the way—and the skill of the pianist finds comparatively little scope in the opening movement, until the cadenzas are reached. The second movement, the "Romance," is decidedly superior in interest to the moderato, with which the work opens, and the soloist's opportunities for the attainment of delicacy in effect are greater. But it is in the closing allegro that the pianist finds his most difficult task; and when it is noted that Mr. Tucker fulfilled all the requirements of the exacting score, sufficient has been said in commendation of his performance of a work which, if not profound, is always musicianly, and for the most part, interesting as well.

Moszkowski's suite in F, with its brilliant and generous use of all the resources of the modern orchestra, is a work always to be welcomed by a Boston symphony audience. Perhaps no offering could have been chosen that would serve as a better test of the skill, alertness and responsiveness of Mr. Nikisch's players. While all the movements heard (the intermezzo was omitted, probably on account of the length of the programme) were delightful to the ear, the climax of effect was reached in the lovely andante. Such breadth, fulness and noble sweep of tone could scarcely be excelled. The variations gave quasi solo opportunities now and then, Mr. Mole's artistic flute playing gaining, as it should have done, a round of applause. But it was, after all, the ensemble performance that made this movement, and indeed the entire suite, so effective. The just relation between the multitudinous instruments that are brought into requisition was maintained by the leader with an artistic judgment and appreciation which added quality to the effect of this striking modern work.

Wagner closed the programme. The arrangement of the "Ride of the Valkyries," for orchestra, from his famous opera, certainly taxes the resources even of such a corps of musicians as Mr. Nikisch has brought together. It was given with all needed power, and sent the audiences home with plenty to talk about and discuss.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the singer, is to be soloist at this week's concerts. Gade's "Ossian" overture, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" are to be the orchestral selections.

Tonight in Music Hall.

Pauline Hall, whose stately personations of the title role in "Erminie," Etelka in "Nadjy" and other parts has made her so popular, comes to Music Hall this evening for her only appearance of the season in concert. The artists number also the Imperial Quartet, Mr. W. A. Cole, Mr. P. H. Foley, Sig. Carlo Carciotto, Mr. Walter Vreeland, in their performances on mandolins and guitars; Mr. Frank E. Partridge, the favorite cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist, and Baldwin's famous Cadet Band, J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor. The following attractive programme has been arranged:

Overture, Raymond ..... Ambroise Thomas
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for cornet, Facile ..... Levy
Mr. Frank E. Partridge.
Overture, Comedy ..... Kela Bela
(For three mandolins and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Song, Amorita ..... Czibulka
Miss Pauline Hall.
Idylle, Pure as Snow ..... Lange
Fantise, A Southern Wedding ..... Lansing
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for mandolin overture, Pique Dame ... Suppe
Sig. Carlo Carciotto.
Concert waltz, The Waltz King ..... Baldwin
(Dedicated to Herr Edward Strauss.)
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Overture, William Tell ..... Rossini
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Song, Memory ..... Kelly
Miss Pauline Hall.
Selection, Erminie ..... Jakobowski
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Danse Ecossaise ..... Baker
(For banjorines, banjo and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Coronation March, from The Prophet ... Meyerbeer

At the opening concert of the Adamowski quartet in Steinert Hall tomorrow night the programme will include quartet in D minor, No. 11, Haydn; cradle song, Fitzenhagen; Theme and variations, Klingel, (for four 'celli) Mr. J. Adamowski, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. G. Campanari, Mr. H. Mingels; quartet in C major, op. 61, Dvorak.

[33]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth Symphony concert last evening commenced with an overture to "Prometheus Bound," in C minor, opus 38, by Goldmark, it being the first performance of this work in Boston. The composer, confessing himself influenced by the play of Æschylus, has produced an overture that contrasts strongly with his gorgeous "Sakuntala," although its more pathetic and less stormy character is, in its way, perhaps fully as interesting; while it is much less conventional, if not so suggestive as the one entitled "Spring." It opens with the slow movement customarily used as an introduction to works of this class. Above the deep tones of the double basses and the roll of the tympni, a mournful figure is given out by the 'cellos, pianissimo, which, after rising through the different instruments to the flutes, is suddenly interrupted by a fortissimo passage of strongly marked chords. This continues for some measures, being followed by a decrescendo that leads to a sorrowfully expressive theme, upon which the rest of the introduction is based. It is brought to a close by a fortissimo chord, and then the allegro enters with a fiery subject which is effectively elaborated, and embellished with other figures, one in scale form being especially noticeable. The second theme, also first heard in the wood-wind, then taken up by the strings, is pathetically charming, appearing in G major, and soon modulating into B flat major. A long working-out at last terminates in a furious chromatic run which re-introduces the first subject scored for the full strength of the orchestra. Afterwards much of the previous matter is used again, the second theme reappearing in C major, E flat and G flat. More elaboration follows, and then a grand access of fury, so to say, brings about a change of the tempo to presto, which commences piano and grows more and more animated until the climax comes in a series of full, long sustained fortissimo chords. These chords are continued to the end, becoming gradually slower and softer; and with one last melancholy sounding of the second theme the conclusion is reached in C major. The performance was a fine one, the artistic and dramatic interpretation by Mr. Nikisch, the delightful purity of tone in the wood-wind and the expressive warmth of the strings leaving nothing to be desired. The second number was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, opus 15, by Sgambati, the composer, born an Italian, but with German predilections and training, musically. The programme announced it for the "first time at these concerts"; it might have said almost with truth "first time in Boston," since its sole performance previously, at Mr. Lang's concerto concerts, was so inadequate in many essentials as hardly to merit the name of anything more than a rehearsal. Mr. Hiram Tucker, who performed it on that occasion as well, was the soloist. The concerto might in a sense be termed cosmopolitan in character, for in it may be discovered reminders of Beethoven, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt. It opens with a long, old-fashioned tutti, after which the piano part appears in a series of passages in octaves and chords. The movement is long and elaborately difficult. The themes are interesting, especially the second, which recalls the second theme of the same movement of Rubinstein's D minor concerto. There is a long cadenza, difficult to render, technically and expressively; and the scoring is broad and symphonic in character. The second movement is called a romanza, and is quite short. The theme appears in the midst of a passage of chords that are played staccato with the exception of one note in each, which, being sustained, helps to form the melody. It is a pretty theme, but the composer has taken an ineffective mode of presenting it. The most skillful pianist would find difficulty in making it agreeably apparent in a large hall, for which the concerto was evidently written. It must either be forced or remain inaudible. The closing movement is both fiery and brilliant, the latter quality of which is rendered not less so by its strong resemblance to the last movement of Chopin's E minor concerto. Throughout the work, one is constantly reminded of Liszt, although the effects reminiscent of him are curiously mixed up with other effects that are usually associated with works by the more classic composers already mentioned. The scoring is generally full, and contains beautiful passages, notably in the romanza, and the second themes of the first and last movements. Still, there are at times "bald spots," that strike one as being dry as well as thin. Mr. Tucker's performance of the piano part was, in the main, adequate, and artistic. His playing was generally clean and brilliant, although at times somewhat cold and restrained; for instance, in the cadenza of the first movement, and in the opening theme of the last, both of which lacked fire and impetuosity. Some of the difficult running passages, although fluently given, were not rendered with the effect their character demands. On the other hand, the octave and chord passages were well played; his staccato touch was made clearly apparent, and the cantabile themes were rendered in a musical manner. As a whole, it was to us the most effective and well sustained effort that he has yet made before a Boston public. The audience displayed its usual regard for solo performers by recalling him with much cordiality. It is not unlikely that Moszkowski, when asked to write something for the Philharmonic Society of London, realized that he must lay himself out in dead earnest if he wished to make a distinct impression on the staid attendants of the concerts of that venerable institution, to penetrate the often-to-be-observed fogginess of their musical perceptions. One would think he could not have failed in this instance, for brighter, more tuneful or artistic or more charmingly scored "surface music" than his first suite, in F, dedicated to the society just mentioned, is hard to find. The opening movement alone is rather long drawn out, and somebody has not inaptly said its first measures recall the "Lancers Quadrille." For all that, it is a spirited theme, while the second, placed so delightfully with the wood-wind and horns, is altogether bewitching. The piquancy of the first theme of the "Allegretto Giojoso," which the addition of the glockchen, piccolo and triangle renders more piquant, with its graceful complementary theme, make this movement also very attractive. In the third movement, a theme with variations, a charming melody, with a happy, self-contented air about it, is given out, and wends its way through the eight ingeniously-conceived and never wearisome changes that are rung upon it without ever being lost to hearing, except in number five, "All' ongarese," which seems more like a diversion than a variation. The closing movement, a "perpetual motion," is also most ingenious and fascinating as well. All the instruments take their turn at the whirling figure in sixteen notes, with the exception of the trumpet; even the ponderous double basses and the lugubriously humorous bassoons make a not altogether fruitless effort to be "in the game." The entire work apparently was on the tips on the fingers and tongues of the orchestra, for it was beautifully played from beginning to end. The exquisite work of the flute, oboe, clarinet and horn players deserves especial mention. Still, to recall the also exquisite quality of the strings and the skill and fancy of the conductor, is to recall the fact that it was the perfection of the performance as a whole that deserves the highest praise. This truly popular concert closed with Wagner's concert arrangement of the "Ride of the Walkueries." Needless to say, it also was given superbly. T. P. CURRIER.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 2, 1890.

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERTS.

The high artistic idea that has been maintained by Mr. T. Adamowski, throughout his career as a member of the band of local musicians that have been prominently before the public of this city for the last ten years, has given him a reputation that ensures the character of any enterprise announced under his direction, and so the Adamowski quartet concerts of the season may be anticipated with pleasure by all patrons of such events. Mr. Adamowski has shown his rare skill in the training and direction of his quartet in former seasons, and in the concerts now announced he has again shown most commendable taste in the choice and arrangement of the works to be presented. The first of these concerts is announced at Union Hall tomorrow evening, when the programme will be: Quartet in D minor, Haydn; (a) Wiegenlied, Fitzenhagen; (b) theme and variations, Klingel (for four 'celli); quartet in C, Dvorak.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, chose as the programme: Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus"; Sgambati's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15; Moszkowski's suite in F, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." The Goldmark overture was a novelty, having its first hearing here on this occasion, and proved to be, like much of the other work of his composer, interesting more because of the treatment of its ideas than on account of the value or originality of these ideas. It is a gorgeous bit of tone color, but the pictures it depicts are outlined so faintly that the imagination is severely tested to follow the subjects treated and put the correct interpretation upon the composer's intent. In its performance Mr. Nikisch showed all his sincere devotion to the composer, and gave with all possible clearness and beauty of outline the thoughts sought to be conveyed by the overture.

Mr. Tucker is at all times a conscientious artist, and he gave his best efforts in his performance of the solo part of the Sgambati concerto. The work had a hearing in the concerto concerts given by Mr. Lang last spring, and a second hearing confirmed the impressions gained of the composition at that time. Its subjects are somewhat fragmentary, but it is made constantly interesting by the treatment and embellishment of the themes, and Mr. Tucker's playing merited the commendation given him as he finished his task.

The repetition of the Moszkowski suite atoned for much of the dulness of other selections this season, and the almost faultless performance of this number together with the grand interpretation given the "Ride" brought the concert to a brilliant ending. Next Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be Gade's overture, "Ossian"; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso; and Mendelssohn's symphony, "Scotch," with vocal selections by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

THE MUSIC HALL POPULARS.

The Sunday night "Pops" at Music Hall have apparently caught the favor of the public, and the announcements made for this evening are calculated to sustain the interest shown in these entertainments. The artists engaged are Miss Pauline Hall, the operatic soprano, who will only be heard here this season on this occasion, the Imperial quartet of mandolin and guitar players, Mr. Frank E. Partridge, cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist, and Baldwin's Boston Cadet band, Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor. This is the programme:

Overture, "Raymond" ..... Ambroise Thomas
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for cornet, "Facile" ..... Levy
Mr. Frank E. Partridge.
Overture, "Comedy" ..... Kela Bela
(For three mandolins and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Song, "Amorita" ..... Czibulka
Miss Pauline Hall.
(a) Idylle, "Pure as Snow" ..... Lange
(b) Fantise, "A Southern Wedding" ..... Lansing
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for Mandolin, Overture, "Pique Dame" .. Suppe
Sig. Carl Carciotto.
Concert Waltz, "The Waltz King" ..... Baldwin
(Composed and dedicated to Herr Edward Strauss, by J. Thomas Baldwin.)
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Overture, "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Song, "Memory" ..... Kelly
Miss Pauline Hall.
Selection, "Erminie" ..... Jakobowski
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Danse Ecossaise ..... Baker
(For banjorines, banjo and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Coronation March from "The Prophet" .. Meyerbeer

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture—"Prometheus Bound," op. 38 ..... Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15 ..... Sgambati
(First time at these concerts.)
Suite in F, No. 1, op. 39 ..... Moszkowski
"Ride of the Valkyrs" ..... Wagner

The man Goldmark in the overture "Sakuntala" and in the opera "The Queen of Sheba" was of the East, Eastern. His music was as his blood, Oriental, half Hungarian, half Hebraic. His melodies were like unto the century-old chants, solemnly intoned by heavy-eyed priests of the Orient who had eaten of the leaves and flowers of hemp. His harmonies, abounding in augmented fourths and diminished sixths and constant shiftings from major to minor, were as the stupefying perfumes of "charred frankincense and grated sandal root." And to Western people his music was as suggestive as was to De Quincey the Malay, who, amongst English mountains, knocked at his cottage door. But "Merlin" and the overture to "Prometheus" tell the world that Goldmark has left the synagogue and has pitched his tent at Bayreuth.

For the overture played Saturday evening, for the first time in Boston, shows plainly the influence of Wagner, and it is a question whether he has gained by sinking his own individuality. Yet this individuality is never completely lost; yet he is no slavish imitator. A composer who has been content to submit his works to severe self-inspection, a composer who so respects himself that he writes slowly and only permits his works to appear with long intervals between them, he has always written in earnestness and in sincerity; and even in his wildest moments, as in the "Penthesilea" overture, he has striven to express the truth as he felt it. He does not write "descriptive" music, yet his music is full of suggestion. He has not found it necessary to label his measures; he has not arrogantly called attention to any leit-motiv; he gives an overture a title, and the hearer may make of it what seems good to him. In the "Prometheus" overture the effects are gained more by glowing colors and unexpected contrasts than by originality or wealth of musical ideas; indeed, at times there is a suspicion that he has connected his episodes by padding, although he has tried to disguise the process. It is a highly dramatic, nerve-attacking composition, containing a few passages of real beauty and many pages of startling effects; and the instrumentation is gorgeous and never gaudy. In spite of surprising harmonies, were it stripped of its variegated instrumental garments and reduced to the nakedness of an arrangement for the pianoforte, its musical body would appear lank and poorly nourished. As an orchestral work it is most effective.

The pianoforte part of Sgambati's "Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, op. 15," was played by Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, who was the soloist when it was first played in Boston last spring at one of Mr. Lang's "pupils' concerts." There are musicians, men of authority, who protest against the very nature of a pianoforte concerto. They admit the general usefulness of the instrument as a means of accompanying a singer; they cheerfully give it a place in chamber concerts; they hear it gladly when pieces written for it alone are played upon it. They claim, however, and not without reason, that a concerto is an "impossible struggle" between a percussion instrument and an orchestra; that the pianoforte is not a solo instrument, as is the violin or the flute; that it is in itself a species of orchestra, and so in a concerto we have simply one ensemble opposed to another ensemble.

Surely such compositions as the concerto by Sgambati might serve these men as an example for quotation. It is for the most part incoherent; it is poor in thought; it is devoid of spontaneity; and portions of the work are ugly and without excuse. The instrumentation may be ingenious, but not even the art of the most cunning word-juggler can conceal barrenness of thought. The first movement is long and dull, full of pompous measures which mean nothing; everywhere is straining, everywhere is struggling. The romanza, the most interesting movement, is curiously, perhaps purposely, wanting in Italian song and in Italian color. The last movement is full of reminiscence. The technical difficulties do not repay the player's labor; nor is there any appeal made to an exhibition of a performer's temperament. The concerto shows the evil influence which Liszt and the men of the advanced German school have exerted upon Sgambati, who is certainly a man of talent. He admired the modern radical German school; he studied the works of this school; he has tried to shake off his nationality, and in trying to imitate and outstrip the men of his choice he out-herods Herod.

Mr. Tucker attacked the concerto with courage, and he pursued the contest to the bitter end. He showed faithfulness, industry, perseverance, in his ungrateful task. That it was a task was evident from his performance, and the audience would indeed have been churlish had it not rewarded his labor with hearty applause. It is to be regretted that Mr. Tucker chose this concerto for his appearance as soloist at the Symphony concerts, for it was surely a composition of similar dulness which moved Voltaire to write to Mme. du Deffand, "the piano is only an instrument for coppersmiths."

The Moszkowski suite and the Wagner selection were exceedingly well played by the orchestra. The "Ride of the Valkyrs" is one of the few extracts from the Wagner operas which does not lose in value when taken from its proper place.

The programme for the concert to be given next Saturday includes the "Ossian," overture by Gade; Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso"; Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and an aria and songs which will be sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. PHILIP HALE.

.....

The first of the Adamowski quartette concerts takes place this evening at Steinert Hall. The programme is exceedingly interesting.

.....

Miss Pauline Hall sang at the popular concert at Music Hall last evening.

.....

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY. NOV. 2, 1890.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

A New Goldmark Overture—Sgambati Moszkowski and Wagner Represented on the Programme.

While the new overture, "Prometheus Bound," seems as a tone picture to be less vivid in coloring than certain of Goldmark's familiar works, it is unquestionably a strong, effective composition. One does not have to read between the notes to find here set fourth the "storm and stress" of the old Greek tragedy which Goldmark had in mind. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance of this novelty with the score before him, and under his evoking baton a singularly forceful and impressive hearing was given the overture, which is scored for a very large orchestra.

Mr. H. G. Tucker, whose merits as a pianist of ability and earnestness have long been recognized in Boston, was the soloist at the fourth concert. Sgambati's concerto in G minor found its first hearing before any considerable audience in Boston. It opens with a long orchestral introduction—beautifully played by the way—and the skill of the pianist finds comparatively little scope in the opening movement, until the cadenzas are reached. The second movement, the "Romance," is decidedly superior in interest to the moderato, with which the work opens, and the soloist's opportunities for the attainment of delicacy in effect are greater. But it is in the closing allegro that the pianist finds his most difficult task; and when it is noted that Mr. Tucker fulfilled all the requirements of the exacting score, sufficient has been said in commendation of his performance of a work which, if not profound, is always musicianly, and for the most part, interesting as well.

Moszkowski's suite in F, with its brilliant and generous use of all the resources of the modern orchestra, is a work always to be welcomed by a Boston symphony audience. Perhaps no offering could have been chosen that would serve as a better test of the skill, alertness and responsiveness of Mr. Nikisch's players. While all the movements heard (the intermezzo was omitted, probably on account of the length of the programme) were delightful to the ear, the climax of effect was reached in the lovely andante. Such breadth, fulness and noble sweep of tone could scarcely be excelled. The variations gave quasi solo opportunities now and then, Mr. Mole's artistic flute playing gaining, as it should have done, a round of applause. But it was, after all, the ensemble performance that made this movement, and indeed the entire suite, so effective. The just relation between the multitudinous instruments that are brought into requisition was maintained by the leader with an artistic judgment and appreciation which added quality to the effect of this striking modern work.

Wagner closed the programme. The arrangement of the "Ride of the Valkyries," for orchestra, from his famous opera, certainly taxes the resources even of such a corps of musicians as Mr. Nikisch has brought together. It was given with all needed power, and sent the audiences home with plenty to talk about and discuss.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the singer, is to be soloist at this week's concerts. Gade's "Ossian" overture, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" are to be the orchestral selections.

Tonight in Music Hall.

Pauline Hall, whose stately personations of the title role in "Erminie," Etelka in "Nadjy" and other parts has made her so popular, comes to Music Hall this evening for her only appearance of the season in concert. The artists number also the Imperial Quartet, Mr. W. A. Cole, Mr. P. H. Foley, Sig. Carlo Carciotto, Mr. Walter Vreeland, in their performances on mandolins and guitars; Mr. Frank E. Partridge, the favorite cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist, and Baldwin's famous Cadet Band, J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor. The following attractive programme has been arranged:

Overture, Raymond ..... Ambroise Thomas
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for cornet, Facile ..... Levy
Mr. Frank E. Partridge.
Overture, Comedy ..... Kela Bela
(For three mandolins and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Song, Amorita ..... Czibulka
Miss Pauline Hall.
Idylle, Pure as Snow ..... Lange
Fantise, A Southern Wedding ..... Lansing
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Solo for mandolin overture, Pique Dame .... Suppe
Sig. Carlo Carciotto.
Concert waltz, The Waltz King ..... Baldwin
(Dedicated to Herr Edward Strauss.)
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Overture, William Tell ..... Rossini
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Song, Memory ..... Kelly
Miss Pauline Hall.
Selection, Erminie ..... Jakobowski
Baldwin's Cadet band.
Danse Ecossaise ..... Baker
(For banjorines, banjo and guitar.)
Imperial quartet.
Coronation March, from The Prophet ... Meyerbeer

At the opening concert of the Adamowski quartet in Steinert Hall tomorrow night the programme will include quartet in D minor, No. 11, Haydn; cradle song, Fitzenhagen; Theme and variations, Klingel, (for four 'celli) Mr. J. Adamowski, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. G. Campanari, Mr. H. Mingels; quartet in C major, op. 61, Dvorak.

[33]

[34]

THE MUSIC HALL "POPS"

...ers of the Music Hall "Pops" hit ... strong combination of attrac... for last evening's concert, and called ... another big audience by their offerings. ... talent engaged for the third of this series ... entertainments included Miss Pauline ... the Imperial quartet—Mr. W. A. Cole, ... P. H. Foley, Sig. Carlo Carolotto, Mr. Walter Vreeland—in performances on man... and guitars; Mr. Frank E. Partridge, ... soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist; ... Cadet band, J. Thomas Baldwin, ... conductor.

Miss Hall has always been a favorite with Boston audiences, and she had further evidence of this fact in the reception she got upon making her appearance for her first number. She was in good voice, and gave great pleasure to her audience by her singing of a song from Czibulka's "Amorita," and the song "Memory," by Frederick Kelly, recalls following each of her appearances.

Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin enjoys a popularity with local audiences which is but a just tribute to his untiring efforts to maintain and elevate the standing of the organization with which he has been identified for so many years. He has made the Cadet band a standard for military bands in this section of the country, and the playing of the men of his organization last evening merited the highest praise. His own "Waltz King" concert waltz took easy prominence in the enjoyable features of the programme, and among the many other notable features for the band were an "Erminie" selection, the great "Coronation" march from the "Prophet," Lange's "Idyll," called "Pure as Snow," and the "Tell" and "Raymond" overtures.

The imperial quartet and Sig. Carciotto gave delight to their audience by the musical numbers they contributed, and Mr. Partridge played Levy's cornet solo, "Facile," with admirable effect.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1890.

Symphony Concert — A Modern Programme.

The fourth Symphony programme was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus." (First time in Boston.)

Sgambati. Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15. Moderato maestoso—Romanza—Allegro animato. (First time in these concerts.)

Mozkowski. Suite in F.
1. Allegro Molto e Brioso.
2. Allegro Giojoso.
3. Tema con Variazioni.
4. Intermezzo.
5. Perpetuum Mobile.

Wagner. "Ride of the Walkuries."

Mr. H. G. Tucker was the soloist.

A magnificent new overture, a quasi novelty by a Roman, a bit of instrumented ginger by a witty German, and a chariot race from one of Wagner's music-dramas. What excitement! No more intensely modern programme has ever been heard at a Symphony concert. It was all interesting but there was wanting an element of repose; given this, the brilliant things would have shone all the brighter. Goldmark's overture on the subject of "Prometheus" is one of the most graphic of modern dramatic works of its class. The composer seems to have been imbued with his stern subject, for notwithstanding the length of the composition, the work is a superb unit. In its workmanship it displays Goldmark's skill in orchestration and his severe taste; the symmetry of the whole is remarkable, and the dramatic feeling that courses through it is as portentous as the voice of the oracle. Difficult as the overture is it was played magnificently.

Coming after Goldmark's strong and beautifully balanced work, the art shown in Sgambati's concerto must be styled crude, yet the work grows with a second hearing, and it certainly was a fitting thing that this leading musical Roman of them all should find a place on a Boston Symphony programme. The slow movement is very charming, and in the finale the composer's gay mood is well maintained. The pianoforte solo part is a good test of a player's technique, and Mr. Tucker played in a manner that showed his having completely conquered the mechanical part. There may be lacking a certain finesse in Mr. Tucker's work, the result achieved may not seem compensation for the amount of energy bestowed, but there is animation and real vitality in all he does; moreover he got a good share of the romance from Sgambati's concerto; in short he seemed to reach the core of the composition, and is not this the desideratum in all interpretations? At the close of the performance Mr. Tucker was heartily recalled.

The Moszkowski suite permits an opportunity for each group of instruments, and the leader on each part, in the orchestra. It is a great show piece, and remains the best vehicle for the display of the great technique of our orchestra. In the second movement there is a solo for most everybody. Mr. Molè played his quite as well as two years ago, when he was obliged to rise in his seat and bow an acknowledgment to loud plaudits. "The Ride of the Walkuries" was very vivid.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the fourth concert of this tenth season, last Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch selected none but "modern" elements to make up the programme—meteors, so to speak, which light up the sky more or less strangely, more or less attractively, of this dull period of decadence in creative musical art. These were the four selections:

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus."
Sgambati—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in G-minor, op. 15.
Moszknowski—Suite in F (first, second, third and fifth movements).
Wagner—"Ride of the Valkyries."
Soloist, Hiram G. Tucker.

Goldmark's concert overture, which he names "Prometheus," — why, from a single hearing, it is hard to tell,—is certainly a brilliant piece of orchestration, full of sombre, lonely, wild suggestion, full of galling sense of wrong, of gnawing agony, of fevered restlessness, of fierce defiance as from a soul conscious of a power within which neither Jove nor the three Fates can long ignore. The music waxes violent at times with sudden sweeping outbursts of a heroic and vindictive will, while its fury is occasionally soothed by a sweet, melodious theme, as noticeably, soon after the stormy introduction, that heard for a moment first from the oboe, then from the clarinet, then after a relapse for some time into the intricate, confused, commingling and wrestling of all the instruments, in a more feeling and persuasive repetition from the 'cellos. There are some grandiose effects; none more striking than that soon after the deep and sombre opening (which begins with the conventional rumbling of drums and double basses), where a succession of great chords, mainly from the strings, is answered by still bolder, sterner chords from the brass. They smite with a gigantic energy, worthy of old Handel. But, as the overture proceeds, the tone-mass seems to tear itself to pieces; there is more of force and main strength than there is of perceptible meaning. The one fact clear about it is a very uncomfortable state of mind and body. A gigantic personage seems to lie nailed down upon a bed of pain, and raging, roaring for deliverance, while the play of the smaller and brighter instruments which enliven and diversify the rocky monotony and grandeur of the main central mass seem like the hoots and shouts of a mischievous and heartless crowd of boys trying to make fun of the helpless sufferer. That the work is clear or beautiful as a whole we could not feel. But it is gorgeous in tone-color, is sustained in energy, and is put together with great skill. It is free from the cloying, sentimental heaviness we feel in the same composer's overture to "Sakuntala." We have perhaps come unconsciously nearer than we were aware to the poetic intention of this "Prometheus" overture in describing the impressions which it made upon us, since we find that an inscription on the score points to the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus. A second hearing of this new work to Boston ears might yield a clearer and more satisfactory outline. The performance seemed to do the utmost justice to the music.

The other work heard publicly for the first time here (although it had once been played, or as it were rehearsed semi-publicly by Mr. Tucker with a small orchestra in Mr. Lang's concerto concerts), the concerto by Sgambati, Liszt's Italian foster-child in music, seemed to us to lack charm and meaning proportionate to so ambitious, so elaborate and strenuous an effort. The orchestral scoring is very full, all is laid out on a broad scale, there is a deal of fitful energy displayed in it, with a wealth of fiery, irrepressible accompaniment (if it be accompaniment and not principal) which almost covers up the brilliantly written part for the piano; nor could we see that any tempering on the part of the conductor could have helped the matter, as for that. The prevailing expression of the whole long first movement (moderato maestoso) is sombre and depressing rather than majestic; the orchestra almost always occupies the whole stage; the pianist makes startling brilliant entrances from time to time, besides having two elaborate cadenzas in the course of the movement; but although strong Mr. Tucker put forth his full strength with clean and faultless technique, and sincere absorption in the task, the effort, as a solo performance, as an instance of virtuosity in the better sense, was not as telling as it would have been in any of the better known concertos. The immense enterprise and strain of this first movement (we speak of the composition) seemed to us like trying to carry the kingdom of heaven by storm. Prometheus-like again! But has it the Promethean spark? The work seemed so overdone that we could not help thinking of, "The zeal of thine house has eaten me up." The short middle movement, the Romanza, was a relief. There was beauty and consistent meaning. We doubt not every musical listener would have been glad of more such. The finale, Allegro animato, in G major, is again very elaborate, but lighter, brighter, with a more clear thematic and melodious intention throughout, than the first movement. It raised the spirits of the audience, while it was the most effective part for Mr. Tucker, who surpassed his record in the general excellence of his performance. We should have said that the Lisztian influence is unmistakable throughout the composition, especially the first movement. Suggestions, too, of other composers did not escape attention. The very first entrance of the pianoforte, imposing and commanding, a series of rapid open octaves, followed by strong, solid full chords, seems to show a thought of stepping in like Beethoven!

The most pleasing and really musical number of the programme was the first Suite by Moszkowski. It is very ingenious, and in fact felicitous, light music on the whole. But it abounds in fascinating surprises, some of them really beautiful, and revealing the individualities of various instruments in a delightful manner. Each steps to the foreground with a grace all its own and very winning. The first movement, Allegro molto e brioso, is indeed full of brio, of irrepressible vivacity, exceedingly rapid in its persistent carrying through to a great length of its uniformly crisp staccato three-four measure, relieved by charming instrumental combinations and worked out with rare and delicate finesse. It is not, like the old suites, made up of a series of quaint old dances all in the same key; it is simply a succession of so many modern pieces, or movements, with a good family relationship running through them. The swift three-four motion has a whirling triplet effect, almost that of a Tarantella.

...ing little bits at ... of the score, to lend tart emphasis to the first note of each phrase, making of the whole a very piquant, pretty movement, light enough for any ballet, but full of charm. The third movement is a theme of cheerful sobriety, but really beautiful, with eight interesting and extremely clever variations. Two of these are particularly attractive: First, the flute variation, running in fine thirty-second divisions, executed to marvellous perfection by M. Molè; the other, which follows in perfect contrast, the thoughtful and impassioned Hungarian Andante, interrupted by a rapid transformation of the theme. This, we thought, upon the whole, the most original and most characterful movement of the whole suite. The last of the variations brings back the original theme, with a renewed interest in the modified manner of presentation. The fourth movement, Intermezzo, was wisely enough omitted, probably on account of the great length of the whole work. Finally, a Perpetuum mobile, in which the rapid and persistent figuration of the motive is kept up by all the instruments, together or in turn, to the breathless astonishment of the listener. It is a better moto perpetuo than the Paganini solo, which we heard given lately by the "four and twenty fiddlers all in a row."

The now familiar "Walkyren-Ritt" of Wagner takes hold on the imagination of the sensation-seekers by its strangeness and its wildness, the sense it gives of vast distances, the rush and gallop of the snorting steeds, the over-shadowing clouds and storm, and the ringing, penetrating "hoy-a-to-hos" of the Walhalla hoydens (we get our idea of them from Wagner's music), with their hideous discord of the sharp fifth (an interval also employed by Gounod for the last trump in the judgment scene of his "Mors et Vita"); and in spite of much cacophony, and endless repetition of a persistent empty phrase, it seems as good as music to those who care less for music than for a good strong melodramatic bit of tone-painting. To such listeners real music has grown conventional and o'er-familiar and they crave something new and startling; something phenomenal, one of the meteors which only flourish in a decadence period of art.

J. S. D.

The programme for the fifth concert next Saturday night includes Gade's overture, "Os sian," a scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with an aria and songs which Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will sing.

TUESDAY, [illegible]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE.

The first subscription concert given this season by the Adamowski Quartette took place last evening at Steinert Hall. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in D minor, No. 11, op. 76...Haydn
(a) Cradle Song.....Fitzenhagen
(b) Theme and variations (for four 'cellos).....Klingel
(First time in Boston.)
Quartette in C major, op. 61.....Dvorak

This quartette is now made up of Messrs. T. Adamowski, first violin; Moldauer, second violin; Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. In the ensemble there is still something lacking, both in quality of tone and in the playing of sustained passages; there is an evident nervousness which is impatient with andantes, and in reckless scherzos and impassioned allegros the quartette is at its best.

Of the novelties upon the programme of the first concert, the piece of Klingel played by Messrs. J. Adamowski, Schulz, Campanari and Mingels is ingenious enough so far as the variations are concerned; but it is not a pleasing composition to listen to, and the playing of it was not beyond reproach, particularly in the matter of intonation. The Dvorak Quartette is a disappointing work. In it Dvorak beats about the bush and secures but little game. The opening allegro is built upon a grand scale and suggests an orchestra; with orchestral colors it might be effective: as it is, it is long-winded and wearisome. The andante is vague, each player apparently following a path which leaves him far from human habitations. The scherzo is the best made and most interesting of the four movements, the finale being merely a perfunctory conclusion of the whole matter.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

The first of the Adamowski string quartet concerts, at Steinert Hall, last evening, was an unqualified artistic success, and the thoroughly good work done by Mr. Adamowski and his associate players was enjoyed by a large and brilliant audience.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

::: THIRD SEASON. :::

FIRST SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL.

THE SECOND AND THIRD CONCERT OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY

EVENINGS, DECEMBER 1st, 1890. AND JANUARY 5th, 1891.

[34]

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1890.

THE MUSIC HALL "POP."

The managers of the Music Hall "Pops" hit upon a very strong combination of attractions for last evening's concert, and called out another big audience by their offerings. The talent engaged for the third of this series of entertainments included Miss Pauline Hall; the Imperial quartet—Mr. W. A. Cole, Mr. P. H. Foley, Sig. Carlo Carolotto, Mr. Walter Vreeland—in performances on mandolins and guitars; Mr. Frank E. Partridge, cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist; Baldwin's Cadet band. J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor.

Miss Hall has always been a favorite with Boston audiences, and she had further evidence of this fact in the reception she got upon making her appearance for her first number. She was in good voice, and gave great pleasure to her audience by her singing of a song from Czibulka's "Amorita," and the song "Memory," by Frederick Kelly, recalls following each of her appearances.

Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin enjoys a popularity with local audiences which is but a just tribute to his untiring efforts to maintain and elevate the standing of the organization with which he has been identified for so many years. He has made the Cadet band a standard for military bands in this section of the country, and the playing of the men of his organization last evening merited the highest praise. His own "Waltz King" concert waltz took easy prominence in the enjoyable features of the programme, and among the many other notable features for the band were an "Erminie" selection, the great "Coronation" march from the "Prophet," Lange's "Idyll," called "Pure as Snow," and the "Tell" and "Raymond" overtures.

The Imperial quartet and Sig. Carciotto gave delight to their audience by the musical numbers they contributed, and Mr. Partridge played Levy's cornet solo, "Facile," with admirable effect.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1890.

Symphony Concert — A Modern Programme.

The fourth Symphony programme was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus." (First time in Boston.)

Sgambati. Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in G minor, op. 15. Moderato maestoso—Romanza—Allegro animato. (First time in these concerts.)

Mozkowski. Suite in F.
1. Allegro Molto e Brioso.
2. Allegro Giojoso.
3. Tema con Variazioni.
4. Intermezzo.
5. Perpetuum Mobile.

Wagner. "Ride of the Walkuries."

Mr. H. G. Tucker was the soloist.

A magnificent new overture, a quasi novelty by a Roman, a bit of instrumented ginger by a witty German, and a chariot race from one of Wagner's music-dramas. What excitement! No more intensely modern programme has ever been heard at a Symphony concert. It was all interesting but there was wanting an element of repose; given this, the brilliant things would have shone all the brighter. Goldmark's overture on the subject of "Prometheus" is one of the most graphic of modern dramatic works of its class. The composer seems to have been imbued with his stern subject, for notwithstanding the length of the composition, the work is a superb unit. In its workmanship it displays Goldmark's skill in orchestration and his severe taste; the symmetry of the whole is remarkable, and the dramatic feeling that courses through it is as portentous as the voice of the oracle. Difficult as the overture is it was played magnificently.

Coming after Goldmark's strong and beautifully balanced work, the art shown in Sgambati's concerto must be styled crude, yet the work grows with a second hearing, and it certainly was a fitting thing that this leading musical Roman of them all should find a place on a Boston Symphony programme. The slow movement is very charming, and in the finale the composer's gay mood is well maintained. The pianoforte solo part is a good test of a player's technique, and Mr. Tucker played in a manner that showed his having completely conquered the mechanical part. There may be lacking a certain finesse in Mr. Tucker's work, the result achieved may not seem compensation for the amount of energy bestowed, but there is animation and real vitality in all he does; moreover he got a good share of the romance from Sgambati's concerto; in short he seemed to reach the core of the composition, and is not this the desideratum in all interpretations? At the close of the performance Mr. Tucker was heartily recalled.

The Moszkowski suite permits an opportunity for each group of instruments, and the leader on each part, in the orchestra. It is a great show piece, and remains the best vehicle for the display of the great technique of our orchestra. In the second movement there is a solo for most everybody. Mr. Molè played his quite as well as two years ago, when he was obliged to rise in his seat and bow an acknowledgment to loud plaudits. "The Ride of the Walkürles" was very vivid.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the fourth concert of this tenth season, last Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch selected none but "modern" elements to make up the programme—meteors, so to speak, which light up the sky more or less strangely, more or less attractively, of this dull period of decadence in creative musical art. These were the four selections:

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus."
Sgambati—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in G-minor, op. 15.
Moszknowski—Suite in F (first, second, third and fifth movements).
Wagner—"Ride of the Valkyries."
Soloist, Hiram G. Tucker.

Goldmark's concert overture, which he names "Prometheus," — why, from a single hearing, it is hard to tell,—is certainly a brilliant piece of orchestration, full of sombre, lonely, wild suggestion, full of galling sense of wrong, of gnawing agony, of fevered restlessness, of fierce defiance as from a soul conscious of a power within which neither Jove nor the three Fates can long ignore. The music waxes violent at times with sudden sweeping outbursts of a heroic and vindictive will, while its fury is occasionally soothed by a sweet, melodious theme, as noticeably, soon after the stormy introduction, that heard for a moment first from the oboe, then from the clarinet, then after a relapse for some time into the intricate, confused, commingling and wrestling of all the instruments, in a more feeling and persuasive repetition from the 'cellos. There are some grandiose effects; none more striking than that soon after the deep and sombre opening (which begins with the conventional rumbling of drums and double basses), where a succession of great chords, mainly from the strings, is answered by still bolder, sterner chords from the brass. They smite with a gigantic energy, worthy of old Handel. But, as the overture proceeds, the tone-mass seems to tear itself to pieces; there is more of force and main strength than there is of perceptible meaning. The one fact clear about it is a very uncomfortable state of mind and body. A gigantic personage seems to lie nailed down upon a bed of pain, and raging, roaring for deliverance, while the play of the smaller and brighter instruments which enliven and diversify the rocky monotony and grandeur of the main central mass seem like the hoots and shouts of a mischievous and heartless crowd of boys trying to make fun of the helpless sufferer. That the work is clear or beautiful as a whole we could not feel. But it is gorgeous in tone-color, is sustained in energy, and is put together with great skill. It is free from the cloying, sentimental heaviness we feel in the same composer's overture to "Sakuntala." We have perhaps come unconsciously nearer than we were aware to the poetic intention of this "Prometheus" overture in describing the impressions which it made upon us, since we find that an inscription on the score points to the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus. A second hearing of this new work to Boston ears might yield a clearer and more satisfactory outline. The performance seemed to do the utmost justice to the music.

The other work heard publicly for the first time here (although it had once been played, or as it were rehearsed semi-publicly by Mr. Tucker with a small orchestra in Mr. Lang's concerto concerts), the concerto by Sgambati, Liszt's Italian foster-child in music, seemed to us to lack charm and meaning proportionate to so ambitious, so elaborate and strenuous an effort. The orchestral scoring is very full, all is laid out on a broad scale, there is a deal of fitful energy displayed in it, with a wealth of fiery, irrepressible accompaniment (if it be accompaniment and not principal) which almost covers up the brilliantly written part for the piano; nor could we see that any tempering on the part of the conductor could have helped the matter, as for that. The prevailing expression of the whole long first movement (moderato maestoso) is sombre and depressing rather than majestic; the orchestra almost always occupies the whole stage; the pianist makes startling brilliant entrances from time to time, besides having two elaborate cadenzas in the course of the movement; but although strong Mr. Tucker put forth his full strength with clean and faultless technique, and sincere absorption in the task, the effort, as a solo performance, as an instance of virtuosity in the better sense, was not as telling as it would have been in any of the better known concertos. The immense enterprise and strain of this first movement (we speak of the composition) seemed to us like trying to carry the kingdom of heaven by storm. Prometheus-like again! But has it the Promethean spark? The work seemed so overdone that we could not help thinking of, "The zeal of thine house has eaten me up." The short middle movement, the Romanza, was a relief. There was beauty and consistent meaning. We doubt not every musical listener would have been glad of more such. The finale, Allegro animato, in G major, is again very elaborate, but lighter, brighter, with a more clear thematic and melodious intention throughout, than the first movement. It raised the spirits of the audience, while it was the most effective part for Mr. Tucker, who surpassed his record in the general excellence of his performance. We should have said that the Lisztian influence is unmistakable throughout the composition, especially the first movement. Suggestions, too, of other composers did not escape attention. The very first entrance of the pianoforte, imposing and commanding, a series of rapid open octaves, followed by strong, solid full chords, seems to show a thought of stepping in like Beethoven!

The most pleasing and really musical number of the programme was the first Suite by Moszkowski. It is very ingenious, and in fact felicitous, light music on the whole. But it abounds in fascinating surprises, some of them really beautiful, and revealing the individualities of various instruments in a delightful manner. Each steps to the foreground with a grace all its own and very winning. The first movement, Allegro molto e brioso, is indeed full of brio, of irrepressible vivacity, exceedingly rapid in its persistent carrying through to a great length of its uniformly crisp staccato three-four measure, relieved by charming instrumental combinations and worked out with rare and delicate finesse. It is not, like the old suites, made up of a series of quaint old dances all in the same key; it is simply a succession of so many modern pieces, or movements, with a good family relationship running through them. The swift three-four motion has a whirling triplet effect, almost that of a Tarantella.

...second movement, Allegro giojoso, adds to the orchestration a harp, English horn, and sharp, tinkling little bells at the top of the score, to lend tart emphasis to the first note of each phrase, making of the whole a very piquant, pretty movement, light enough for any ballet, but full of charm. The third movement is a theme of cheerful sobriety, but really beautiful, with eight interesting and extremely clever variations. Two of these are particularly attractive: First, the flute variation, running in fine thirty-second divisions, executed to marvellous perfection by M. Molé; the other, which follows in perfect contrast, the thoughtful and impassioned Hungarian Andante, interrupted by a rapid transformation of the theme. This, we thought, upon the whole, the most original and most characterful movement of the whole suite. The last of the variations brings back the original theme, with a renewed interest in the modified manner of presentation. The fourth movement, Intermezzo, was wisely enough omitted, probably on account of the great length of the whole work. Finally, a Perpetuum mobile, in which the rapid and persistent figuration of the motive is kept up by all the instruments, together or in turn, to the breathless astonishment of the listener. It is a better moto perpetuo than the Paganini solo, which we heard given lately by the "four and twenty fiddlers all in a row."

The now familiar "Walkyren-Ritt" of Wagner takes hold on the imagination of the sensation-seekers by its strangeness and its wildness, the sense it gives of vast distances, the rush and gallop of the snorting steeds, the over-shadowing clouds and storm, and the ringing, penetrating "hoy-a-to-hos" of the Walhalla hoydens (we get our idea of them from Wagner's music), with their hideous discord of the sharp fifth (an interval also employed by Gounod for the last trump in the judgment scene of his "Mors et Vita"); and in spite of much cacophony, and endless repetition of a persistent empty phrase, it seems as good as music to those who care less for music than for a good strong melodramatic bit of tone-painting. To such listeners real music has grown conventional and o'er-familiar and they crave something new and startling; something phenomenal, one of the meteors which only flourish in a decadence period of art. J. S. D.

The programme for the fifth concert next Saturday night includes Gade's overture, "Os sian," a scherzo capriccioso by Dvoràk, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with an aria and songs which Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will sing.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1890.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE.

The first subscription concert given this season by the Adamowski Quartette took place last evening at Steinert Hall. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in D minor, No. 11, op. 76 . . . Haydn
(a) Cradle Song . . . . . Fitzenhagen
(b) Theme and variations (for four 'cellos) . . . . . Klingel
(First time in Boston.)
Quartette in C major, op. 61 . . . . . Dvorak

This quartette is now made up of Messrs. T. Adamowski, first violin; Moldauer, second violin; Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. In the ensemble there is still something lacking, both in quality of tone and in the playing of sustained passages; there is an evident nervousness which is impatient with andantes, and in reckless scherzos and impassioned allegros the quartette is at its best.

Of the novelties upon the programme of the first concert, the piece of Klingel played by Messrs. J. Adamowski, Schulz, Campanari and Mingels is ingenious enough so far as the variations are concerned; but it is not a pleasing composition to listen to, and the playing of it was not beyond reproach, particularly in the matter of intonation. The Dvorak Quartette is a disappointing work. In it Dvorak beats about the bush and secures but little game. The opening allegro is built upon a grand scale and suggests an orchestra; with orchestral colors it might be effective; as it is, it is long-winded and wearisome. The andante is vague, each player apparently following a path which leaves him far from human habitations. The scherzo is the best made and most interesting of the four movements, the finale being merely a perfunctory conclusion of the whole matter.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

The first of the Adamowski string quartet concerts, at Steinert Hall, last evening, was an unqualified artistic success, and the thoroughly good work done by Mr. Adamowski and his associate players was enjoyed by a large and brilliant audience.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

::: THIRD SEASON. :::

FIRST SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL.

THE SECOND AND THIRD CONCERT OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENINGS, DECEMBER 1ST, 1890. AND JANUARY 5TH, 1891.

[34]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the fourth concert of this tenth season, last Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch selected none but "modern" elements to make up the programme—meteors, so to speak, which light up the sky more or less strangely, more or less attractively, of this dull period of decadence in creative musical art. These were the four selections:

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus."
Sgambati—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in G-minor, op. 15.
Moszknowski—Suite in F (first, second, third and fifth movements).
Wagner—"Ride of the Valkyries."
Soloist, Hiram G. Tucker.

Goldmark's concert overture, which he names "Prometheus,"—why, from a single hearing, it is hard to tell,—is certainly a brilliant piece of orchestration, full of sombre, lonely, wild suggestion, full of galling sense of wrong, of gnawing agony, of fevered restlessness, of fierce defiance as from a soul conscious of a power within which neither Jove nor the three Fates can long ignore. The music waxes violent at times with sudden sweeping outbursts of a heroic and vindictive will, while its fury is occasionally soothed by a sweet, melodious theme, as noticeably, soon after the stormy introduction, that heard for a moment first from the oboe, then from the clarinet, then after a relapse for some time into the intricate, confused, commingling and wrestling of all the instruments, in a more feeling and persuasive repetition from the 'cellos. There are some grandiose effects; none more striking than that soon after the deep and sombre opening (which begins with the conventional rumbling of drums and double basses), where a succession of great chords, mainly from the strings, is answered by still bolder, sterner chords from the brass. They smite with a gigantic energy, worthy of old Handel. But, as the overture proceeds, the tone-mass seems to tear itself to pieces; there is more of force and main strength than there is of perceptible meaning. The one fact clear about it is a very uncomfortable state of mind and body. A gigantic personage seems to lie nailed down upon a bed of pain, and raging, roaring for deliverance, while the play of the smaller and brighter instruments which enliven and diversify the rocky monotony and grandeur of the main central mass seem like the hoots and shouts of a mischievous and [illegible] to lend [illegible] to the first note of each phrase, making of the whole a very piquant, pretty movement, light enough for any ballet, but full of charm. The third movement is a theme of cheerful sobriety, but really beautiful, with eight interesting and extremely clever variations. Two of these are particularly attractive: First, the flute variation, running in fine thirty-second divisions, executed to marvellous perfection by M. Molé; the other, which follows in perfect contrast, the thoughtful and impassioned Hungarian Andante, interrupted by a rapid transformation of the theme. This, we thought, upon the whole, the most original and most characterful movement of the whole suite. The last of the variations brings back the original theme, with a renewed interest in the modified manner of presentation. The fourth movement, Intermezzo, was wisely enough omitted, probably on account of the great length of the whole work. Finally, a Perpetuum mobile, in which the rapid and persistent figuration of the motive is kept up by all the instruments, together or in turn, to the breathless astonishment of the listener. It is a better moto perpetuo than the Paganini solo, which we heard given lately by the "four and twenty fiddlers all in a row."

The now familiar "Walkyren-Ritt" of Wagner takes hold on the imagination of the sensation-seekers by its strangeness and its wildness, the sense it gives of vast distances, the rush and gallop of the snorting steeds, the over-shadowing clouds and storm, and the ringing, penetrating "hoy-a-to-hos" of the Walhalla hoydens (we get our idea of them from Wagner's music), with their hideous discord of the sharp fifth (an interval also employed by Gounod for the last trump in the judgment scene of his "Mors et Vita"); and in spite of much cacophony, and endless repetition of a persistent empty phrase, it seems as good as music to those who care less for music than for a good strong melodramatic bit of tone-painting. To such listeners real music has grown conventional and o'er-familiar and they crave something new and startling; something phenomenal, one of the meteors which only flourish in a decadence period of art.

J. S. D.

The programme for the fifth concert next Saturday night includes Gade's overture, "Ossian," a scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with an aria and songs which Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will sing.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE.

The first subscription concert given this season by the Adamowski Quartette took place last evening at Steinert Hall. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in D minor, No. 11, op. 76 . . Haydn
(a) Cradle Song . . . . . Fitzenhagen
(b) Theme and variations (for four 'cellos) . . . . . Klingel
(First time in Boston.)
Quartette in C major, op. 61 . . . . . Dvorak

This quartette is now made up of Messrs. T. Adamowski, first violin; Moldauer, second violin; Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. In the ensemble there is still something lacking, both in quality of tone and in the playing of sustained passages; there is an evident nervousness which is impatient with andantes, and in reckless scherzos and impassioned allegros the quartette is at its best.

Of the novelties upon the programme of the first concert, the piece of Klingel played by Messrs. J. Adamowski, Schulz, Campanari and Mingels is ingenious enough so far as the variations are concerned; but it is not a pleasing composition to listen to, and the playing of it was not beyond reproach, particularly in the matter of intonation. The Dvorak Quartette is a disappointing work. In it Dvorak beats about the bush and secures but little game. The opening allegro is built upon a grand scale and suggests an orchestra; with orchestral colors it might be effective; as it is, it is long-winded and wearisome. The andante is vague, each player apparently following a path which leaves him far from human habitations. The scherzo is the best made and most interesting of the four movements, the finale being merely a perfunctory conclusion of the whole matter.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

The first of the Adamowski string quartet concerts, at Steinert Hall, last evening, was an unqualified artistic success, and the thoroughly good work done by Mr. Adamowski and his associate players was enjoyed by a large and brilliant audience.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1890.

Symphony Concert — A Modern Programme.

[illegible] the Steinert Hall "Pops" hit every strong combination of attraction at last evening's concert, and called out a generous audience by their offerings. The talent engaged for the third of this series of entertainments included Miss Pauline Daly, the Imperial quartet—Mr. W. A. Cole, Sig. P. H. Foley, Sig. Carlo Carciotto, Mr. Walter Vecchione in performances on mandolins and guitars; Mr. Frank E. Partridge, cornet soloist; Mr. Harry C. Daggett, pianist; and Gilmore's Cadet band, J. Thomas Baldwin, conductor.

Miss Daly has always been a favorite with Boston audiences, and she had further evidence of this fact in the reception she got upon making her appearance for her first number. She was in good voice, and gave great pleasure to her audience by her singing of a song from Czibulka's "Amorita," and the song "Memory," by Frederick Kelly, readily following each of her appearances.

Sir. J. Thomas Baldwin enjoys a popularity with local audiences which is but a just tribute to his untiring efforts to maintain and elevate the standing of the organization with which he has been identified for so many years. He has made the Cadet band a standard for military bands in this section of the country, and the playing of the men of his organization last evening merited the highest praise. His own "Waltz King" concert waltz took easy prominence in the enjoyable features of the programme, and among the many other notable features for the band were an "Ermiuie" selection, the great "Coronation" march from the "Prophet," Lange's "Idyll," called "Pure as Snow," and the "Tell" and "Raymond" overtures.

The Imperial quartet and Sig. Carciotto gave delight to their audience by the musical numbers they contributed, and Mr. Partridge played Levy's cornet solo, "Facile," with admirable effect.

he was obliged to rise in his seat and bow an acknowledgment to loud plaudits. "The Ride of the Walkürles" was very vivid.

a grace all its own and very winning. The first movement, Allegro molto e brioso, is indeed full of brio, of irrepressible vivacity, exceedingly rapid in its persistent carrying through to a great length of its uniformly crisp staccato three-four measure, relieved by charming instrumental combinations and worked out with rare and delicate finesse. It is not, like the old suites, made up of a series of quaint old dances all in the same key; it is simply a succession of so many modern pieces, or movements, with a good family relationship running through them. The swift three-four motion has a whirling triplet effect, almost that of a tarantella.

STEINERT HALL.

FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 3, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN D MINOR, No. 11, op. 76. — HAYDN
ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE E PIU TOSTO ALLEGRETTO.—MENUETTO (ALLEGRO MA NON TROPPO.)—FINALE, VIVACE ASSAI.

a) WIEGENLIED. — FITZENHAGEN

b) THEME AND VARIATIONS. — KLINGEL
(FOR FOUR 'CELLI.)
(FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.)
MR. J. ADAMOWSKI.
MR. LEO SHULZ.
MR. G. CAMPANARI.
MR. H. MINGELS.

QUARTET IN C MAJOR, op. 61. — DVORÁK
ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE.—SCHERZO (ALLEGRO VIVO).—FINALE (VIVACE.)
(FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.)

HAYDN ordained that the quartet, like the sonata and the symphony, should consist of four fixed movements, and as has been prettily said: "It was his inexhaustibly fertile invention and his freedom in the treatment of form, which nourished and developed the germ of this chamber music until it bore the most beautiful blossom of German musical art." It was Mozart that added strength and elegance to the form designed and winsomely illustrated by Haydn. That Haydn profited by Mozart's style is apparent in his later quartets, of which the one in D minor, op. 76, is an excellent illustration. The quartets of op. 75 and 76, were written after Hadyn's return to beloved Esterhaz from his second London visit, prior to the composition of the "Creation." The following lines of description of the D minor quartet are compiled: This quartet is one of Hadyn's most vigorous compositions for string instruments. There are three others in the same key, op. 9, No. 4; op. 42, (one quartet); op. 56, No. 2; but amateurs will at once recognize the quartet introduced this evening by the principal theme of the allegro, which breathes the very spirit of Mozart, and is a striking example of the influence exercised over Haydn by that great genius. The andante—a sort of variation movement—is pure Haydn throughout, as would naturally be expected from its graceful theme. The menuetto—a 'canon perpetual, on the octave,' is based on an energetic subject, possibly suggested by a similar movement in Mozart's C minor quintet; but in the trio—unlike Mozart, whose trio in the same quintet is another canon, answered 'by inversion'—Haydn drops the scholastic, doubtless for the sake of variety. In the finale—a thoroughly genial movement, founded on a melody as suggestive of contrapuntal treatment as it is intrinsically unpretending—Haydn is again entirely himself. Both divisions are repeated. It is then further developed till we arrive at a half close on the dominant of F, the relative major, in which key we are introduced to the leading counter theme, followed by a subsidiary which brings the opening section to an end. Upon these materials the finale is mainly constructed. (First performance at Adamowski Concerts.)

Fitzenhagen is a teacher of the violoncello at the Imperial Conservatory, Moscow.

The Theme and Variations, unlike the gentle song by Fitzenhagen has more than a melodic value. It is one of the few scholarly and musicianly compositions for four violoncellos in the modern repertory. The theme is well adapted to treatment and the composer's use of the variation form is both learned and interesting. Klingel is accounted one of the first violoncello virtuosos of the period. He is instructor at the Leipzig Conservatory, and Violoncello leader of the Gewandhaus orchestra.

The quartet last on the programme to-day is one of the few pieces of chamber music by Dvorák which have not had a previous hearing in Boston. Owing to the inaccessibility of a score a sketch of the work could not be prepared.

[35]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Two New Works —Tucker as Soloist.

As we had two symphonies in the programme of the previous week, the average was restored by having none at all in the concert of Saturday. The programme was, however, so interesting from beginning to end (even if one of the new works was disappointing as music) that it would be hypercritical to quarrel with its make-up. In fact, one may rejoice that the conservatism which has marked many of the concerts of recent years, and which has often been criticised in these columns, is disappearing, and that Boston is beginning to bear its quota of musical novelties. It may be that some of these novelties do not take rank with the standard and classical works, yet none the less it is a good thing that they are on the programmes, for without comparisons there could be no musical growth, and we should fossilize into unending repetitions of the German masterpieces.

The above statement owes its origin and justification to the works, both new to Boston, of Goldmark and Sgambati which began the concert. Goldmark's overture, entitled "Prometheus," is not comparable to the true dramatic overtures such as Beethoven established, yet it is superior to Beethoven's overture on this very subject, in which the master for once left the dramatic style and used the classical (sonata movement) form as established by Mozart. Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture was but an easy prelude to his weakest large work (except "The Battle of Vittoria") while Goldmark presents the Hellenic myth with all the breadth of a symphonic poem. Not always does it possess Greek stateliness, but it gives many phrases which have a theatrical flavor, which are intensified by brusque contrasts. Goldmark is always successful in his use of the wood wind, and the opening phrases of this division of the orchestra were dignified and expressive. There is a sufficient display of learning too, and some very good counterpoint is contrasted with some massive homophonic work. The fact that the finale has a great deal of flute, oboe, and clarinet ecstasy, leads the auditor to the conclusion that it pictures the Titan unbound, and this impression is borne out by the triumphant fanfares of the brasses at the close. The work can be pronounced, even on a first hearing, as a trifle sensational and turgid at times, but also interesting in treatment and tone-color, and not so chaotic as many great orchestral numbers of the modern school.

Not quite so much can be said, at least for a first impression, of the piano concerto by Sgambati, which out-Herods Herod in its chase after the most incoherent mode of expression; it is music with "all modern improvements." It gives an enormous preponderance to the orchestra, and the opening tutti is extremely long, embarrassingly so for the pianist, who is obliged to sit either in listless apathy or in earnest reverence, as in the two piano concertos of Chopin. But the resemblance ends there; if Chopin sins in making the piano altogether too prominent, Sgambati errs in exactly the opposite direction, and the heavy orchestration swallows the piano part almost completely. Mr. Hiram G. Tucker plunged like a second Marcus Curtius into this tonal gulf, but no one was benefited, as by the Roman sacrifice, on the contrary, the unequal contest awakened an uneasy sense of pity which was not akin to enjoyment. Mr. Tucker did all that seemed possible with the part, and played with power and steadiness, his breadth in octave work, and all wrist action, being commendable. There were some good thoughts in the rambling work, as for example the augmentation of the piano figures by the woodwind, the ecstatic phrases of the second movement (the best part of the work—and the briefest), and the brilliant end of the finale, which was clearly played both by pianist and orchestra, but on the whole the Italian composer has evidently followed the ignis fatuus of Liszt into the swamp of vagueness and rhapsody. Wagner has something to answer for in advocating that freedom of modulation which he called "swimming in a sea of tone!" for Liszt barely escaped after he plunged in, and many of the lesser followers have drowned in it. Both works described above were well played by the orchestra, and the reading given by Mr. Nikisch was excellent enough to bring order out of what might have been musical chaos.

Not quite such a perfect standard was to be discovered in the Moszkowski Suite, although it was by no means poorly played; but I have heard the soloists, who so frequently come to the surface in this work, do better. Mr. Molé's flute solo evoked a storm of applause, yet it was not as equally performed as he has given it. The variation, with the theme in the violins, and the "Perpetuum Mobile" of the finale were excellent. Then came the "Walküren-Ritt," and obliterated the musical bonbon of Moszkowski. It received a thrilling performance—as fine as any it has ever had in Boston. Among all the musical horse-back rides, Berlioz's "Ride to Hades," Raff's spectre gallop in the finale of the "Lenore" symphony, or the ghostly hunt in "Im Walde," there is none so graphic, so powerful as this. What a whinneying and neighing! What cries of wild exaltation! Had Wagner left us nothing but this it would still be enough to establish his title to fame. And with this the most modern of programmes came to an end, and the auditor, after riding the horses of the war maidens through the skies, came again to earth and sought the more prosaic horse cars.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartette.

The first of the concerts announced by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall. There was only a fair-sized audience in attendance, but it included some of the most prominent musicians of the city. The high reputation of the quartette was fully sustained in their rendition of the programme, which was as follows: Quartette in D minor, No. 11, op. 76, Hayden; Wiegenlied, Fitzenhogen; theme and variations (for four 'celli), Klingel; quartette in C major, op. 61, Dvorak. The number for four 'celli was a novelty (being heard in Boston for the first time), and was well received. The second concert will be given Dec. 1.

THE REGISTER.
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 2.
Hyperion Theater.....NIKISCH
The Great Musical Events of the Year.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH..CONDUCTOR.
WITH ASSISTANCE OF Distinguished Solo Artists.
FOUR GRAND CONCERTS.
On the evenings of November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats for the four concerts, $5, now on sale at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St.
n2 1su3d C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The rapid growth of the appreciation of fine music in this country is nowhere more noticeable than in the wonderful success in recent seasons of the Boston Symphony orchestra. No better illustration could be found of the fact that the American public demand the best, and when that is offered is ever ready to give it abundant support. The Boston orchestra as is well known is a permanent organization. It was organized ten years ago and was modeled virtually after the famous orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, except that its financial support comes not from the government, but from an individual. During its ten years existence much work has been done to win success in the best sense of the word. All other considerations were made by its founder secondary to that of securing the highest artistic excellence.

The best performers to be engaged were gathered from the musical centers of the world—the orchestra has been trained by famous conductors who had before won high reputation abroad, and to-day it is the opinion of competent judges that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is excelled by no similar organization in the world and equalled only by one or two. New Haven music lovers are to have the opportunity of hearing four concerts at the Hyperion theater during the season by this orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikish. The dates have already been made known and the sale of season tickets is now in progress at Steinert's music store.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, NOV. 4.

Adamowski Appreciated.

The first of a series of Monday night subscription concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given in Steinert Hall last evening to an appreciative audience. This is the third season of these concerts, and they have come to be looked forward to with considerable pleasure by the local musical public. The quartet consists of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; J. Adamowsky, violoncello. It is quite unnecessary to state that these playing of such artists as these was thoroughly enjoyable. Following was last evening's programme: Quartet in D minor, No. 11, op, 76, Haydn; Wiegenlied, Fitzenhagen; theme and variations, Klingel; quartet in C minor, op. 61, Dvorak. The last two numbers were given their first Boston hearing. The theme and variations for four celli was performed by Messrs. Adamowski, Shulz, Campanari and Mingels.

THE REGISTER.
NEW HAVEN
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4.
Hyperion Theater.....NIKISCH
The Great Musical Events of the Year.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH..CONDUCTOR.
WITH ASSISTANCE OF Distinguished Solo Artists.
FOUR GRAND CONCERTS.
On the evenings of November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats for the four concerts, $5, now on sale at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St.
n2 1su3d C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the finest musical organizations in the country, will be in the Hyperion next Monday night. There is a great deal of pleasure in store for the big audience who heartily welcome the return of this fine orchestra.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartet.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first subscription concert of its current season in Steinert Hall on Monday evening. The audience was composed of representative music lovers who followed with interest the works given by the quartet and responded with discriminating applause. The prorgamme was as follows:

Quartet in D minor, No. 11, op. 76.....Haydn
Selections for four 'celli—
Wiegenlied.....Fitzenhagen
Theme and variation.....Klingel
Quartet in C major, op. 61.....Dvorak

The quartet is composed of Messrs. T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; and Joseph Adamowski, 'cello. It's playing of allegro passages was particularly good. In andante movements the same excellence is not maintained, but throughout its work is gratifying to the lover of chamber music. Haydn's quartet was played with exquisite shadings, the dainty grace of the allegro being fully brought out, while the andante movement was played with great feeling. The crecendos and diminuendos of the menuetto were given with excellent effect and the finale was played with all the necessary brilliancy. Selections for four 'celli were played by Messrs. Joseph Adamowski, Leo Schulz, G. Campanari and H. Mingels. The cradle song by Fitzenhagen (teacher of the violoncello at the Imperial Conservatory, Moscow) was given with great tenderness. Klingel, the composer of the second 'cello quartet, is an instructor at the Leipzig Conservatory, first violoncello in the Gewandhaus Orchestra and a member of the Brodzky Quartet. Some of his 'cello concertos have been played here before, but this was the first hearing which the work under notice had received in America. It is an extremely brilliant composition, but probably not as pleasing to the average concert goer as the song by Fitzenhagen. It was given with all the required dash. Joseph Adamowski played the leading 'cello and added to the success which he had achieved by his artistic performances in the Haydn quartet. He is a true artist, and his execution of the variations, where he was forced into the highest register of his instrument, was one of the best things of the evening. Dvorak's quartet, also a novelty, proved disappointing. The andante is charming, and the gloomy theme, which is played by the viola, was given with great expression by Mr. Zach. Much credit should be awarded Mr. T. Adamowski for the artistic success of the evening. He played the first violin with his well-known brilliancy, and his energy strongly inspired his associates in their work.

The remaining concerts of the series will be given in the same hall, Monday evenings, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5.

Boston Daily Traveller
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The clientelle of the Adamowski quartet is a loyal one, and, even under circumstances that are trying, remains faithful; for notwithstanding Mr. Baermann's concert, there was a charming audience at Steinert Hall to hear the initial concert of its third season. Mr. Max Zach is the viola player of the quartet, otherwise the group is the same as ast year. The change is in every way commendable, as Mr. Zach has a rich tone, and is a good quartet player. Mr. Adamowski's programme possessed a good share of novelty; after Haydn's D minor quartet, the best known one in the key, came two pieces for the unusual combination of four violincellos, namely, a slumber song by Fitzenhagen and a theme and variations by Klengel. The first is a simple melody, harmonized, and is interesting; the Klengel piece is of more musical value, for although bizarre in its harmonies, it is ably written, the variations being clever in treatment and extremely effective. The players were Messrs. T. Adamowski, Schultz, Campanari and Mingels. Their performance showed the effect of careful rehearsal. The Dvorák quartet was played for the first time here. It is a strange work, not especially Bohemian, not especially musical, at least, so it appears after a single hearing. The composer's fondness for freqdent modulations and abrupt rhythmic changes is apparent in every movement, and also his picturesque striving, but the result is not an harmonious, well-balanced whole, although there are frequent bits of melody that charm. The impression a first performance leaves is disturbing. The playing of the quartet at the concert had both style and spirit, and augurs an even better ensemble as the season develops.

Boston Daily Traveller
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1890.

The Symphony Orchestra will play this week at rehearsal and concert: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; aria from "Sappho," Gounod (Mr. W. C. Wyman); scherzo capriccioso, op 66, Dvorák; songs with piano: Symphony, "Scotch," Mendelssohn.

For the second concert in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, course by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight the programme is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saens; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Wedding March, Mendelssohn. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

The fourth Sunday Popular Concert at the Music Hall next Sunday will have for leading attraction the great Italian tenor, Sig. Campanini, who makes his first appearance in Boston for some time. The [illegible] band, Francis Fisher, and the [illegible] will also take part in the programme.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 7, 1890

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The second of the concerts given by the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Rondo Capriccioso, for violin.....Saint-Saëns
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saëns
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn.

Beethoven had already sketched the symphony in C minor when the idea of the one in B flat presented itself to him, and he immediately worked upon it. Though it comes after the "Heroic", and precedes the fifth, in style it is closer to the second than to its great neighbors: and certain Germans of the ultra modern school are inclined to contemn it, as Nohl, who claims that in spite of the charm of melody and grace of rhythm, the symphony does not reach the hearer's mind "because it does not present any new and powerful idea." But the hearer is more likely to say with Schumann that the symphony of Beethoven which has been last heard seems the greatest, whether it was the first or the ninth. Indeed, this symphony in question had made a deep impression upon Schumann; he often refers to it in his criticisms, and curiously enough he generally speaks of it as "humorous music." Giving the names of the muses to the symphonies, he dubs the fourth "Thalia," and he finds in the adagio that the figure in the bass is the perfect image of Falstaff, a whimsical idea worthy of Johannes Kreisler himself. As for the real and many beauties of the work, nothing new can be said about them. Berlioz has summed up the whole matter, and his was the court of last resort.

The performance of the symphony was excellent. Take, for instance, an apparently simple passage in the first allegro; it is an example of uniform rhythm where the crescendo of the ascending progression increases the "weight" of sound so that "the tempo will overflow the measure," and the degree of fulness will surpass the degree of sostenuto demanded by the composer: a famous passage often referred to by writers on the art of directing. Mr. Nikisch exercised the greatest care, and the result was beauty instead of confusion, and it is seldom that the passage referred to is not butchered by careless or ignorant conductors. In his direction of adagios and allegros, Mr. Nikisch is evidently governed by the theories of Wagner, who claimed that an allegro of Beethoven was dominated by a fundamental melody which was hinted at in the adagio which preceded; hence in such an allegro there should be a greater elasticity in treatment, while the allegros of Mozart and Haydn, which are full of a saturnalian joy, cannot be played too fast. Mr. Nikisch accepts the first statement; he denies, at least by overt act, the latter.

Saint-Saëns has written the ablest defence of the right of the "symphonic poem" to take the place of the symphony, and he has intensified the force of his argument by composing the "Danse Macabre" and "Phaëton." The "Danse Macabre," a musical illustration of the wild poetry of Cazalis, is certainly a most remarkable composition; it is strong from both the musical and dramatic standpoints; and the fine taste which characterizes his works saves him in this "pictorial" music from a realism which is but rank vulgarity. Hanslick has spoken of the irony of Saint-Saëns with which he regards his handiwork, which prevents him from exaggeration and from falling down and worshipping his own creation. Perhaps after all a composer should not too thoroughly believe in himself. Better the ironical self-examination of Saint-Saëns than the implicit faith of Gounod in his own greatness.

Although the "Danse Macabre" was finely played, it was not warmly applauded by the audience; nor for that matter was the symphony received with much enthusiasm. The "Lohengrin Prelude" and the violin playing of Mr. Adamowski met with great favor. The "Prelude," as given by the orchestra last evening, was certainly most effective, the feature of the concert. Mr. Adamowski gave upon the whole a very respectable performance of the "Rondo" by Saint-Saëns.

The next concert will take place the evening of Dec. 4.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, NOV. 7.

Symphony Players in Cambridge.

Cambridge people were delighted with the second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday evening, in the Sanders Theatre. The place is admirable in its acoustic properties, and the beauties of programme and performance could hardly have been made obvious more clearly. Mr. Adamowski performed a rondo by Saint Saens in his best manner, and Mr. Nikisch and his musicians were heard to singular advantage in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the prelude to "Lohengrin;" Saint Saens' "Danse Macabre," and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March."

Record Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 11/4

There is a heavy subscription sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts. This organization has completely usurped the place in the estimation of Philadelphia concert-goers once held by the Thomas Orchestra.

Election returns will be read this evening at the National and the Central Theatres. At the latter house the performance will not begin until 9 o'clock P. M.

Clipping from
No. American, Phil., Pa.
Date 11/3

The sale of tickets for the season of six symphony concerts to be given at the Academy of Music by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra will begin to-day at 1119 Chestnut street. As the pressure for good places is sure to be great, early application should be made to avoid disappointment. It is announced that among other eminent artists who have been engaged to take part in these concerts are Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the brilliant soprano [illegible] Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous contralto violinist.

[35]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Two New Works —Tucker as Soloist.

As we had two symphonies in the programme of the previous week, the average was restored by having none at all in the concert of Saturday. The programme was, however, so interesting from beginning to end (even if one of the new works was disappointing as music) that it would be hypercritical to quarrel with its make-up. In fact, one may rejoice that the conservatism which has marked many of the concerts of recent years, and which has often been criticised in these columns, is disappearing, and that Boston is beginning to hear its quota of musical novelties. It may be that some of these novelties do not take rank with the standard and classical works, yet none the less it is a good thing that they are on the programmes, for without comparisons there could be no musical growth, and we should fossilize into unending repetitions of the German masterpieces.

The above statement owes its origin and justification to the works, both new to Boston, of Goldmark and Sgambati which began the concert. Goldmark's overture, entitled "Prometheus," is not comparable to the true dramatic overtures such as Beethoven established, yet it is superior to Beethoven's overture on this very subject, in which the master for once left the dramatic style and used the classical (sonata movement) form as established by Mozart. Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture was but an easy prelude to his weakest large work (except "The Battle of Vittoria") while Goldmark presents the Hellenic myth with all the breadth of a symphonic poem. Not always does it possess Greek stateliness, but it gives many phrases which have a theatrical flavor, which are intensified by brusque contrasts. Goldmark is always successful in his use of the wood wind, and the opening phrases of this division of the orchestra were dignified and expressive. There is a sufficient display of learning too, and some very good counterpoint is contrasted with some massive homophonic work. The fact that the finale has a great deal of flute, oboe, and clarinet ecstasy, leads the auditor to the conclusion that it pictures the Titan unbound, and this impression is borne out by the triumphant fanfares of the brasses at the close. The work can be pronounced, even on a first hearing, as a trifle sensational and turgid at times, but also interesting in treatment and tone-color, and not so chaotic as many great orchestral numbers of the modern school.

Not quite so much can be said, at least for a first impression, of the piano concerto by Sgambati, which out-Herods Herod in its chase after the most incoherent mode of expression; it is music with "all modern improvements." It gives an enormous preponderance to the orchestra, and the opening tutti is extremely long, embarrassingly so for the pianist, who is obliged to sit either in listless apathy or in earnest reverence, as in the two piano concertos of Chopin. But the resemblance ends there; if Chopin sins in making the piano altogether too prominent, Sgambati errs in exactly the opposite direction, and the heavy orchestration swallows the piano part almost completely. Mr. Hiram G. Tucker plunged like a second Marcus Curtius into this tonal gulf, but no one was benefited, as by the Roman sacrifice, on the contrary, the unequal contest awakened an uneasy sense of pity which was not akin to enjoyment. Mr. Tucker did all that seemed possible with the part, and played with power and steadiness, his breadth in octave work, and all wrist action, being commendable. There were some good thoughts in the rambling work, as for example the augmentation of the piano figures by the woodwind, the ecstatic phrases of the second movement (the best part of the work—and the briefest), and the brilliant end of the finale, which was clearly played both by pianist and orchestra, but on the whole the Italian composer has evidently followed the ignis fatuus of Liszt into the swamp of vagueness and rhapsody. Wagner has something to answer for in advocating that freedom of modulation which he called "swimming in a sea of tone!" for Liszt barely escaped after he plunged in, and many of the lesser followers have drowned in it. Both works described above were well played by the orchestra, and the reading given by Mr. Nikisch was excellent enough to bring order out of what might have been musical chaos.

Not quite such a perfect standard was to be discovered in the Moszkowski Suite, although it was by no means poorly played; but I have heard the soloists, who so frequently come to the surface in this work, do better. Mr. Molé's flute solo evoked a storm of applause, yet it was not as equally performed as he has given it. The variation, with the theme in the violins, and the "Perpetuum Mobile" of the finale were excellent. Then came the "Walküren-Ritt," and obliterated the musical bonbon of Moszkowski. It received a thrilling performance—as fine as any it has ever had in Boston. Among all the musical horse-back rides, Berlioz's "Ride to Hades," Raff's spectre gallop in the finale of the "Lenore" symphony, or the ghostly hunt in "Im Walde," there is none so graphic, so powerful as this. What a whinneying and neighing! What cries of wild exaltation! Had Wagner left us nothing but this it would still be enough to establish his title to fame. And with this the most modern of programmes came to an end, and the auditor, after riding the horses of the war maidens through the skies, came again to earth and sought the more prosaic horse cars.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartette.

The first of the concerts announced by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall. There was only a fair-sized audience in attendance, but it included some of the most prominent musicians of the city. The high reputation of the quartette was fully sustained in their rendition of the programme, which was as follows: Quartette in D minor, No. 11, op. 76, Hayden; Wiegenlied, Fitzenhogen; theme and variations (for four 'celli), Klingel; quartette in C major, op. 61, Dvorak. The number for four 'celli was a novelty (being heard in Boston for the first time), and was well received. The second concert will be given Dec. 1.

THE REGISTER.
NEW HAVEN, CONN:
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 2.
Hyperion Theater . . . . . NIKISCH
The Great Musical Events of the Year.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH..CONDUCTOR.
WITH ASSISTANCE OF Distinguished Solo Artists.
FOUR GRAND CONCERTS.
On the evenings of November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats for the four concerts, $5, now on sale at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St.
n2 1su3d C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The rapid growth of the appreciation of fine music in this country is nowhere more noticeable than in the wonderful success in recent seasons of the Boston Symphony orchestra. No better illustration could be found of the fact that the American public demand the best, and when that is offered is ever ready to give it abundant support. The Boston orchestra as is well known is a permanent organization. It was organized ten years ago and was modeled virtually after the famous orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, except that its financial support comes not from the government, but from an individual. During its ten years existence much work has been done to win success in the best sense of the word. All other considerations were made by its founder secondary to that of securing the highest artistic excellence.

The best performers to be engaged were gathered from the musical centers of the world—the orchestra has been trained by famous conductors who had before won high reputation abroad, and to-day it is the opinion of competent judges that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is excelled by no similar organization in the world and equalled only by one or two. New Haven music lovers are to have the opportunity of hearing four concerts at the Hyperion theater during the season by this orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikish. The dates have already been made known and the sale of season tickets is now in progress at Steinert's music store.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, NOV. 4.

Adamowski Appreciated.

The first of a series of Monday night subscription concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given in Steinert Hall last evening to an appreciative audience. This is the third season of these concerts, and they have come to be looked forward to with considerable pleasure by the local musical public. The quartet consists of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; J. Adamowsky, violoncello. It is quite unnecessary to state that these playing of such artists as these was thoroughly enjoyable. Following was last evening's programme: Quartet in D minor, No. 11, op. 76, Haydn; Wiegenlied, Fitzenhagen; theme and variations, Klingel; quartet in C minor, op. 61, Dvorak. The last two numbers were given their first Boston hearing. The theme and variations for four celli was performed by Messrs. Adamowski, Shulz, Campanari and Mingels.

THE REGISTER.
NEW HAVEN
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4.
Hyperion Theater . . . . . NIKISCH
The Great Musical Events of the Year.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH..CONDUCTOR.
WITH ASSISTANCE OF Distinguished Solo Artists.
FOUR GRAND CONCERTS.
On the evenings of November 10th, December 8th, January 12th and February 23d.
Season tickets, with Reserved Seats for the four concerts, $5, now on sale at M. STEINERT SONS' Music Store, 777 Chapel St.
n2 1su3d C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the finest musical organizations in the country, will be in the Hyperion next Monday night. There is a great deal of pleasure in store for the big audience who heartily welcome the return of this fine orchestra.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

The Adamowski Quartet.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first subscription concert of its current season in Steinert Hall on Monday evening. The audience was composed of representative music lovers who followed with interest the works given by the quartet and responded with discriminating applause. The prorgamme was as follows:

Quartet in D minor, No. 11, op. 76.....Haydn
Selections for four 'celli—
Wiegenlied.....Fitzenhagen
Theme and variation.....Klingel
Quartet in C major, op. 61.....Dvŏrak

The quartet is composed of Messrs. T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; and Joseph Adamowski, 'cello. It's playing of allegro passages was particularly good. In andante movements the same excellence is not maintained, but throughout its work is gratifying to the lover of chamber music. Haydn's quartet was played with exquisite shadings, the dainty grace of the allegro being fully brought out, while the andante movement was played with great feeling. The crecendos and diminuendos of the menuetto were given with excellent effect and the finale was played with all the necessary brilliancy. Selections for four 'celli were played by Messrs. Joseph Adamowski, Leo Schulz, G. Campanari and H. Mingels. The cradle song by Fitzenhagen (teacher of the violoncello at the Imperial Conservatory, Moscow) was given with great tenderness. Klingel, the composer of the second 'cello quartet, is an instructor at the Leipzig Conservatory, first violoncello in the Gewandhaus Orchestra and a member of the Brodzky Quartet. Some of his 'cello concertos have been played here before, but this was the first hearing which the work under notice had received in America. It is an extremely brilliant composition, but probably not as pleasing to the average concert goer as the song by Fitzenhagen. It was given with all the required dash. Joseph Adamowski played the leading 'cello and added to the success which he had achieved by his artistic performances in the Haydn quartet. He is a true artist, and his execution of the variations, where he was forced into the highest register of his instrument, was one of the best things of the evening. Dvorak's quartet, also a novelty, proved disappointing. The andante is charming, and the gloomy theme, which is played by the viola, was given with great expression by Mr. Zach. Much credit should be awarded Mr. T. Adamowski for the artistic success of the evening. He played the first violin with his well-known brilliancy, and his energy strongly inspired his associates in their work.

The remaining concerts of the series will be given in the same hall, Monday evenings, Dec. 1 and Jan. 5.

Boston Daily Traveller
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1890.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The clientelle of the Adamowski quartet is a loyal one, and, even under circumstances that are trying, remains faithful; for notwithstanding Mr. Baermann's concert, there was a charming audience at Steinert Hall to hear the initial concert of its third season. Mr. Max Zach is the viola player of the quartet, otherwise the group is the same as ast year. The change is in every way commendable, as Mr. Zach has a rich tone, and is a good quartet player. Mr. Adamowski's programme possessed a good share of novelty; after Haydn's D minor quartet, the best known one in the key, came two pieces for the unusual combination of four violincellos, namely, a slumber song by Fitzenhagen and a theme and variations by Klengel. The first is a simple melody, harmonized, and is interesting; the Klengel piece is of more musical value, for although bizarre in its harmonies, it is ably written, the variations being clever in treatment and extremely effective. The players were Messrs. T. Adamowski, Schultz, Campanari and Mingels. Their performance showed the effect of careful rehearsal. The Dvorák quartet was played for the first time here. It is a strange work, not especially Bohemian, not especially musical, at least, so it appears after a single hearing. The composer's fondness for freqdent modulations and abrupt rhythmic changes is apparent in every movement, and also his picturesque striving, but the result is not an harmonious, well-balanced whole, although there are frequent bits of melody that charm. The impression a first performance leaves is disturbing. The playing of the quartet at the concert had both style and spirit, and augurs an even better ensemble as the season develops.

Boston Daily Traveller
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1890.

The Symphony Orchestra will play this week at rehearsal and concert: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; aria from "Sappho," Gounod (Mr. W. C. Wyman); scherzo capriccioso, op 66, Dvorak; songs with piano; Symphony, "Scotch," Mendelssohn.

For the second concert in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, course by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight the programme is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saens; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Wedding March, Mendelssohn. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

The fourth Sunday Popular Concert at the Music Hall next Sunday will have for leading attraction the great Italian tenor, Sig. Campanini, who makes his first appearance in Boston for some time. The Germania band, Francis Gilder, and the Schubert Lady Quartet will also take part in the [illegible]

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 7, 1890

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The second of the concerts given by the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Rondo Capriccioso, for violin.....Saint-Saëns
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saëns
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn

Beethoven had already sketched the symphony in C minor when the idea of the one in B flat presented itself to him, and he immediately worked upon it. Though it comes after the "Heroic" and precedes the fifth, in style it is closer to the second than to its great neighbors: and certain Germans of the ultra modern school are inclined to contemn it, as Nohl, who claims that in spite of the charm of melody and grace of rhythm, the symphony does not reach the hearer's mind "because it does not present any new and powerful idea." But the hearer is more likely to say with Schumann that the symphony of Beethoven which has been last heard seems the greatest, whether it was the first or the ninth. Indeed, this symphony in question had made a deep impression upon Schumann; he often refers to it in his criticisms, and curiously enough he generally speaks of it as "humorous music." Giving the names of the muses to the symphonies, he dubs the fourth "Thalia," and he finds in the adagio that the figure in the bass is the perfect image of Falstaff, a whimsical idea worthy of Johannes Kreisler himself. As for the real and many beauties of the work, nothing new can be said about them. Berlioz has summed up the whole matter, and his was the court of last resort.

The performance of the symphony was excellent. Take, for instance, an apparently simple passage in the first allegro; it is an example of uniform rhythm where the crescendo of the ascending progression increases the "weight" of sound so that "the tempo will overflow the measure," and the degree of fulness will surpass the degree of sostenuto demanded by the composer: a famous passage often referred to by writers on the art of directing. Mr. Nikisch exercised the greatest care, and the result was beauty instead of confusion, and it is seldom that the passage referred to is not butchered by careless or ignorant conductors. In his direction of adagios and allegros, Mr. Nikisch is evidently governed by the theories of Wagner, who claimed that an allegro of Beethoven was dominated by a fundamental melody which was hinted at in the adagio which preceded; hence in such an allegro there should be a greater elasticity in treatment, while the allegros of Mozart and Haydn, which are full of a saturnalian joy, cannot be played too fast. Mr. Nikisch accepts the first statement; he denies, at least by overt act, the latter.

Saint-Saëns has written the ablest defence of the right of the "symphonic poem" to take the place of the symphony, and he has intensified the force of his argument by composing the "Danse Macabre" and "Phaëton." The "Danse Macabre," a musical illustration of the wild poetry of Cazalis, is certainly a most remarkable composition; it is strong from both the musical and dramatic standpoints; and the fine taste which characterizes his works saves him in this "pictorial" music from a realism which is but rank vulgarity. Hanslick has spoken of the irony of Saint-Saëns with which he regards his handiwork, which prevents him from exaggeration and from falling down and worshipping his own creation. Perhaps after all a composer should not too thoroughly believe in himself. Better the ironical self-examination of Saint-Saëns than the implicit faith of Gounod in his own greatness.

Although the "Danse Macabre" was finely played, it was not warmly applauded by the audience; nor for that matter was the symphony received with much enthusiasm. The "Lohengrin Prelude" and the violin playing of Mr. Adamowski met with great favor. The "Prelude," as given by the orchestra last evening, was certainly most effective, the feature of the concert. Mr. Adamowski gave upon the whole a very respectable performance of the "Rondo" by Saint-Saëns.

The next concert will take place the evening of Dec. 4.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, NOV. 7.

Symphony Players in Cambridge.

Cambridge people were delighted with the second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday evening, in the Sanders Theatre. The place is admirable in its acoustic properties, and the beauties of programme and performance could hardly have been made obvious more clearly. Mr. Adamowski performed a rondo by Saint Saens in his best manner, and Mr. Nikisch and his musicians were heard to singular advantage in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Saint Saens' "Danse Macabre," and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March."

Date 11/4

There is a heavy subscription sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts. This organization has completely usurped the place in the estimation of Philadelphia concert-goers once held by the Thomas Orchestra.

Election returns will be read this evening at the National and the Central Theatres. At the latter house the performance will not begin until 9 o'clock P.M.

clipping from

No. American, Phil., Pa.

Date 11/3

The sale of tickets for the season of six symphony concerts to be given at the Academy of Music by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra will begin to-day at 1119 Chestnut street. As the pressure for good places is sure to be great, early application should be made to avoid disappointment. It is announced that among other eminent artists who have been engaged to take part in these concerts are Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the brilliant soprano singer, and Vladimir de Pachman, the famous pianoforte virtuoso. To-day the sale begins.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Clipping from Philadelphia Pa
Date 11/3

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Seats for the Boston Symphony Concerts can be secured, beginning this morning at 1119 Chestnut street. There are to be six concerts, the first of which will take place Wednesday evening, November 12.

St... ...n D.C.
Date 11/3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—General interest is felt in the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season and when the first concert date arrives Mr. Nikisch will have had his players in constant training for more than a month. Among the solo artists to appear in the series are Mr. Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the famous Russian pianist and interpreter of Chopin's music. The generous patronage received here warrants the addition of one extra concert, thus making a series of six, to be given on Thursday evenings, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and Wednesday evenings, March 25, and April 29. The sale of subscription tickets will open tomorrow morning at Ellis' music store.

Clipping from Courier
New Haven Co
Date 11-5

HYPERION THEATER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be at this house, November 10, for the first of a series of concerts. The able conductor of this orchestra will again wield the baton upon this occasion. That the theater will be crowded is already assured.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Post.
Washington D.C.
Date 11/5

The Symphony Orchestra.

The remarkable interest in the coming series of concerts at Lincoln Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was shown by the long line of purchasers at the opening sale of season tickets yesterday morning. The sale was the largest that the organization has ever had in this city.

Clipping from Post
Washington D.C.
11-2

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Sale of Seats Opens at Ellis' Next Tuesday Morning.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in increased ranks, under the guidance of its able conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, announces its annual series of concerts at Lincoln Music Hall. The many warm friends of the orchestra will be pleased to note an increase in the number of concerts usually given, making a series of six, to take place on the evenings of November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, March 25, and April 29. While the main attraction at these concerts must ever be the superb players of the orchestra, the management will not be unmindful of the expectation of the public in regard to solo artists. Engagements have already been effected with Herr Theodor Reichmann, of the German Opera Company, a great favorite with the New York public, and with Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the famous Russian pianist and unrivaled Chopin interpreter.

The Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent.

Careful examination of many works laid before him in Europe last summer has enabled Mr. Nikisch to add to his repertoire and to keep abreast of the genuine musical progress of the day, while the solid works of the masters will always have an honored place.

"Boston has become even more enthusiastic than in the past over its favorite band of artists, and a seat at its concerts, save to those who were so fortunate as to provide themselves long in advance, or who are content to wait two hours before the gate opens to rush for seats on stairs or in odd corners, has become a thing unattainable.

A similar state of things may be looked for here before many seasons, if it is not now imminent, and early attendance at the subscription sale, which opens next Thursday morning at 937 Pennsylvania avenue, is advisable.

Clipping from Press Phil. Pa.
Date 11-2

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in increased ranks, under the guidance of its able conductor, Arthur Nikisch, announces its annual series of concerts at the Academy of Music. The many friends of this orchestra will be pleased to note an increase of one over the number of concerts heretofore given, making a series of six, to take place on Wednesday evenings, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, and Monday evenings, March 23 and April 27. While the main attraction at these concerts must ever be the superb playing of the orchestra, the management will not be unmindful of the expectation of the public that solo artists will lend their aid, and engagements are pending or already made with eminent soloists. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there, and through the severe drill and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent. Careful examination of many works laid before him in Europe last Summer has enabled Mr. Nikisch to add to his repertoire, and to keep abreast of the genuine musical progress of the day, while the solid works of the masters will always have an honored place. Boston has become even more enthusiastic than in the past over its favorite band of artists and a seat at its concerts, save to those who were so fortunate as to provide themselves long in advance, or who are content to wait two hours before the gate opens to rush for seats on stairs or in odd corners, has become a thing unattainable. A similar state of things may be looked for here before many seasons, if it be not now imminent, and early attendance at the succeription sale which opens to-morrow morning at 1119 Chestnut Street is advisable.

Clipping from Call.
Philadelphia Pa
10/31.
Date

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give a series of six grand concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, March 23, and April 27. The sale of subscription tickets will open next Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The impression made by the first pair of works on last Saturday evening's programme must have depended mainly on the state of mind in which the auditor disposed himself to hear them. Both were new to Music Hall, although one had been heard last season in the course of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts. The first was Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture, which is so long that it might be set down among symphonic poems, were it not that its irregularity and lack of properly progressive treatment would exclude it for informality. The composer has given no hint in words of his ideas or purposes, and Mr. Philip Hale notes in the Post that its material is so slight and its treatment so wandering that it would appear to be but poor stuff if it were stripped from the full orchestral score and placed upon the pianoforte. This is undoubtedly true, but it is a thought apart and irrelevant; Beethoven's fifth symphony cuts a queer figure in Mr. P. S. Gilmore's brass band scoring, and the "Moonlight" sonata was inane triviality when Mr. Aptommas transcribed it for the harp. As Goldmark has made his overture for an orchestra, it is there that it should be considered. It there appears as a sufficiently clear and suggestive tone-picture of what a poet in music may have conceived to be the feelings of Prometheus chained to his rock—pride in matchless triumph, regret for opportunities now lost in barren confinement, anger, defiance, hope and aspiration on the spiritual side, and, on the material, fierce and unavailing efforts to burst the brazen bonds in sunder, bitter and woeful outcries, alternating with moments of repose and patience. Certainly it requires no great imagination to find all these moods symbolized in the great bold harmonies, often progressing by strange chromatic steps, the sudden outbreaks, the quiet, sweet melodious strains, the fluctuating tempi, the fitful voicings and the sombre mood from which all these proceed and to which at last they all return. The concerto, which followed this work, was that in G minor, by Sgambati, the Roman pianist and composer. Received abroad with a good deal of favor, it has also been dispraised, and several Boston critics have been stern and unfavorable in their judgments of it. Considered according to the canons by which concertos are generally judged, it is unacceptable, for it is discursive, vacillating and unacademic in treatment, being more like an extended rhapsody in three parts than anything else. It has melody enough, but little systematic use is made of this, while, on the other hand, what is most effective technically in it has comparatively little which is essential to illustrate. Yet it is capable of giving a pleasure to the unsophisticated ear and to the mind which will not demand of a tree the fruit it was not made to bear, because it has skilful and sometimes bold and rich scoring and sonorous combinations, while the pianoforte is used with apt knowledge of its capacity. It often creates a curious impression of being less a studied and deliberately-written work than an improvisation which had somehow been caught and set down as it was passing. Interest attaches to it because it comes from the hand of man who is in high repute at home and of whose talent Liszt thought highly, while, for those who can read between lines, its pages reveal a hesitating, doubtful and almost timid temperament, lacking force to pursue to the end and shrinking from extremes in expression as a sensitive disposition shrinks from too loud a sound or too definite an emphasis. Regarded not as an absolute concerto, but merely as an essay for piano and orchestra, there are good material and workmanship in it, and it should be afforded a respectable place for the sake of the aural gratification it can give. Mr. H. G. Tucker played the solo part excellently in all respects and the orchestra seconded him to perfection. The other two numbers on the programme, Moszkowski's favorite suite in F and the Valkyre ride were thoroughly well played, as also was the overture. Tonight's programme is standard enough, as its instrumental numbers are Gade's "Ossian" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Dvorák's "Scherzo Cappriccioso"; the contralto, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, will sing twice.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia Pa
Date 11/3

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Seats for the Boston Symphony Concerts can be secured, beginning this morning at 1119 Chestnut street. There are to be six concerts, the first of which will take place Wednesday evening, November 12.

O. O.

Date 11/3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—General interest is felt in the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season and when the first concert date arrives Mr. Nikisch will have had his players in constant training for more than a month. Among the solo artists to appear in the series are Mr. Theodor Reichmann of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the famous Russian pianist and interpreter of Chopin's music. The generous patronage received here warrants the addition of one extra concert, thus making a series of six, to be given on Thursday evenings, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and Wednesday evenings, March 25, and April 29. The sale of subscription tickets will open tomorrow morning at Ellis' music store.

Clipping from Courier
New Haven Ct
Date 11 3

HYPERION THEATER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be at this house, November 10, for the first of a series of concerts. The able conductor of this orchestra will again wield the baton upon this occasion. That the theater will be crowded is already assured.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Post.
Washington D. C.
Date 11/5

The Symphony Orchestra.

The remarkable interest in the comi[ng] series of concerts at Lincoln Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was shown by the long line of purchasers at the opening sale of season tickets yesterday morning. The sale was the largest that the organization has ever had in this city.

Clipping from Post
Washington D. C.
Date 11-2

Mr. Alfred Pinkerton.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Sale of Seats Opens at Ellis' Next Tuesday Morning.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in increased ranks, under the guidance of its able conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, announces its annual series of concerts at Lincoln Music Hall. The many warm friends of the orchestra will be pleased to note an increase in the number of concerts usually given, making a series of six, to take place on the evenings of November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, March 25, and April 29. While the main attraction at these concerts must ever be the superb players of the orchestra, the management will not be unmindful of the expectation of the public in regard to solo artists. Engagements have already been effected with Herr Theodor Reichmann, of the German Opera Company, a great favorite with the New York public, and with Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the famous Russian pianist and unrivaled Chopin interpreter.

The Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent.

Careful examination of many works laid before him in Europe last summer has enabled Mr. Nikisch to add to his repertoire and to keep abreast of the genuine musical progress of the day, while the solid works of the masters will always have an honored place.

Boston has become even more enthusiastic than in the past over its favorite band of artists, and a seat at its concerts, save to those who were so fortunate as to provide themselves long in advance, or who are content to wait two hours before the gate opens to rush for seats on stairs or in odd corners, has become a thing unattainable.

A similar state of things may be looked for here before many seasons, if it is not now imminent, and early attendance at the subscription sale, which opens next Thursday morning at 937 Pennsylvania avenue, is advisable.

Clipping from Press Phil. Pa.
Date 11-2

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in increased ranks, under the guidance of its able conductor, Arthur Nikisch, announces its annual series of concerts at the Academy of Music. The many friends of this orchestra will be pleased to note an increase of one over the number of concerts heretofore given, making a series of six, to take place on Wednesday evenings, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, and Monday evenings, March 23 and April 27. While the main attraction at these concerts must ever be the superb playing of the orchestra, the management will not be unmindful of the expectation of the public that solo artists will lend their aid, and engagements are pending or already made with eminent soloists. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there, and through the severe drill and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent. Careful examination of many works laid before him in Europe last Summer has enabled Mr. Nikisch to add to his repertoire, and to keep abreast of the genuine musical progress of the day, while the solid works of the masters will always have an honored place. Boston has become even more enthusiastic than in the past over its favorite band of artists and a seat at its concerts, save to those who were so fortunate as to provide themselves long in advance, or who are content to wait two hours before the gate opens to rush for seats on stairs or in odd corners, has become a thing unattainable. A similar state of things may be looked for here before many seasons, if it be not now imminent, and early attendance at the sucscription sale which opens to-morrow morning at 1119 Chestnut Street is advisable.

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia Pa
Date 10/31.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give a series of six grand concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, March 23, and April 27. The sale of subscription tickets will open next Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The impression made by the first pair of works on last Saturday evening's programme must have depended mainly on the state of mind in which the auditor disposed himself to hear them. Both were new to Music Hall, although one had been heard last season in the course of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts. The first was Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture, which is so long that it might be set down among symphonic poems, were it not that its irregularity and lack of properly progressive treatment would exclude it for informality. The composer has given no hint in words of his ideas or purposes, and Mr. Philip Hale notes in the Post that its material is so slight and its treatment so wandering that it would appear to be but poor stuff if it were stripped from the full orchestral score and placed upon the pianoforte. This is undoubtedly true, but it is a thought apart and irrelevant; Beethoven's fifth symphony cuts a queer figure in Mr. P. S. Gilmore's brass band scoring, and the "Moonlight" sonata was inane triviality when Mr. Aptommas transcribed it for the harp. As Goldmark has made his overture for an orchestra, it is there that it should be considered. It there appears as a sufficiently clear and suggestive tone-picture of what a poet in music may have conceived to be the feelings of Prometheus chained to his rock—pride in matchless triumph, regret for opportunities now lost in barren confinement, anger, defiance, hope and aspiration on the spiritual side, and, on the material, fierce and unavailing efforts to burst the brazen bonds in sunder, bitter and woeful outcries, alternating with moments of repose and patience. Certainly it requires no great imagination to find all these moods symbolized in the great bold harmonies, often progressing by strange chromatic steps, the sudden outbreaks, the quiet, sweet melodious strains, the fluctuating tempi, the fitful voicings and the sombre mood from which all these proceed and to which at last they all return. The concerto, which followed this work, was that in G minor, by Sgambati, the Roman pianist and composer. Received abroad with a good deal of favor, it has also been dispraised, and several Boston critics have been stern and unfavorable in their judgments of it. Considered according to the canons by which concertos are generally judged, it is unacceptable, for it is discursive, vacillating and unacademic in treatment, being more like an extended rhapsody in three parts than anything else. It has melody enough, but little systematic use is made of this, while, on the other hand, what is most effective technically in it has comparatively little which is essential to illustrate. Yet it is capable of giving a pleasure to the unsophisticated ear and to the mind which will not demand of a tree the fruit it was not made to bear, because it has skilful and sometimes bold and rich scoring and sonorous combinations, while the pianoforte is used with apt knowledge of its capacity. It often creates a curious impression of being less a studied and deliberately-written work than an improvisation which had somehow been caught and set down as it was passing. Interest attaches to it because it comes from the hand of man who is in high repute at home and of whose talent Liszt thought highly, while, for those who can read between lines, its pages reveal a hesitating, doubtful and almost timid temperament, lacking force to pursue to the end and shrinking from extremes in expression as a sensitive disposition shrinks from too loud a sound or too definite an emphasis. Regarded not as an absolute concerto, but merely as an essay for piano and orchestra, there are good material and workmanship in it, and it should be afforded a respectable place for the sake of the aural gratification it can give. Mr. H. G. Tucker played the solo part excellently in all respects and the orchestra seconded him to perfection. The other two numbers on the programme, Moszkowski's favorite suite in F and the Valkyre ride were thoroughly well played, as also was the overture. Tonight's programme is standard enough, as its instrumental numbers are Gade's "Ossian" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Dvorák's "Scherzo Cappriccioso"; the contralto, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, will sing twice.

[37]

The Saturday Evening Paper

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The fourth Symphony Concert was a concert without a symphony, nor was it on this account less interesting to musician or layman, nor was it the less to be praised. It is a relief to occasionally forget that there are symphonies in four movements. In this city we take our musical pleasures seriously, almost sadly. Too many of the Symphony Concerts oblige the devout hearer to undergo a preparatory season of fasting and prayer; and the joy shown at the performance is a chastened joy which finds no vent in vulgar, noisy enthusiasm, but rather in intense breathing after an adagio and a delicate clapping of the hands after the final chord which accompanies the letter Y made by the outstretched arms of Mr. Nikisch. While many sit during the half-hour feast with an air of gloom, thinking with a celebrated Englishman that life would be endurable were it not for its pleasures.

* * * * *

The program was made up of Goldmark's overture "Prometheus Bound," op. 38, played for the first time in Boston; Moszkowski's suite in F., No. 1 op. 39, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrs." And there was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, op. 15, by Sgambati, the pianoforte part of which was played by Mr. Hiram G. Tucker. The concert lasted nearly two hours. It was too long.

* * * * *

The Goldmark overture is chiefly remarkable for its impressive opening and for the gorgeous instrumentation of the whole work. It is dramatic, it is cleverly put together, but it is not spontaneous. It does not seem to have jumped from the composer's brain, alive and panoplied, as "Egmont" or "Coriolanus." Nor are the themes of great originality. It is, however, an interesting, at times singularly impressive composition, which shows, to be sure, the influence of Wagner, but a healthy influence which is received by Goldmark and used by him for his good and not for his harm. And it is free from annexed catalogues of objects of beauty and things to be admired. Supposing that a disciple of the Liszt-Wagner school, some well-meaning composer, who, without the genius of these great men, had absorbed their theories and tried to write "up to them," such a one for example as Von Goldschmidt, had taken for his text this same "Prometheus," we should have all been drowned in a sea of short phrases, each one of which would have been a ticketed leit-motiv. We should have had our attention called to the "fire motive," to the "chain and rock motive," to the "sea-nymph motive"; and what possibilities of descriptive and realistic music does the combination of "bird and liver" suggest to the inflammable mind of a worshiper of the new religion, for the steadily decreasing and constantly renewed anatomical organ of Prometheus might be well represented by alternate diminished and augmented chords held by the wood-wind while the strings pizzacato could depict the action of the hungry bird. Why did Goldmark so neglect his opportunities?

* * * * *

The suite of Moszkowski was a delight from beginning to end; it was superbly played and thoroughly enjoyed. Would that works of this nature were more often heard in Music Hall. It would be a pleasure for instance to hear the charming Suite which Delibes originally wrote as incidental music for the revival of Hugo's "Le roi s'amuse"; or the suites of Bizet and Massenet; or the many interesting works of others of the modern French school. They are not deemed worthy, however, of a place upon the symphony programs or the dignity of evening dress; when they are played, it is at a "Young People's Popular" where they are performed almost with an apology and treated with frock-coated indifference. Such a suite as "Le roi s'amuse" is from a purely musical standpoint head and shoulders above the dreary rubbish which the audience is often obliged to listen to, such musical nightmares as Volkmann's "Richard III." or the Sgambati concerto played last Saturday evening. Are they too "light"? But the artist is seen even in the cutting of cameos. "La belle Hélène" is in its way as great a work of art as "Fidelio," and Beethoven could no more have written the one than Offenbach the other. And only a genius could have written the best waltzes of Strauss. But we grope about in German mists, which have blown in upon us and settled at our own whistling; and we daily accustom ourselves to the thick, damp fog and say it is purer and healthier than clear air and a blue sky. We pay American money for the privilege of submitting to German dictation, and when a German Simon says "Thumbs up" no one is rude enough to rebel. At the same time there is good music written outside of the confines of the German Empire, and this fact is realized in Germany itself where the catholicity of concert programs and opera repertoires puts to shame our fashionable bigotry.

* * * * *

The Sgambati concerto was played for the first time in Boston at a concert given by Mr. Lang last spring; and upon that occasion as upon this Mr. Tucker played the pianoforte part. It is a thankless work for the player, as severe a task for him to play as for the audience to hear. The first movement is without form, and void: the orchestra constantly announces that the pianoforte will do something; and the pianoforte part like many an advertised ware does not equal the handbill which describes its merits. The crescendos anticipate the climaxes; the diminuendos lead to absolutely nothing. The themes are valueless, the digressions are impertinent. The second movement is a romanza without romance, and the third movement is like unto the hill which gained by the weary traveler affords him a view of his journey's end. Mr. Tucker showed perseverance and the results of mechanical application; in other words, he manfully ploughed his way through rocky soil. Fortunately the concerto did not make heavy demands upon that mysterious quality of a pianist known as "temperament."

* * * * *

VISITING BOSTONIANS.

Mr. Nikisch, the musician that is so much liked in Boston, is here, and proposes to give a concert at Chickering Hall. He has rather kept to himself and made no attempt to meet New York socially, although I understand he brought some very good letters of introduction from Bostonians to friends in New York. I hope if he presents them he will be treated with due consideration. We, that is Americans, are wofully ignorant or very impolite regarding letters of introduction, which, with our English proclivities, would be strange, were it not we are a selfish nation, and are loath to do anything for which we do not see an immediate return. I know of a well known literary woman, who is young and attractive, she had a letter of introduction almost forced upon her to Brander Mathews, and only consented to take it because she feared by refusal that she would offend the mutual friend who gave the letter. It happened that this young woman was going to Narragansett Pier, where Mr. Brander Mathews was stopping. She sent him the letter but he never took the slightest notice of it, although the writer of the letter was a very intimate friend. But all people who receive similar letters are not so peculiar in their methods as Mr. Mathews, and I think if Mr. Nikisch presents his letters, he will receive a welcome, although New York society does not as a rule care much for musical people off the stage.

CAMBRIDGE TRIBUNE

SATURDAY NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

The Second Symphony Concert.

Cambridge audiences are to be congratulated on the programmes that Mr. Nikisch arranges for them. The two concerts already given in Sanders theatre were more interesting than any of those yet given in Boston this season. The pieces played last Thursday, except the solo, are thoroughly familiar to concert-goers, but their arrangement was a novelty. Mr. Gericke once said to the writer: "What can you hear after a Beethoven symphony?" On this theory, he almost always placed the symphony last, with the result that many people invariably left the hall before the end of the concert. Many of the best directors put the symphony at the beginning, or in the middle, which seems, in many cases, the preferable arrangement. Certainly, the audience is more ready and able to listen to what is apt to be the heaviest part of the concert, if it comes first. In last Thursday's concert the symphony was Beethoven's fourth. Its most obvious characteristic, distinguishing it, as a whole, from the others by Beethoven, is its unceasing brightness and cheerfulness. From beginning to end, excepting some transient gloom in the introduction and in the Finale, there is hardly a sombre bar. The gay first subject, the sportive conversation of the bassoon, oboe, flute and clarinet, the syncopations that are cheerful and not tragic, all leave an impression of unbroken happiness. The humorous phrases of the bassoon, and their excellent performance, were noteworthy. The performance of the whole symphony was all that could be desired. The last movement is a veritable perpetual motion, and much more interesting in every way than the piece of Paganini's that was played at the first concert.

After the symphony came four short pieces, all of a popular character. The novelty of the occasion was a Rondo Capriccioso for violin, by Saint-Saëns, brilliantly played by Mr. T. Adamowski. The piece itself is a fascinating example of the modern French school of orchestral writing. While lacking in the massive strength and depth of the German school, in artistic finish, in original, piquant and charmingly clear effects, this school is, to use the current French expression, quite fin du siècle. Against the beautiful and suggestive orchestral background Mr. Adamowski displayed all the fire and brilliancy, as well as the poetic grace and technical perfection, that he has taught us to expect from him.

Of the rest of the programme, the Prelude of "Lohengrin" received such a performance as we never heard before, from Mr. Gericke, Mr. Seidl or Mr. Thomas. The high notes of the opening were played by the flutes and violins with all possible purity and smoothness, and gradually the rest of the orchestra joined in making a climax that inspired the audience to an unusual degree. Whatever one may think of Wagner's theories, it must be admitted that in this prelude he has composed a masterpiece.

As to the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, some musicians say that a fantastic waltz of this kind is out of place in a Symphony concert, but we think it decidedly not out of place. Sensational it undoubtedly is, but it is fascinating in its ingenuity. Of the dramatis personæ of the piece, Mr. Kneisel presented death, and tuned up his violin, and led off the wild dance in the most fiery manner, contrasting well the grotesque, clattering theme, and the more sombre one that represents the loneliness of the nocturnal scene. The whole piece is a repetition of these two themes in ever-varying combinations. The stroke of midnight was especially well given on the harp and horn, and Mr. Greene made the bones rattle on his xylophone. Finally the cock, represented by the oboe, put an end to the orgy, and the spectral dancers laid themselves in their graves again.

Last on the programme was Mendelssohn's Wedding March. Why this was played we are at a loss to guess. Mr. Nikisch chose to play it, however, and he played it as it is seldom heard. We advise all who think of getting married to engage this orchestra at once. In this, the last number, the drummer, who restrained himself with evident effort all through the evening, finally could restrain himself no longer, and burst forth like a victorious battery of artillery in tremendous efforts to drown all the rest of the instruments. We cannot help thinking that something is wrong when the drums are heard thus plainly over the whole orchestra. Especially in a piece like the Wedding March, undue prominence of one instrument throws the whole piece out of proportion.

The audience was larger than at the previous concert. Strict regard for accuracy compels us to admit that perhaps a dozen seats were vacant, but this was fewer than before. The reciprocal influence of the audience and the orchestra upon each other was marked, for the applause, especially after Mr. Adamowski's solo and the "Lohengrin," was actually what passes in Cambridge for enthusiasm, and, on the other hand, the orchestra and the soloist have rarely played more enjoyably. It was gratifying to note that the attention of the audience was held to the end, and very few persons left the hall till the last strains of the Wedding March had died away. K. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

The Second Sanders Theatre Concert.

If the Mozart Symphony in G minor was heard to rare advantage in that beautiful and acoustically favorable academic theatre, so was the symphony which headed the second programme, for last Thursday evening, which read as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony in B flat, No. 4.
Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Saint-Saëns—Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.
Saint-Saëns—Danse Macabre.
Mendelssohn—Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Beethoven's fourth symphony, composed not two years after the "Eroica," and after he had begun the great C minor, comes between them like a gentle episode in the grander aspiration of his genius. Berlioz and others, attracted by certain secondary incidental themes which occur in the midst of its serious progress, especially that interposed by the bassoon in the middle of the first allegro, have much to say of the humorous character of this symphony. It has always impressed us, on the contrary, as strung to the tune of love, as much so as the song, "Adelaide," and such sonatas as the "Pathétique," the "Mondschein" and the one entitled "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour." The warmth and tenderness of all the music justifies this thought. Deep, brooding, thoughtful, half Platonic love reveals itself in the profoundly serious, absorbed and meditative Adagio, preluding the Allegro vivace, which leaps forth from it, like Pallas, full armed, from the brain of Zeus. How it teems with fire, with rapture, with quick self-surprised invention, with longing tenderness, with delicate shapes and hues of beauty, with tiptoe tread of triumph, aye, and with exquisite bits of humor; for humor is the heat lightning of the brain when it is intensely concentrated and the heart is full. So humor came to Shakspeare, even in the midst of deepest tragedy. With what rich warmth the clarinets and all the wood-wind and the horns flow in softening the outlines with a mellow, heavenly sunset color! It is love, with its raptures and despairs, its glorious, boundless faith, its fitful moods, its infinite longings, its Platonic reveries and self-renunciation, its exquisite caprices, its depths "most musical, most melancholly," its heaven-storming, rapturous chivalry. Compare it with one of the Italian operas, which once were thought to be the most ideal utterance of tender passion; what a warmth and depth and energy of feeling; what an outgushing from sweet secret springs of melody; what a wealth of fancy and of ever fresh invention: what a delightful play of humor struck off from the solid, serious main motive only to set off its earnestness—what a growing interest as of an ever-deepening plot; what spontaneous efflorescence of embellishment, as natural as the moss and wild-flower clothing of the rocks in the landscape; what choice colorings and effects!

The second movement, adagio, E-flat, three-four, confirms what we have said. Here we come into the very heart and centre of the love motive of the work. In the first measure the second violins announce what afterwards underlies the whole movement, the drum-like throb of two notes, tonic and dominant, then changes into the little catching, sobbing figure of accompaniment, upon which the first violins begin their marvellously beautiful, long, lingering melody, which takes eight measures to complete itself (like a wondrous lovely meteor occupying its full quarter of the heavens); then of course the melody repeats itself in other instruments, particularly the clarinet, with its human quality of tone; and so on, the throbbings continually recurring, higher or lower, in the orchestral compass, until it finally goes out in the beats of the tympani, which seem inspired and humanized for the occasion. The Minuet, B-flat again, three-four, is like showers of roses, flung from full arms, dropping through lower and lower circles, as the motive echoes itself through lower instruments; and when the horns come in in the trio, it takes on a deeper sentiment, and poetry and play mingle in one soulful, deep expression. The uncontainable momentum, and sustained velocity of the final Allegro, is in perfect keeping with all that has preceded in the symphony. We think we never heard it played with so much truth of outline and such chaste warmth of feeling. Such a work stands between the greater third and fifth of the nine symphonies somewhat as "As You Like It" or the "Tempest" stands between "Lear" and "Hamlet," so many sided, universal was this Shakspeare of music.

Wagner's prelude to his "Lohengrin," which we always thought the highest reach of his genius, at least so far as its purely musical quality is concerned, is one of the best of his instrumental movements which have been adapted to concert performances. It has beauty and consistency. Its idea being to prefigure the approach of the swan-borne boat bearing the knight of the Holy Grail, it opens with a sustained high violin note, representing the level high white line of the distant horizon over the water; as the swan approaches, the line thickens, the harmony becomes fuller, broader, until it reaches a tutti fortissimo as it is close upon us; then the process is reversed, and correspondingly the vision recedes, decrescendo, until it dies away again in the distance. It is a good piece of musical scene-painting and is not without melodic motives which anticipate some points in the drama, and it is worked up with consummate skill, without extravagance or overdoing. The instrumentation certainly is masterly, and the performance won the great applause of the evening.

The rondo capriccioso of Saint-Saëns answered to its title. It is a bright and clever work, its winsome, light and lively themes coming round again and again, as a rondo should, and charmingly capricious. It is all very quaint and pretty. Mr. Adamowski played it with great refinement and finesse, of certainty and finish, with piquant emphasis where the melody required it; and the orchestral accompaniment was very satisfactory.

The devil has been brought forward as an adroit fiddle virtuoso before now. Whether Tartini was the first to do it, in his "Trillo del Diavolo," we know not. He dreamed it, then rushed to ruled paper and wrote it down. His sulphuric majesty has become so much at home in the most modern music that there is now no need of dreaming. Saint-Saëns, in his weird musical freak, the "Danse Macabre," has only dragged into realistic noonday sunlight a Middle Age superstitious legend; and grisly and sulphurous enough has he made it. The first notes of his majesty, as he tunes his fiddle, awake the whole ghostly orchestra, the chiels [illegible] dry bones rattle, the cock crows and [illegible] ing bell rings, and away they all scamper and rustle into silence, and so on. Is this a true theme for music? If music has a real, a God-appointed purpose in this world, is it not to banish all such wicked and uncanny spells as that? That the composition is amazingly ingenious, and that it was wonderfully well performed, no one in the Sanders Theatre that evening can doubt; but is it not a prostitution of the noble art? Is it not an insult to the finer sentiments which seek for strength and sustenance in art?

Who ever heard the "Wedding March," more grandly rendered than it was that evening? You could scarcely help seeing a noble couple walking up to the altar, that is to the stage, to that exulting and inspiring harmony. All the three phases of the march were equally vivid and expressive: First, the heroic, knightly movement; then the quiet dignity of the civic section of the procession; then the tender, thoughtful, sympathetic converse of the family and intimates; and then again the resounding triumph of the march in all its glory.

J. S. D.

The fourth popular concert in Music Hall will be given tomorrow night. Mr. Italo Campanini will sing, and other musicians engaged are the Germania Band, Mr. J. F. Gilder, pianoforte, and the Schubert Ladies' Quartet. Mr. Campanini's solos are from "Aida" and "Carmen." The orchestral works promised are mainly light music, but are in widely varied styles.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will be given on Saturday night, Nov. 22.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 9, 1890.

Tour of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, director, will tomorrow start on a week's trip, the first of the season. Manager C. A. Ellis starts tonight in advance, and the orchestra will be under the care of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee. The orchestra will leave for New Haven tomorrow at 1 o'clock on the Old Colony railroad. Arriving there at 6 o'clock, a concert will be given, with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman as the soloist. At the close of the concert the members of the orchestra will leave New Haven on the New Haven steamboat line for New York, where they give a concert Tuesday night in Chickering Hall, instead of Steinway Hall, as in previous years. Mrs. Wyman is the soloist here also. Wednesday morning the orchestra will leave New York for Philadelphia, where a concert is given at the Academy of Music, Mme. Clementine de Vere being the soloist. Thursday evening will find the orchestra at Washington, where a concert will be given in Lincoln Hall, with Herr Theodore Reichman as soloist. Immediately after the concert the orchestra leaves Washington, arriving in New York, Friday morning, and Boston, Friday afternoon. On the trip to be made in December the orchestra commences a series of concerts in Baltimore. The sales in all of the above cities are far in advance of any previous year, and immense audiences are already assured. In Philadelphia, the attendance is always very large, with the same features attending the Boston rehearsals, the crowd of "rush tickets" holders assembling an hour before the doors are open. At the majority of the concerts every reserved seat is sold in the Academy of Music, which seats 3000. In Washington also the success of the series is most flattering. On one occasion last season the authorities actually stopped the sale of tickets, claiming that the house was overcrowded.

——The Boston patrons of the Symphony orchestra will learn with gratification of the great assured success of that organization in its coming visits to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The advance sale in Philadelphia and Washington is already larger than the entire sale of last season, and is due altogether to the indefatigable personal work of Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, who has been in these cities the past week.

——The Boston Symphony Orchestra start on a week's tour tomorrow, opening in New Haven. They will play in New York and Washington also, returning Friday. Assistant Manager F. R. Comee goes in charge.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Symphony Concerts.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night opened with Gade's noble "Ossian" overture, which was given with splendid force and color, and impressive breadth of style. Another fine interpretation and performance was Dvorak's fiery and inspiriting Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, a work abundant in melody and glowingly instrumental. It holds its own admirably on a second hearing. The playing of it throughout was exceedingly brilliant, and the hearty applause that rewarded it was fairly earned. The concert ended with Mendelssohn's ever fresh and always delightful "Scotch symphony." Mr. Nikisch accorded it a remarkably fine reading, save in the first allegro the opening bars of which he took at a funereal pace that was wholly unaccountable in presence of the composer's time indication Allegro un poco agitato. The allegro melted into andante and the agitato disappeared wholly. Many innovations were made in the tempo of this movement throughout, and to the disadvantage of its flow, a somewhat disjointed effect being imparted to it in consequence. The rest of the symphony was faultlessly interpreted. The work of the orchestra was up to its best standard. The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose first contribution to the concert was the well-known air from Gounod's "Sappho." The lovely quality of her well-trained voice had here ample field for its display, and it was delightful in the hearing. She sang, with admirable phrasing, and in a sustained style that did the fullest justice to the music. Later, she sang "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet; and "A une Fiancée," by Ferrari, in a thoroughly charming manner, displaying taste and refined artistic sentiment in them all. The Delibes song was taken perhaps a trifle too slow, and dragged in consequence, but the artist's frank and honest singing made her always interesting. She was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled as heartily after both the Gounod air and the group of songs. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; Concerto for Violincello, Haydn (first time); Symphonic Poem, "Vltaca," Smetana; and Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven. Mr. Anton Hekking is to be the soloist.

——The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its four New York concerts at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The sale of seats by subscription is the largest that has ever been had in that city, and it is safe to prophesy that in point of quality no such audiences as will this winter greet Mr. Nikisch's appearance on the platform have, as yet, been brought together by the band in New York.

[37]

The Saturday Evening Paper

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The fourth Symphony Concert was a concert without a symphony, nor was it on this account less interesting to musician or layman, nor was it the less to be praised. It is a relief to occasionally forget that there are symphonies in four movements. In this city we take our musical pleasures seriously, almost sadly. Too many of the Symphony Concerts oblige the devout hearer to undergo a preparatory season of fasting and prayer; and the joy shown at the performance is a chastened joy which finds no vent in vulgar, noisy enthusiasm, but rather in intense breathing after an adagio and a delicate clapping of the hands after the final chord which accompanies the letter Y made by the outstretched arms of Mr. Nikisch. While many sit during the half-hour feast with an air of gloom, thinking with a celebrated Englishman that life would be endurable were it not for its pleasures.

* * * * *

The program was made up of Goldmark's overture "Prometheus Bound," op. 38, played for the first time in Boston; Moszkowski's suite in F., No. 1 op. 39, and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrs." And there was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G minor, op. 15, by Sgambati, the pianoforte part of which was played by Mr. Hiram G. Tucker. The concert lasted nearly two hours. It was too long.

* * * * *

The Goldmark overture is chiefly remarkable for its impressive opening and for the gorgeous instrumentation of the whole work. It is dramatic, it is cleverly put together, but it is not spontaneous. It does not seem to have jumped from the composer's brain, alive and panoplied, as "Egmont" or "Coriolanus." Nor are the themes of great originality. It is, however, an interesting, at times singularly impressive composition, which shows, to be sure, the influence of Wagner, but a healthy influence which is received by Goldmark and used by him for his good and not for his harm. And it is free from annexed catalogues of objects of beauty and things to be admired. Supposing that a disciple of the Liszt-Wagner school, some well-meaning composer, who, without the genius of these great men, had absorbed their theories and tried to write "up to them," such a one for example as Von Goldschmidt, had taken for his text this same "Prometheus," we should have all been drowned in a sea of short phrases, each one of which would have been a ticketed leit-motiv. We should have had our attention called to the "fire motive," to the "chain and rock motive," to the "sea-nymph motive"; and what possibilities of descriptive and realistic music does the combination of "bird and liver" suggest to the inflammable mind of a worshiper of the new religion, for the steadily decreasing and constantly renewed anatomical organ of Prometheus might be well represented by alternate diminished and augmented chords held by the wood-wind while the strings pizzacato could depict the action of the hungry bird. Why did Goldmark so neglect his opportunities?

* * * * *

The suite of Moszkowski was a delight from beginning to end; it was superbly played and thoroughly enjoyed. Would that works of this nature were more often heard in Music Hall. It would be a pleasure for instance to hear the charming Suite which Delibes originally wrote as incidental music for the revival of Hugo's "Le roi s'amuse"; or the suites of Bizet and Massenet; or the many interesting works of others of the modern French school. They are not deemed worthy, however, of a place upon the symphony programs or the dignity of evening dress; when they are played, it is at a "Young People's Popular" where they are performed almost with an apology and treated with frock-coated indifference. Such a suite as "Le roi s'amuse" is from a purely musical standpoint head and shoulders above the dreary rubbish which the audience is often obliged to listen to, such musical nightmares as Volkmann's "Richard III." or the Sgambati concerto played last Saturday evening. Are they too "light"? But the artist is seen even in the cutting of cameos. "La belle Hélène" is in its way as great a work of art as "Fidelio," and Beethoven could no more have written the one than Offenbach the other. And only a genius could have written the best waltzes of Strauss. But we grope about in German mists, which have blown in upon us and settled at our own whistling; and we daily accustom ourselves to the thick, damp fog and say it is purer and healthier than clear air and a blue sky. We pay American money for the privilege of submitting to German dictation, and when a German Simon says "Thumbs up" no one is rude enough to rebel. At the same time there is good music written outside of the confines of the German Empire, and this fact is realized in Germany itself where the catholicity of concert programs and opera repertoires puts to shame our fashionable bigotry.

* * * * *

The Sgambati concerto was played for the first time in Boston at a concert given by Mr. Lang last spring; and upon that occasion as upon this Mr. Tucker played the pianoforte part. It is a thankless work for the player, as severe a task for him to play as for the audience to hear. The first movement is without form, and void: the orchestra constantly announces that the pianoforte will do something; and the pianoforte part like many an advertised ware does not equal the handbill which describes its merits. The crescendos anticipate the climaxes; the diminuendos lead to absolutely nothing. The themes are valueless, the digressions are impertinent. The second movement is a romanza without romance, and the third movement is like unto the hill which gained by the weary traveler affords him a view of his journey's end. Mr. Tucker showed perseverance and the results of mechanical application; in other words, he manfully ploughed his way through rocky soil. Fortunately the concerto did not make heavy demands upon that mysterious quality of a pianist known as "temperament."

* * * * *

VISITING BOSTONIANS.

Mr. Nikisch, the musician that is so much liked in Boston, is here, and proposes to give a concert at Chickering Hall. He has rather kept to himself and made no attempt to meet New York socially, although I understand he brought some very good letters of introduction from Bostonians to friends in New York. I hope if he presents them he will be treated with due consideration. We, that is Americans, are wofully ignorant or very impolite regarding letters of introduction, which, with our English proclivities, would be strange, were it not we are a selfish nation, and are loath to do anything for which we do not see an immediate return. I know of a well known literary woman, who is young and attractive, she had a letter of introduction almost forced upon her to Brander Mathews, and only consented to take it because she feared by refusal that she would offend the mutual friend who gave the letter. It happened that this young woman was going to Narragansett Pier, where Mr. Brander Mathews was stopping. She sent him the letter but he never took the slightest notice of it, although the writer of the letter was a very intimate friend. But all people who receive similar letters are not so peculiar in their methods as Mr. Mathews, and I think if Mr. Nikisch presents his letters, he will receive a welcome, although New York society does not as a rule care much for musical people off the stage.

CAMBRIDGE TRIBUNE

SATURDAY NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

The Second Symphony Concert.

Cambridge audiences are to be congratulated on the programmes that Mr. Nikisch arranges for them. The two concerts already given in Sanders theatre were more interesting than any of those yet given in Boston this season. The pieces played last Thursday, except the solo, are thoroughly familiar to concert-goers, but their arrangement was a novelty. Mr. Gericke once said to the writer: "What can you hear after a Beethoven symphony?" On this theory, he almost always placed the symphony last, with the result that many people invariably left the hall before the end of the concert. Many of the best directors put the symphony at the beginning, or in the middle, which seems, in many cases, the preferable arrangement. Certainly, the audience is more ready and able to listen to what is apt to be the heaviest part of the concert, if it comes first. In last Thursday's concert the symphony was Beethoven's fourth. Its most obvious characteristic, distinguishing it, as a whole, from the others by Beethoven, is its unceasing brightness and cheerfulness. From beginning to end, excepting some transient gloom in the introduction and in the Finale, there is hardly a sombre bar. The gay first subject, the sportive conversation of the bassoon, oboe, flute and clarinet, the syncopations that are cheerful and not tragic, all leave an impression of unbroken happiness. The humorous phrases of the bassoon, and their excellent performance, were noteworthy. The performance of the whole symphony was all that could be desired. The last movement is a veritable perpetual motion, and much more interesting in every way than the piece of Paganini's that was played at the first concert.

After the symphony came four short pieces, all of a popular character. The novelty of the occasion was a Rondo Capriccioso for violin, by Saint-Saëns, brilliantly played by Mr. T. Adamowski. The piece itself is a fascinating example of the modern French school of orchestral writing. While lacking in the massive strength and depth of the German school, in artistic finish, in original, piquant and charmingly clear effects, this school is, to use the current French expression, quite fin du siècle. Against the beautiful and suggestive orchestral background Mr. Adamowski displayed all the fire and brilliancy, as well as the poetic grace and technical perfection, that he has taught us to expect from him.

Of the rest of the programme, the Prelude of "Lohengrin" received such a performance as we never heard before, from Mr. Gericke, Mr. Seidl or Mr. Thomas. The high notes of the opening were played by the flutes and violins with all possible purity and smoothness, and gradually the rest of the orchestra joined in making a climax that inspired the audience to an unusual degree. Whatever one may think of Wagner's theories, it must be admitted that in this prelude he has composed a masterpiece.

As to the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, some musicians say that a fantastic waltz of this kind is out of place in a Symphony concert, but we think it decidedly not out of place. Sensational it undoubtedly is, but it is fascinating in its ingenuity. Of the dramatis personæ of the piece, Mr. Kneisel presented death, and tuned up his violin, and led off the wild dance in the most fiery manner, contrasting well the grotesque, clattering theme, and the more sombre one that represents the loneliness of the nocturnal scene. The whole piece is a repetition of these two themes in ever-varying combinations. The stroke of midnight was especially well given on the harp and horn, and Mr. Greene made the bones rattle on his xylophone. Finally the cock, represented by the oboe, put an end to the orgy, and the spectral dancers laid themselves in their graves again.

Last on the programme was Mendelssohn's Wedding March. Why this was played we are at a loss to guess. Mr. Nikisch chose to play it, however, and he played it as it is seldom heard. We advise all who think of getting married to engage this orchestra at once. In this, the last number, the drummer, who restrained himself with evident effort all through the evening, finally could restrain himself no longer, and burst forth like a victorious battery of artillery in tremendous efforts to drown all the rest of the instruments. We cannot help thinking that something is wrong when the drums are heard thus plainly over the whole orchestra. Especially in a piece like the Wedding March, undue prominence of one instrument throws the whole piece out of proportion.

The audience was larger than at the previous concert. Strict regard for accuracy compels us to admit that perhaps a dozen seats were vacant, but this was fewer than before. The reciprocal influence of the audience and the orchestra upon each other was marked, for the applause, especially after Mr. Adamowski's solo and the "Lohengrin," was actually what passes in Cambridge for enthusiasm, and, on the other hand, the orchestra and the soloist have rarely played more enjoyably. It was gratifying to note that the attention of the audience was held to the end, and very few persons left the hall till the last strains of the Wedding March had died away. K. M.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

The Second Sanders Theatre Concert.

If the Mozart Symphony in G-minor was heard to rare advantage in that beautiful and acoustically favorable academic theatre, so was the symphony which headed the second programme, for last Thursday evening, which read as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony in B flat, No. 4.
Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Saint-Saëns—Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.
Saint-Saëns—Danse Macabre.
Mendelssohn—Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Beethoven's fourth symphony, composed not two years after the "Eroica," and after he had begun the great C minor, comes between them like a gentle episode in the grander aspiration of his genius. Berlioz and others, attracted by certain secondary incidental themes which occur in the midst of its serious progress, especially that interposed by the bassoon in the middle of the first allegro, have much to say of the humorous character of this symphony. It has always impressed us, on the contrary, as strung to the tune of love, as much so as the song, "Adelaide," and such sonatas as the "Pathétique," the "Mondschein" and the one entitled "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour." The warmth and tenderness of all the music justifies this thought. Deep, brooding, thoughtful, half Platonic love reveals itself in the profoundly serious, absorbed and meditative Adagio, preluding the Allegro vivace, which leaps forth from it, like Pallas, full armed, from the brain of Zeus. How it teems with fire, with rapture, with quick self-surprised invention, with longing tenderness, with delicate shapes and hues of beauty, with tiptoe tread of triumph, aye, and with exquisite bits of humor; for humor is the heat lightning of the brain when it is intensely concentrated and the heart is full. So humor came to Shakspeare, even in the midst of deepest tragedy. With what rich warmth the clarinets and all the wood-wind and the horns flow in softening the outlines with a mellow, heavenly sunset color! It is love, with its raptures and despairs, its glorious, boundless faith, its fitful moods, its infinite longings, its Platonic reveries and self-renunciation, its exquisite caprices, its depths "most musical, most melancholly," its heaven-storming, rapturous chivalry. Compare it with one of the Italian operas, which once were thought to be the most ideal utterance of tender passion; what a warmth and depth and energy of feeling; what an outgushing from sweet secret springs of melody; what a wealth of fancy and of ever fresh invention: what a delightful play of humor struck off from the solid, serious main motive only to set off its earnestness—what a growing interest as of an ever-deepening plot; what spontaneous efflorescence of embellishment, as natural as the moss and wild-flower clothing of the rocks in the landscape; what choice colorings and effects!

The second movement, adagio, E-flat, three-four, confirms what we have said. Here we come into the very heart and centre of the love motive of the work. In the first measure the second violins announce what afterwards underlies the whole movement, the drum-like throb of two notes, tonic and dominant, then changes into the little catching, sobbing figure of accompaniment, upon which the first violins begin their marvellously beautiful, long, lingering melody, which takes eight measures to complete itself (like a wondrous lovely meteor occupying its full quarter of the heavens); then of course the melody repeats itself in other instruments, particularly the clarinet, with its human quality of tone; and so on, the throbbings continually recurring, higher or lower, in the orchestral compass, until it finally goes out in the beats of the tympani, which seem inspired and humanized for the occasion. The Minuet, B-flat again, three-four, is like showers of roses, flung from full arms, dropping through lower and lower circles, as the motive echoes itself through lower instruments; and when the horns come in in the trio, it takes on a deeper sentiment, and poetry and play mingle in one soulful, deep expression. The uncontainable momentum, and sustained velocity of the final Allegro, is in perfect keeping with all that has preceded in the symphony. We think we never heard it played with so much truth of outline and such chaste warmth of feeling. Such a work stands between the greater third and fifth of the nine symphonies somewhat as "As You Like It" or the "Tempest" stands between "Lear" and "Hamlet," so many sided, universal was this Shakspeare of music.

Wagner's prelude to his "Lohengrin," which we always thought the highest reach of his genius, at least so far as its purely musical quality is concerned, is one of the best of his instrumental movements which have been adapted to concert performances. It has beauty and consistency. Its idea being to prefigure the approach of the swan-borne boat bearing the knight of the Holy Grail, it opens with a sustained high violin note, representing the level high white line of the distant horizon over the water; as the swan approaches, the line thickens, the harmony becomes fuller, broader, until it reaches a tutti fortissimo as it is close upon us; then the process is reversed, and correspondingly the vision recedes, decrescendo, until it dies away again in the distance. It is a good piece of musical scene-painting and is not without melodic motives which anticipate some points in the drama, and it is worked up with consummate skill, without extravagance or overdoing. The instrumentation certainly is masterly, and the performance won the great applause of the evening.

The rondo capriccioso of Saint-Saëns answered to its title. It is a bright and clever work, its winsome, light and lively themes coming round again and again, as a rondo should, and charmingly capricious. It is all very quaint and pretty. Mr. Adamowski played it with great refinement and finesse, of certainty and finish, with piquant emphasis where the melody required it; and the orchestral accompaniment was very satisfactory.

The devil has been brought forward as an adroit fiddle virtuoso before now. Whether Tartini was the first to do it, in his "Trillo del Diavolo," we know not. He dreamed it, then rushed to ruled paper and wrote it down. His sulphuric majesty has become so much at home in the most modern music that there is now no need of dreaming. Saint-Saëns, in his weird musical freak, the "Danse Macabre," has only dragged into realistic noonday sunlight a Middle Age superstitious legend; and grisly and sulphurous enough has he made it. The first notes of his majesty, as he tunes his fiddle, awake the whole ghostly orchestra, the skeletons sweep and whirl in grewsome dance, the dry bones rattle, the cock crows and the morning bell rings, and away they all scamper and rustle into silence, and so on. Is this a true theme for music? If music has a real, a God-appointed purpose in this world, is it not to banish all such wicked and uncanny spells as that? That the composition is amazingly ingenious, and that it was wonderfully well performed, no one in the Sanders Theatre that evening can doubt; but is it not a prostitution of the noble art? Is it not an insult to the finer sentiments which seek for strength and sustenance in art?

Who ever heard the "Wedding March," more grandly rendered than it was that evening? You could scarcely help seeing a noble couple walking up to the altar, that is to the stage, to that exulting and inspiring harmony. All the three phases of the march were equally vivid and expressive: First, the heroic, knightly movement; then the quiet dignity of the civic section of the procession; then the tender, thoughtful, sympathetic converse of the family and intimates; and then again the resounding triumph of the march in all its glory.

J. S. D.

The fourth popular concert in Music Hall will be given tomorrow night. Mr. Italo Campanini will sing, and other musicians engaged are the Germania Band, Mr. J. F. Gilder, pianoforte, and the Schubert Ladies' Quartet. Mr. Campanini's solos are from "Aïda" and "Carmen." The orchestral works promised are mainly light music, but are in widely varied styles.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will be given on Saturday night, Nov. 22.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY. NOV. 9, 1890.

Tour of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, director, will tomorrow start on a week's trip, the first of the season. Manager C. A. Ellis starts tonight in advance, and the orchestra will be under the care of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee. The orchestra will leave for New Haven tomorrow at 1 o'clock on the Old Colony railroad. Arriving there at 6 o'clock, a concert will be given, with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman as the soloist. At the close of the concert the members of the orchestra will leave New Haven on the New Haven steamboat line for New York, where they give a concert Tuesday night in Chickering Hall, instead of Steinway Hall, as in previous years. Mrs. Wyman is the soloist here also. Wednesday morning the orchestra will leave New York for Philadelphia, where a concert is given at the Academy of Music, Mme. Clementine de Vere being the soloist. Thursday evening will find the orchestra at Washington, where a concert will be given in Lincoln Hall, with Herr Theodore Reichman as soloist. Immediately after the concert the orchestra leaves Washington, arriving in New York, Friday morning, and Boston, Friday afternoon. On the trip to be made in December the orchestra commences a series of concerts in Baltimore. The sales in all of the above cities are far in advance of any previous year, and immense audiences are already assured. In Philadelphia, the attendance is always very large, with the same features attending the Boston rehearsals, the crowd of "rush tickets" holders assembling an hour before the doors are open. At the majority of the concerts every reserved seat is sold in the Academy of Music, which seats 3000. In Washington also the success of the series is most flattering. On one occasion last season the authorities actually stopped the sale of tickets, claiming that the house was overcrowded.

——The Boston patrons of the Symphony orchestra will learn with gratification of the great assured success of that organization in its coming visits to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The advance sale in Philadelphia and Washington is already larger than the entire sale of last season, and is due altogether to the indefatigable personal work of Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, who has been in these cities the past week.

——The Boston Symphony Orchestra start on a week's tour tomorrow, opening in New Haven. They will play in New York and Washington also, returning Friday. Assistant Manager F. R. Comee goes in charge.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Symphony Concerts.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night opened with Gade's noble "Ossian" overture, which was given with splendid force and color, and impressive breadth of style. Another fine interpretation and performance was Dvorak's fiery and inspiriting Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, a work abundant in melody and glowingly instrumental. It holds its own admirably on a second hearing. The playing of it throughout was exceedingly brilliant, and the hearty applause that rewarded it was fairly earned. The concert ended with Mendelssohn's ever fresh and always delightful "Scotch symphony." Mr. Nikisch accorded it a remarkably fine reading, save in the first allegro the opening bars of which he took at a funereal pace that was wholly unaccountable in presence of the composer's time indication Allegro un poco agitato. The allegro melted into andante and the agitato disappeared wholly. Many innovations were made in the tempo of this movement throughout, and to the disadvantage of its flow, a somewhat disjointed effect being imparted to it in consequence. The rest of the symphony was faultlessly interpreted. The work of the orchestra was up to its best standard. The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose first contribution to the concert was the well-known air from Gounod's "Sappho." The lovely quality of her well-trained voice had here ample field for its display, and it was delightful in the hearing. She sang, with admirable phrasing, and in a sustained style that did the fullest justice to the music. Later, she sang "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet; and "A une Fiancée," by Ferrari, in a thoroughly charming manner, displaying taste and refined artistic sentiment in them all. The Delibes song was taken perhaps a trifle too slow, and dragged in consequence, but the artist's frank and honest singing made her always interesting. She was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled as heartily after both the Gounod air and the group of songs. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; Concerto for Violincello, Haydn (first time); Symphonic Poem, "Vltaca," Smetana; and Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven. Mr. Anton Hekking is to be the soloist.

—— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its four New York concerts at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The sale of seats by subscription is the largest that has ever been had in that city, and it is safe to prophecy that in point of quality no such audiences as will this winter greet Mr. Nikisch's appearance on the platform have, as yet, been brought together by the band in New York.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SEASON OF 1890-91

Leave Boston Monday, November 10, 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6.00 P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Nov. 11.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Nov. 12, at 11.30 A.M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Nov. 13, at 9.15 A.M., Baltimore & Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 1.45 P.M.
RIGGS HOUSE.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, directly after the Concert.
Arrive New York Friday, Nov. 14, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Nov. 10, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SEASON OF 1890-91

HOTEL LIST

A. Nikisch.	Schultz. / Hofmann.	Patz. / Delisle.
F. R. Comee. / C. M. Loeffler.	Campanari. / Fiumara.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
F. Kneisel.	Simpson. / Greene.	E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Schormann. / Schumann.
Hekking.	Lafricain. / Field.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Mole.	Zach. / Schuecker.	Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
P. Muller.	Sauerquell. / Goldie.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Roth. / Behr.	A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	F. Muller. / Taubert.
Kuntz. / Gantzberg.	Metzger. / Hackebarth.	Human. / Kurth.
J. Akeroyd.	Mingels. / E. Loeffler.	Butler. / Reinhart.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Kluge. / Michael.	Evans. / Patterson.
Stewart. / Marble.	Post. / Barth.	J. Edw. Eichler. / Hannemann.
Goldschmidt. / Strube.	Mahn. / Krafft.	Berger.
Knecht. / Sauer.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

HEARD AT MUSIC HALL.

Impressions of the Symphony Rehearsal of Oct. 31, 1890.

The intense point in this afternoon's programme came first, and was created by Goldmark's overture to the bound Prometheus. It was fitting that this should have been so, for the invigorating sunshine and freshness of the October afternoon prepared one for mental and emotional intensity.

Seated far back in the Music Hall, amid a rustle of ladies and programmes that Nikisch's raised baton failed to still, I felt, rather than heard, the throbbing of the drums with which the overture opened. The drums introduced a plaintive, wailing theme that slowly mounted up and up in circles, like a spiral of smoke in dense air. It was a prelude that sought to prepare one for a sight of the hero's sorrowful case. And here I may say, that what few of Goldmark's orchestral works I have heard have impressed me, as did the Prometheus with the composer's strange power of making one see by means of his music,—a magnetic power of bringing one face to face with the thing he describes. Wagner alone has impressed me in the same way. But Wagner's music-pictures, though they may have more force, have not the delicacy of coloring or the gentleness of touch, that is to be found in Goldmark. I knew nothing about either the man or his subject when I first heard his Penthesilia overture, but having heard it, there was little left to learn of the tale it told from the sketch of it, which I afterwards read in the Symphony programme. Another thing to marvel at in the man is his orchestration. In his hands the instruments are capable of what we discover at rare intervals in a human voice, namely, the filling of a whole hall to its remotest corner with a sense and fullness of sound. The difference between such fullness and the thread-like effect produced by ordinary writers and singers, is much the same as the difference between the effects of forked and sheet lightning.

But to return to the overture. The plaintive prelude over, it seemed as though we were brought into the presence of a great patient, repressed agony. [illegible] I cannot tell what was [illegible] that the [illegible] burst, meteor-like, into sight overhead and floated, circling, down (much as the prelude's theme had circled upward) and fell stifled into the heavy atmosphere around us. In reality, a high flute-noted melody dropped down upon us and brought a certain relief by its mournful expression of sympathy. The composer probably intended it to suggest the thought of Io, whose son, in after generations, dethroned Zeus and liberated Prometheus. Following this melody there came the sound of a rushing of wings against wind, and the surging of waves, together with a vision of the nymphs and spirits that crowded around to console the tortured man. Long-forgotten lines, translated from Æschylus by Mallock, came to mind:

Sufferer, fear not; love hath sent us:
Yearning with compassion, we,
We have stilled our father's tongue, fain to prevent us,
We have left our clear homes in the blue, deep sea,
We have travelled far
In our winged car,
For thee, for thee.

For, through our still, wave-dripping grottoes rang
A hideous brazen clang,
Breaking our noonday dreamings in our peaceful sea,
With unsandaled feet
Breathless and fleet,
To our winged car we sprang,
For thee, for thee.

Borne along by the impetus of the music, one was conscious of little else but its passion and strife and warnings of impending calamity, until the climax of Zeus was reached, and the weird descending chords that followed gave one the very real sensation of sinking into deep and deeper depths—a sensation such as one sometimes knows in dreams. One brief reminder of Io's melody, and the overture was ended.

It took me the whole of the time occupied by Sgambati's first movement to get back from my visit to Tartarus and the age of the gods, and by the time the concerto was ended I was in a condition to hear what Moszkowski had to say about our own day and generation.

Since hearing the "Faust" overture of Wagner's at last week's concert, I have arrived at a fresh realization of the fact that the modernest of modern music is peculiarly and sometimes painfully personal. To be sure the fact is not a new one, so far as this age in general is concerned, but to me it was new to realize it in connection with music, the least explicit and personal of the arts.

Moszkowski is modern, therefore personal; and what he had to tell us in his suite was about a happy, busy, sunny nature, most at home in a setting of summer weather. Perhaps there was [illegible] indeed, there pro- [illegible] them. As I have said, the first movement of the suite suggested meeting with a joyous nature on a sunny, summer day. The second movement gave us a taste of our new acquaintance's merriment, and the third, his romantic side, though, to my mind, the lovely story-melody he therein gave was marred a little by being picked to pieces in a set of variations. In the fourth movement our friend told us something serious—stopping a moment to remind us of the busy-ness that awaited him—and like the seriousness of a busy and contented heart, it was pleasant and good to listen to. Lastly, half ashamed of his confidences, and full of energy and activity, he rushed off into the "perpetual motion" of his daily duty, leaving us with a goodby impression of the hum and song of life in summer time.

The rehearsal closed, or rather reached a full stop, after an exhilarating ride with the Valkyries.

LOUISA BRYSON DOUGALL.

The Symphony programme tonight is: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; Aria from "Sappho," Gounod (Mrs W. C. Wyman); Scherzo Capricioso, Op. 66, Dvorák; Songs with P. F.—"Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; Aune Fiancee, Ferrari (Mrs. Wyman); Symphony, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

Sig. Campanini will be the particular attraction at Music Hall tomorrow night. He will sing the romanza from "Aida" and an aria from "Carmen." This fine vocalist and artist ought to be greeted by a large audience. Other attractions at this concert are the Germania Orchestra, the Schubert Quartet (female voices), and J. F. Gilder, pianist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Judging from the exceptionally large crowd on the sides of Music Hall—people who had not the faintest idea of being able to find a seat—the management of Music Hall would consult its interest financially, if that is any consideration, by adding a vocal soloist to the symphony programmes with greater frequency. It is this overflow that tells the story. An ordinary programme without a soloist, or with a piano soloist, will show an abundance of room, and as was the case last Saturday week, a goodly number of vacant seats. But the announcement of a soloist like Mrs. Wyman will not only fill the seats but put standing room at a premium.

The concert Saturday evening was by far the most enjoyable of the season, and while any vocal soloist of good reputation would have been an attraction, Mrs. Wyman's singing was of a character that places it as one of the events of the season thus far in this city. It was by no means her first appearance here, and the auditors were prepared, and reasonably, for a performance of excellent merit. Yet it must be said that her renditions Saturday evening surprised even her warmest admirers. Her first selection was with the orchestra, the "Sappho" aria by Gounod, and this was given with great breadth of style, purity of tone and accuracy of intonation, and not a single artistic effect was lost. Her tones were never forced, but the rendition was a true and artistic as well as musicianly interpretation that is too seldom heard from singers on the concert stage. In the group of songs in French that followed she was equally happy, and these were perhaps better appreciated by the audience, though no better rendered than the aria. It were difficult to say which of the three was the most acceptable; they were all different in style, and comparatively new. The charming delivery of the song by Massenets was a gem in every way, and Mrs. Wyman's method was an object lesson which many artists could well take as a pattern. It is by no means an infrequent occurrence for a soloist to receive applause from the band, and it often looks like a matter of courtesy, but the heartiness of that applause Saturday night showed it was not a matter of form, and was doubtless all the more appreciated by Mrs. Wyman on that account.

Between the vocal numbers of Mrs. Wyman, including the opening number, Mr. Nikisch gave Gade's "Ossian" overture and Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," two numbers brilliantly scored and delivered with an intensely musical feeling. It was also an excellent preparation for Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, which closed the concert. The audience was not wearied by selections of a dull or prosaic character, however novel or severely classical such numbers often are. But it was able to approach the hearing of this beautiful symphony in a spirit of longing for more of the beautiful harmony that had preceded it. And the audience had its reward. For it was a delightful rendering of this masterpiece that Mr. Nikisch gave to the hearers, closing a programme the rarity of which made it all the more to be commended.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SEASON OF 1890-91

Leave Boston Monday, November 10, 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6.00 P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Nov. 11.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Nov. 12, at 11.30 A.M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Nov. 13, at 9.15 A.M., Baltimore & Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 1.45 P.M.
RIGGS HOUSE.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, directly after the Concert.
Arrive New York Friday, Nov. 14, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Nov. 10, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SEASON OF 1890-91

HOTEL LIST

A. Nikisch.
F. R. Comee. / C. M. Loeffler.
F. Kneisel.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.
Hekking.
Mole.
P. Muller.
Roth. / Behr.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.
Kuntz. / Gantzberg.
J. Akeroyd.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.
Stewart. / Marble.
Goldschmidt. / Strube.
Knecht. / Sauer.
Schultz. / Hofmann.
Campanari. / Fiumara.
Simpson. / Greene.
Fiedler. / Moldauer.
Lafricain. / Field.
Zach. / Schuecker.
Sauerquell. / Goldie.
A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.
Kolster. / Kuehn.
Metzger. / Hackebarth.
Mingels. / E. Loefiler.
Kluge. / Michael.
Post. / Barth.
Mahn. / Krafft.
Patz. / Delisle.
H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
Schormann. / Schumann.
Bareither. / Jennewein.
Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
Demuth. / Reibl.
Fox. / Dietsch.
F. Muller. / Taubert.
Human. / Kurth.
Butler. / Reinhart.
Evans. / Patterson.
J. Edw. Eichler. / Hannemann.
Berger.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1890.

HEARD AT MUSIC HALL

Impressions of the Symphony Rehearsal of Oct. 31, 1890.

The intense point in this afternoon's programme came first, and was created by Goldmark's overture to the bound Prometheus. It was fitting that this should have been so, for the invigorating sunshine and freshness of the October afternoon prepared one for mental and emotional intensity.

Seated far back in the Music Hall, amid a rustle of ladies and programmes that Nikisch's raised baton failed to still, I felt, rather than heard, the throbbing of the drums with which the overture opened. The drums introduced a plaintive, wailing theme that slowly mounted up and up in circles, like a spiral of smoke in dense air. It was a prelude that sought to prepare one for a sight of the hero's sorrowful case. And here I may say, that what few of Goldmark's orchestral works I have heard have impressed me, as did the Prometheus with the composer's strange power of making one see by means of his music,—a magnetic power of bringing one face to face with the thing he describes. Wagner alone has impressed me in the same way. But Wagner's music-pictures, though they may have more force, have not the delicacy of coloring or the gentleness of touch, that is to be found in Goldmark. I knew nothing about either the man or his subject when I first heard his Penthesilia overture, but having heard it, there was little left to learn of the tale it told from the sketch of it, which I afterwards read in the Symphony programme. Another thing to marvel at in the man is his orchestration. In his hands the instruments are capable of what we discover at rare intervals in a human voice, namely, the filling of a whole hall to its remotest corner with a sense and fullness of sound. The difference between such fullness and the thread-like effect produced by ordinary writers and singers, is much the same as the difference between the effects of forked and sheet lightning.

But to return to the overture. The plaintive prelude over, it seemed as though we were brought into the presence of a great, patient, repressed agony. Thinking it over, I cannot tell what was played; I only know that the low, sustained chords awed one into sympathy [illegible]. Suddenly a soft light burst, meteor-like, into sight overhead and floated, circling, down (much as the prelude's theme had circled upward) and fell stifled into the heavy atmosphere around us. In reality, a high flute-noted melody dropped down upon us and brought a certain relief by its mournful expression of sympathy. The composer probably intended it to suggest the thought of Io, whose son, in after generations, dethroned Zeus and liberated Prometheus. Following this melody there came the sound of a rushing of wings against wind, and the surging of waves, together with a vision of the nymphs and spirits that crowded around to console the tortured man. Long-forgotten lines, translated from Æschylus by Mallock, came to mind:

Sufferer, fear not; love hath sent us:
Yearning with compassion, we,
We have stilled our father's tongue, fain to prevent us,
We have left our clear homes in the blue, deep sea,
We have travelled far
In our winged car,
For thee, for thee.

For, through our still, wave-dripping grottoes rang
A hideous brazen clang,
Breaking our noonday dreamings in our peaceful sea,
With unsandaled feet
Breathless and fleet,
To our winged car we sprang,
For thee, for thee.

Borne along by the impetus of the music, one was conscious of little else but its passion and strife and warnings of impending calamity, until the climax of Zeus was reached, and the weird descending chords that followed gave one the very real sensation of sinking into deep and deeper depths—a sensation such as one sometimes knows in dreams. One brief reminder of Io's melody, and the overture was ended.

It took me the whole of the time occupied by Sgambati's first movement to get back from my visit to Tartarus and the age of the gods, and by the time the concerto was ended I was in a condition to hear what Moszkowski had to say about our own day and generation.

Since hearing the "Faust" overture of Wagner's at last week's concert, I have arrived at a fresh realization of the fact that the modernest of modern music is peculiarly and sometimes painfully personal. To be sure the fact is not a new one, so far as this age in general is concerned, but to me it was new to realize it in connection with music, the least explicit and personal of the arts.

Moszkowski is modern, therefore personal; and what he had to tell us in his suite was about a happy, busy, sunny nature, most at home in a setting of summer weather. Perhaps there was a woman in the case, indeed, there probably was, but modern music for orchestra, outside of Wagner, does not, as yet, go into particulars as to the kind of per- [illegible] them. As I have said, the first movement of the suite suggested meeting with a joyous nature on a sunny, summer day. The second movement gave us a taste of our new acquaintance's merriment, and the third, his romantic side, though, to my mind, the lovely story-melody he therein gave was marred a little by being picked to pieces in a set of variations. In the fourth movement our friend told us something serious—stopping a moment to remind us of the busy-ness that awaited him—and like the seriousness of a busy and contented heart, it was pleasant and good to listen to. Lastly, half ashamed of his confidences, and full of energy and activity, he rushed off into the "perpetual motion" of his daily duty, leaving us with a goodby impression of the hum and song of life in summer time.

The rehearsal closed, or rather reached a full stop, after an exhilarating ride with the Valkyries.

LOUISA BRYSON DOUGALL.

The Symphony programme tonight is: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; Aria from "Sappho," Gounod (Mrs W. C. Wyman); Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66, Dvorák; Songs with P. F.—"Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; Aune Fiancee, Ferrari (Mrs. Wyman); Symphony, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

Sig. Campanini will be the particular attraction at Music Hall tomorrow night. He will sing the romanza from "Aida" and an aria from "Carmen." This fine vocalist and artist ought to be greeted by a large audience. Other attractions at this concert are the Germania Orchestra, the Schubert Quartet (female voices), and J. F. Gilder, pianist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Judging from the exceptionally large crowd on the sides of Music Hall—people who had not the faintest idea of being able to find a seat—the management of Music Hall would consult its interest financially, if that is any consideration, by adding a vocal soloist to the symphony programmes with greater frequency. It is this overflow that tells the story. An ordinary programme without a soloist, or with a piano soloist, will show an abundance of room, and as was the case last Saturday week, a goodly number of vacant seats. But the announcement of a soloist like Mrs. Wyman will not only fill the seats but put standing room at a premium.

The concert Saturday evening was by far the most enjoyable of the season, and while any vocal soloist of good reputation would have been an attraction, Mrs. Wyman's singing was of a character that places it as one of the events of the season thus far in this city. It was by no means her first appearance here, and the auditors were prepared, and reasonably, for a performance of excellent merit. Yet it must be said that her renditions Saturday evening surprised even her warmest admirers. Her first selection was with the orchestra, the "Sappho" aria by Gounod, and this was given with great breadth of style, purity of tone and accuracy of intonation, and not a single artistic effect was lost. Her tones were never forced, but the rendition was a true and artistic as well as musicianly interpretation that is too seldom heard from singers on the concert stage. In the group of songs in French that followed she was equally happy, and these were perhaps better appreciated by the audience, though no better rendered than the aria. It were difficult to say which of the three was the most acceptable; they were all different in style, and comparatively new. The charming delivery of the song by Massenets was a gem in every way, and Mrs. Wyman's method was an object lesson which many artists could well take as a pattern. It is by no means an infrequent occurrence for a soloist to receive applause from the band, and it often looks like a matter of courtesy, but the heartiness of that applause Saturday night showed it was not a matter of form, and was doubtless all the more appreciated by Mrs. Wyman on that account.

Between the vocal numbers of Mrs. Wyman, including the opening number, Mr. Nikisch gave Gade's "Ossian" overture and Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," two numbers brilliantly scored and delivered with an intensely musical feeling. It was also an excellent preparation for Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, which closed the concert. The audience was not wearied by selections of a dull or prosaic character, however novel or severely classical such numbers often are. But it was able to approach the hearing of this beautiful symphony in a spirit of longing for more of the beautiful harmony that had preceded it. And the audience had its reward. For it was a delightful rendering of this masterpiece that Mr. Nikisch gave to the hearers, closing a programme the rarity of which made it all the more to be commended.

...ING ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
...DAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890.

...phony Concert—Mrs. Wyman as Soloist.

The concert of Saturday began and ... with Scotch music; not the real ... article, but Scotch melody as infil... through the Danish and German ... Gade's "Ossian" overture seems a ... house between Mendelssohn and ... Schumann, having some of the melodic ... grace of the former (in its second subject, ... example) and much of the dealing in ... dissonances which is characteristic of the ... latter. But at least in this work ... the composer does not earn ... sobriquet often applied to him, ... "Mrs. Mendelssohn." The chief theme ... is beautiful and it was beautifully carried to its climax, beginning on cellos, continuing on horns, and culminating on trombones (and Mr. Nikisch does not let the trombonists use their lungs), but it is not essentially Scotch. The shock of arms, and many a trumpet call and brass fanfare suggestive of battle are in the development of this work, and the reading and performance were appropriately spirited, but in the coda there were a few pauses that were exaggerated.

Mrs. W. C. Wyman was the soloist. She always displays courage in her selections, choosing for her chief number a work which is earnest and musicianly whether it is popular or not, and generally by her dramatic power making it popular as well. This time it was an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and full of the modern French orchestral devices. The voice has plenty to do to sustain itself against the orchestral onslaught, but the vocalist went through the ordeal unscathed, although the number required the declamatory power of a Materna or a Fursch-Madi. The artistic instinct of the singer was everywhere apparent, and made amends for any lack of intense power. The group of three French songs given later in the programme was entirely excellent. It is not every artist who can give the dainty style of the Chanson, and in this school Mrs. Wyman is far in advance of any cis-Atlantic competitors. The ineffable tenderness of the reiterated "Jours Passees" of the Delibes song, and the sweet "Bonne Nuit" refrain in Massanet's charming work, were altogether delightful. The song by Ferrari, "A une Fiancee," was not so attractive a work, but the graceful accompaniment played by Mr. Nikisch made it attractive in some degree, and the artist sang it with much brightness and was recalled with hearty enthusiasm.

Dvorak's Scherzo, which is not new to these concerts, reminds of Liszt's rhapsodical style, but is more effectively scored than some of the works of Liszt. It deals chiefly with an idealized waltz theme, and is a sparkling and very exciting work. Naturally it did not lose any of its power in the reading of Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral forces were evidently upon their mettle. Mr. Schuecker in this, as also in the preceding works, showed what a great harp player he is. But the work gave especial opportunities to the woodwind and bass clarinet, flutes, and in fact all the instruments of this group were commendably played.

The Scotch symphony was the end of the programme. There was a slight disposition to accentuate its effects, but it was still a worthy performance. It is the best, the most spontaneous of Mendelssohn's symphonies and its dark beginning shows how the Trossachs, Holyrood Palace and the Hebrides, a wholesome mixture of Scotch scenery and history, affected the receptive mind of the German composer. How well he uses the clarinet in this! Only Weber and Mendelssohn understood the dark, spectral character of the lower (chalumeau) register of this instrument at this time, and the more recent tone-colorists have been glad enough to imitate them. Splendidly played, too, were the bold violin phrases of the introduction; with bows placed near the bridge the body of players gave phrases fierce and startling, yet perfect in ensemble. The tremendous gusts of storm in the first movement were the perfectfon of crescendo and diminuendo. Mendelssohn probably caught up the true daintiness of the Scherzo better than any other composer; he has not the brusqueris of a Beethoven nor the innigkeit with which Schumann invested this movement, but he has that playfulness which kept on the via media between the roughness of the former, the reserve of the latter, constitutes the ideal of such a movement. To this I may add that he is the only German who ever caught the Scotch lilt sufficiently to reproduce it. And they have all tried it! Beethoven took the Gaelic spirit thoroughly out of the set of Scotch songs which he harmonized for the publisher Thompson. Schumann set Burns' poems in a Teutonic manner, Frantz was wise enough not to attempt the Scotch style at all in setting the same poet to music, and even Bruch, who once assured me that he knew 400 Scotch folksongs by heart, has given musicianly development (in "Fair Ellen") to "The Campbells are Comin'", and to other tunes in his Scotch fantasic for violin, yet has managed to wash away all traces of the Gaelic character. Only Mendelssohn, and chiefly in this Scherzo has managed to retain the true flavor of the folk music he intends to portray. The clarinet did good work in this movement. ... and horn deserve praise for the ... of their work in the adagio, which ... fine a movement as the slow one ... Italian symphony however. The ... far too heavy in the finale; it ... stant, not majestic, yet the ... style of the rest was effective, ... whole concert may go on record as ... most interesting and well given ...

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture—"Ossian".....Gade
Aria from "Sappho".....Gounod
Mrs. W. C. Wyman.
Scherzo—"Capriccioso," op. 66.....Dvorak
Songs with piano—
"Regrets".....Delibes
"Bonne Nuit".....Massenet
"A une Fiancée".....Ferrari
Mrs. Wyman.
Symphony in A minor (Scotch)..Mendelssohn

They said at Mendelssohn's death that his mantle would fall upon Niels Gade. It fell upon him, and it stifled him; for his later works are but a cheap edition of Mendelssohniana. Never did he fulfil the mad prophecies of the enthusiasts who saw in "Ossian" and the First Symphony the promise of a great composer. He was handicapped at the very start. And as Bongrand, the painter in Zola's "L'Oeuvre," he must have regretted his first work, a masterpiece, for it was at once his glory and his subsequent confusion.

Gade, born in a "far land of mist and snow," chose for the subject of his first orchestral work the poems of Ossian, and today this overture is of musical interest alone, suggesting naught but musical ideas. For who now reads of Calmar or Cuthullin, who recks of Duchomar, "most gloomy of men"? "Dusronnal snorted over the bodies of heroes, and Sifadda bathed his hoof in blood," and what is that to us? But the hatred in which Dr. Johnson held the young Highland schoolmaster is fresh, preserved in the diary of Boswell, and it has eclipsed forever the translations or forgeries of Macpherson.

One does not wonder at the hopes excited by this overture of Gade. It is an admirable composition, the work of a man of musical nature the limitations of which were left for time to disclose. The effects are not gained by any specific beauty of melody or by ingenious contrasts of color. Melodies, harmonies, rhythms, instrumentation, all unite in producing one result, and one result alone: an all-pervading sense of the color gray. Hence a certain monotony, but a monotony in keeping with the subject and not displeasing. There is no light of the sun in this strange land; the heroes summoned to the shock of battle by Gade's spell are vaguely seen groping in dense fog; passion has long been forgotten in the grave; all is unreal, unsubstantial. A most poetic overture, written by a rare poet—but a poet of one song.

The scherzo by Dvorak, on the contrary, is full of life and bustle; its vitality is at times brutality. It would seem as though Dvorak, the Bohemian, when he writes, like certain murderers before bloody deeds, sees all things red. It is an intoxicating work; maddening in rhythm; of contagious fury; but after the debauch is over there is a conviction that the liquor was cheap. And cheap much of this music is, in spite of its brilliancy, its startling modulations, its exciting instrumentation. The chief tune is not remarkably original; there are many places where stammering takes the place of speech, and there is much unmeaning, unnecessary noise. Dvorak is a most unequal composer; he is often dull, and the intensity of his dulness approaches genius; he is often vulgar as though his peasant blood would out in music.

The symphony of Mendelssohn was exceedingly well played, as were the other orchestral numbers of the programme. Particularly worthy of praise was the playing of the scherzo which has been called by Chorley a most complete example of national forms turned to musical order. It is true that Mr. Nikisch took the opening andante con moto as though it were an adagio, and in the coda destroyed the rhythmical sense by giving a simple horn passage undue prominence, but these eccentricities did not destroy the value of his work. It is also true that he seems to hold the mark piano in aversion, and all dynamic marks are exaggerated by him in the direction of loudness. Mendelsohn once complained of the tendency of directors to play forte the passages he had marked piano, and he suggested that in the scores p should be changed to pp and f to mf. This plan would hardly commend itself to Mr. Nikisch; for with all his great merits he loves startling effects and is in fact a fresco painter.

There are certain musicians and writers upon music who claim that the art of singing is in its decadence, that it will soon be numbered with the lost arts. This, they say, is due to many causes: the impatience and ignorance of beginners who have good voices, but little application and great self-conceit; the lack of faithful and skilled teachers; the evil influence of German singers who now in this country are admired and imitated; the encouragement given orchestral concerts and piano recitals to the neglect of choral societies and concerts of song; and above all to the vocal compositions written by so many modern composers, which abound in intervals repugnant to the voice, and in which the voice, the most beautiful of musical instruments, is deliberately maltreated and subordinated to the accompaniment. They hear the German singers in opera and in concert; they listen to the young singers who copy them, and they remember the words of Vernon Lee: "Let him or her be effective; act with impetuosity, declaim with vehemence, shriek and yell passionately, if he or she have dramatic instincts or force passion... tones, or bellow ... shapeless roulades, if he ... lungs or a flexible throat; any of these ... will lead to distinction, and they are quali... ties, whether dramatic or vocal, which require little tuition and less practice: above all, which entirely dispense with the mere knowledge that such a thing as an art of singing has ever existed or can ever exist."

Now, the singing of Mrs. Wyman shows that there are singers who have not yet bowed the knee to Baal. Without going into the technicalities of her art, it is enough to say that she is a singer, not a declaimer. Her voice, although it is not powerful and although it is comparatively devoid of color, is nevertheless sympathetic and agreeable. She has been exceedingly well taught; her tones are pure and firm, free from any suspicion of tremolo, or vibrato, or the wabbling which is thought by many singers to intensify expression. The songs she sang were more adapted for the display of sustained tones than for the exhibition of facility in execution. Her phrasing showed a highly developed musical taste and the self-control which stamps the artist. She did not force her voice, she did not shriek that she might compel admiration. She knows the power of artful simplicity. Never was a phrase devoid of meaning italicized that she might infuse it with a foreign meaning; and she was content to wait for a climax. As simple and charming in her singing as in her appearance upon the stage, she gained her effects without effort, without affectation. Certain mannerisms, which when she sang here in March were unpleasant, have disappeared; nor last Saturday evening could she be accused of coldness. In the aria from "Sappho," the opera for which Augier wrote the libretto, and in which a political conspiracy took the place of a ballet, she might possibly have shown more fire and passion; but the three songs were sung with tender feeling. To these three songs Mr. Nikisch played an excellent accompaniment.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. The sixth of the series will be given Nov. 22, and the programme is as follows: Beethoven's First Symphony; Smetana's "Vltava," a symphonic poem, and Beethoven's Turkish March, from "Ruins of Athens." Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for violoncello by Haydn.

PHILIP HALE.

Campanini sang at the popular concert given last evening at Music Hall. His selections were "Celeste Aïda," the romanze from "Carmen," and the Duke's song from "Rigoletto." He was in excellent condition and master of his voice. He still charms; his voice still thrills, still woos; and even today there is no tenor upon the operatic or concert stage in this country who can compare with him in the skilful management of the voice. He is, in a word, the embodiment of healthy Italian traditions. The remaining numbers of the programme were played by the Germania Orchestra under Mr. Mollenhauer, and Mr. Gilder, pianist; and the Ladies' Schubert Quartette sang pleasing selections.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Much has been written concerning the similarity of Gade's compositions to those of Mendelssohn. However true this may be with regard to certain characteristics, his works bear the marks of his own individuality, as surely as Mendelssohn's are similarly expressed. That he had traits in common with Mendelssohn, whether they were the result of coincidence, or of cultivation, is quite apparent. There are passages for instance in the "Ossian" overture, opus 1, which headed the fifth Symphony concert last evening, that immediately bring to mind the German composer; yet one feels almost in the same space of time that Mendelssohn could not have written them. It is easy to see why this work made so strong an impression as it did at the time of its first performances. Its vein of melancholy, its charming tunefulness, its instrumentation, so full of warmth and color, make it an exceedingly attractive and promising opus 1. Weak spots are not unnaturally discernible; and when they appear, they seem almost absurdly incongruous, suggesting the thought that the enthusiastic young writer at times got frightened at his own boldness, and turned from his inspired course to throw a sop to old Tradition, whose menacing glare threatened him whenever he paused, as it were, for breath. All the same, it is productive of much enjoyment, giving one pleasure akin to that derived from contemplating a charming landscape painting, which, without possessing great strength, is replete with light, serenity and warm, cheerful color effects. It was finely played. The somber opening measures forming a kind of introduction were given with appropriate breadth and stateliness; the fiery, agitated principal subject came out clearly and brilliantly, and the graceful, song like character of the second theme was made delightfully apparent. Following the overture came Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, to whom the Symphony audiences have listened with much pleasure several times in past seasons. She first sang an aria from "Sappho," by Gounod, and after the succeeding orchestral number was heard again in three songs, with pianoforte accompanment by Mr Nikisch: "Regrets," by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "Anne Fiancee," by Ferrari. Mrs. Wyman's finely trained and controlled voice, with its wide compass, seemed in better condition than it was at her last appearance here. It is a matter for sincere regret that its nasal quality, and tendency to break into tremolo should still continue to mar its beauty as well as the otherwise artistic character of her singing. Aside from these defects, her solos were each and all thoroughly enjoyable. The aria, with its charming accompaniment in the wood-wind, muted strings, and harp, was finely sustained, and artistically rendered. It was with the songs, however that she won her success of the evening. They formed an exceedingly attractive group. The "Good night," which displayed her lower voice admirably, was happily placed between the other two of higher range, and must be considered her most effective, as it was the most popular number of all. Mr. Nikisch followed her with all possible sympathy and skill; and without doubt, part of the enthusiastic applause which greeted the conclusion of this number was intended for him.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, opus 66, including as it does in its score the piccolo, English horn, bass clarinet, triangle, harp, big drum and cymbals, makes a fascinating concert piece of the popular order; and yet has character enough to deserve a place on a symphony programme. The lively, elusive air of the first figure that is used so effectively throughout, lends truth to the title, and keeps the mind and imagination busy in chasing it about; while the syren-like waltz theme, with its sensuous instrumentation, must seldom fail to set the hearts of lovers of that dance palpitating with eager anticipation.

Evidently the composer himself was fond of this second theme, for he returns to it repeatedly, and parts with it reluctantly, as the broken phrases which are heard softly just before the brilliant coda breaks in, indicate. This number, also, was finely played, the rhythmic swing of the waltz movement, being especially captivating; while the bits of solo work for different wind instruments, and the cadenza for harp and horn were rendered in a manner above reproach.

Mendelssohn's symphony, No. 3, in A minor, named by himself the "Scotch," completed the programme. It received probably the most perfect reading that was ever heard of the work in Boston, one which thoroughly revealed its wealth of practical feeling and passionate expression, and the many beauties of its instrumentation.

The wonderful artistic skill which Mr. Nikisch displayed in leading his orchestra from one theme to another, and the exquisite appropriateness of his elastic beat, showed clearly the feelings and appreciation of a true musician. For instance, the moderate tempo with which he took the opening allegro, caused it to blend in a pecularly happy manner with the preceding andante, and materially heightened the effect of the succeeding animated episode; while the leading up to, and rendering of the short expressive coda at the close of the first part of the allegro rounded out the whole section with an effectiveness that could not otherwise have been obtained.

These are only examples of his proceedings throughout the entire work, whose harmonious relations he maintained with unerring judgment from beginning to end. The orchestra, too, seemed to meet his every wish; and whether in the broadest passages for full orchestra, in the theme of the adagio, or the crisp staccato work required in the scherzo and the finale, the men all played apparently "for love." It was indeed a performance to be remembered.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The first of a series of three subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, which have been announced for the early part of this season, was given in Steinert Hall last Monday evening. This is the third year of the organization, which retains the same members, with the exception of the viola player: T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. The opening number consisted of Haydn's quartet in D minor, opus 76, written after his return to Esterhaz from his second sojourn in London, where he had been writing and introducing to English lovers of music the celebrated symphonies, one of which was recently given here. Naturally, it would be, as it is one of his strongest efforts in this direction, with the influence of all that wide and novel experience behind it, as well as that of Mozart, who, in the interim between Haydn's earlier and later quartets, had been lending to the form practically established by the elder musician the embellishments of his own inimitable genius. It was interestingly given, although not with the smoothness that characterized the best playing of the quartet last season. The programme also contained three novelties—a Wiegendlied, by Fitzenhagen, a Theme with variations, by Klingel (both for four 'cellos), and Dvorak's quartet in C major, opus 61. Of Fitzenhagen we know nothing except that in the notes of the programme it was stated that he is a teacher of the 'cello at Moscow; and from the same source of information we learn that Klingel is considered one of the first 'cello virtuosos of the day, and is a teacher at the Leipzig Conservatory and leader of the 'cellos in the Gewandhaus Orchestra. On the whole, these novelties were not of an inspiring kind. The 'cello numbers, in which Messrs. Shulz, Campanari and Mingels assisted, were successful in creating curiosity, but hardly so from any other point of view. The Cradle Song is pretty and well harmonized. The variations, as a rule, did not exhibit the 'cellos in an interesting light, and there was besides considerable untunefulness and an absence of "oneness" on the part of the performers, which affected the value of the production, even technically considered. The first movement of the Dvorak quartet was impressive, owing to its length and vagueness, and to the extraordinary demands made by the composer upon the instruments. The andante was more agreeable to the musical sense, its second theme being especially so. The scherzo seemed the most spontaneous and attractive of all four movements, and was applauded warmly; while the finale, although containing both animation and fire, was like the first movement, too uncertain a quantity to be grasped, at least, at a first hearing. Throughout this work the playing, although much of it was strong and good, was hardly satisfactory on the whole; probably its many technical difficulties had a good deal to do with the matter. The quartet, however, are to be praised for their worthy endeavor to let Boston hear some new works; and without doubt, another concert will find them in their accustomed good form.

Clipping from Ledger Philadelphia Pa
Date 11-7

The advance sale for the Boston Symphony Concerts at the Academy of Music has been very large; so large, it is reported, as to "insure their financial success at all hazards." The first of the proposed six concerts will be given on Wednesday evening, November 12th.

Clipping from Advertiser New York city
Date 11/8

The program for the Boston symphony orchestra's concert at Chickering hall, on Tuesday evening next, includes the overtures to "Oberon" by Weber and "Faust" by Wagner, together with Beethoven's third (Eroica) symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will interpret an aria and two songs. The subscription sale for the four concerts by the famous orchestra is the largest that has been effected during the band's experiences in New York.

Clipping from Courier New Haven Co.
Date 11-7

HYPERION THEATER.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given Monday [illegible]. The orchestra is under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, its celebrated conductor, and it has increased in excel[illegible] such a thing is possible, under his [illegible] ... has been large.

[39]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert—Mrs. Wyman as Soloist.

The concert of Saturday began and ended with Scotch music, not the real Gaelic article, but Scotch melody as infiltrated through the Danish and German minds. Gade's "Ossian" overture seems a halfway house between Mendelssohn and Schumann, having some of the melodic grace of the former (in its second subject, for example) and much of the dealing in dissonances which is characteristic of the latter. But at least in this work the composer does not earn the sobriquet often applied to him, of "Mrs. Mendelssohn." The chief theme is beautiful and it was beautifully carried to its climax, beginning on cellos, continuing on horns, and culminating on trombones (and Mr. Nikisch does not let the trombonists use their lungs), but it is not essentially Scotch. The shock of arms, and many a trumpet call and brass fanfare suggestive of battle are in the development of this work, and the reading and performance were appropriately spirited, but in the coda there were a few pauses that were exaggerated.

Mrs. W. C. Wyman was the soloist. She always displays courage in her selections, choosing for her chief number a work which is earnest and musicianly whether it is popular or not, and generally by her dramatic power making it popular as well. This time it was an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and full of the modern French orchestral devices. The voice has plenty to do to sustain itself against the orchestral onslaught, but the vocalist went through the ordeal unscathed, although the number required the declamatory power of a Materna or a Fursch-Madi. The artistic instinct of the singer was everywhere apparent, and made amends for any lack of intense power. The group of three French songs given later in the programme was entirely excellent. It is not every artist who can give the dainty style of the Chanson, and in this school Mrs. Wyman is far in advance of any cis-Atlantic competitors. The ineffable tenderness of the reiterated "Jours Passees" of the Delibes song, and the sweet "Bonne Nuit" refrain in Massanet's charming work, were altogether delightful. The song by Ferrari, "A une Fiancee," was not so attractive a work, but the graceful accompaniment played by Mr. Nikisch made it attractive in some degree, and the artist sang it with much brightness and was recalled with hearty enthusiasm.

Dvorak's Scherzo, which is not new to these concerts, reminds of Liszt's rhapsodical style, but is more effectively scored than some of the works of Liszt. It deals chiefly with an idealized waltz theme, and is a sparkling and very exciting work. Naturally it did not lose any of its power in the reading of Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral forces were evidently upon their mettle. Mr. Schuecker in this, as also in the preceding works, showed what a great harp player he is. But the work gave especial opportunities to the woodwind and bass clarinet, flutes, and in fact all the instruments of this group were commendably played.

The Scotch symphony was the end of the programme. There was a slight disposition to accentuate its effects, but it was still a worthy performance. It is the best, the most spontaneous of Mendelssohn's symphonies and its dark beginning shows how the Trossachs, Holyrood Palace and the Hebrides, a wholesome mixture of Scotch scenery and history, affected the receptive mind of the German composer. How well he uses the clarinet in this! Only Weber and Mendelssohn understood the dark, spectral character of the lower (chalumeau) register of this instrument at this time, and the more recent tone-colorists have been glad enough to imitate them. Splendidly played, too, were the bold violin phrases of the introduction; with bows placed near the bridge the body of players gave phrases fierce and startling, yet perfect in ensemble. The tremendous gusts of storm in the first movement were the perfectfon of crescendo and diminuendo. Mendelssohn probably caught up the true daintiness of the Scherzo better than any other composer; he has not the brusquerie of a Beethoven nor the innigkeit with which Schumann invested this movement, but he has that playfulness which kept on the via media between the roughness of the former, the reserve of the latter, constitutes the ideal of such a movement. To this I may add that he is the only German who ever caught the Scotch lilt sufficiently to reproduce it. And they have all tried it! Beethoven took the Gaelic spirit thoroughly out of the set of Scotch songs which he harmonized for the publisher Thompson, Schumann set Burns' poems in a Teutonic manner, Frantz was wise enough not to attempt the Scotch style at all in setting the same poet to music, and even Bruch, who once assured me that he knew 400 Scotch folksongs by heart, has given musicianly development (in "Fair Ellen") to "The Campbells are Comin'", and to other tunes in his Scotch fantasic for violin, yet has managed to wash away all traces of the Gaelic character. Only Mendelssohn, and chiefly in this Scherzo has managed to retain the true flavor of the folk music he intends to portray. The clarinet did good work in this movement. Cellos and horn deserve praise for the beauty of their work in the adagio, which is not as fine a movement as the slow one in the Italian symphony however. The brass was far too heavy in the finale; it made it blatant, not majestic, yet the spirited style of the rest was effective, and the whole concert may go on record as one of the most interesting and well given of the season.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Campanini at Music Hall.

The popular concert at Music Hall last evening was transformed into an ovation for Sig. Campanini, who made his first appearance in this city since the restoration of his voice by an operation upon his throat. His appearance on the platform was the signal for long continued applause and his two selections, a solo from "Aida" and the romanze from Bizet's "Carmen," were enthusiastically encored with cries of "bravo." Although the ravages which time have made in his once magnificent voice are at times painfully evident, Campanini sings with much of his old time vigor and expression, his phrasing and method being well nigh as faultless as of yore. In a slight huskiness, especially of the upper tones especially in sustained passages and in lack of flexibility at times are the weaknesses of his once noble organ most apparent. J. F. Gilder, one of Boston's favorite pianists, was heard to excellent advantage in several selections, two of his own composition. The Schubert Ladies' Quartette sang with sweetness and precision some charming melodies, the most enthusiastically received of which were "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground" and "Blue Bells of Scotland." The Germania Orchestra completed the programme with a half dozen finely rendered favorite compositions, the intermezzo from Delibe's "Naila" being especially prominent for delicacy of treatment.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1890

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture—"Ossian" ..... Gade
Aria from "Sappho" ..... Gounod
Mrs. W. C. Wyman.
Scherzo—"Capriccioso," op. 66 ..... Dvorak
Songs with piano—
"Regrets" ..... Delibes
"Bonne Nuit" ..... Massenet
"A une Fiancée" ..... Ferrari
Mrs. Wyman.
Symphony in A minor (Scotch) .. Mendelssohn

They said at Mendelssohn's death that his mantle would fall upon Niels Gade. It fell upon him, and it stifled him: for his later works are but a cheap edition of Mendelssohniana. Never did he fulfil the mad prophecies of the enthusiasts who saw in "Ossian" and the First Symphony the promise of a great composer. He was handicapped at the very start. And as Bongrand, the painter in Zola's "L'Oeuvre," he must have regretted his first work, a masterpiece, for it was at once his glory and his subsequent confusion.

Gade, born in a "far land of mist and snow," chose for the subject of his first orchestral work the poems of Ossian, and today this overture is of musical interest alone, suggesting naught but musical ideas. For who now reads of Calmar or Cuthullin, who recks of Duchomar, "most gloomy of men"? "Dusronnal snorted over the bodies of heroes, and Sifadda bathed his hoof in blood," and what is that to us? But the hatred in which Dr. Johnson held the young Highland schoolmaster is fresh, preserved in the diary of Boswell, and it has eclipsed forever the translations or forgeries of Macpherson.

One does not wonder at the hopes excited by this overture of Gade. It is an admirable composition, the work of a man of musical nature the limitations of which were left for time to disclose. The effects are not gained by any specific beauty of melody or by ingenious contrasts of color. Melodies, harmonies, rhythms, instrumentation, all unite in producing one result, and one result alone: an all-pervading sense of the color gray. Hence a certain monotony, but a monotony in keeping with the subject and not displeasing. There is no light of the sun in this strange land; the heroes summoned to the shock of battle by Gade's spell are vaguely seen groping in dense fog; passion has long been forgotten in the grave; all is unreal, unsubstantial. A most poetic overture, written by a rare poet—but a poet of one song.

The scherzo by Dvorak, on the contrary, is full of life and bustle; its vitality is at times brutality. It would seem as though Dvorak, the Bohemian, when he writes, like certain murderers before bloody deeds, sees all things red. It is an intoxicating work; maddening in rhythm: of contagious fury; but after the debauch is over there is a conviction that the liquor was cheap. And cheap much of this music is, in spite of its brilliancy, its startling modulations, its exciting instrumentation. The chief tune is not remarkably original; there are many places where stammering takes the place of speech, and there is much unmeaning, unnecessary noise. Dvorak is a most unequal composer; he is often dull, and the intensity of his dulness approaches genius; he is often vulgar as though his peasant blood would out in music.

The symphony of Mendelssohn was exceedingly well played, as were the other orchestral numbers of the programme. Particularly worthy of praise was the playing of the scherzo which has been called by Chorley a most complete example of national forms turned to musical order. It is true that Mr. Nikisch took the opening andante con moto as though it were an adagio, and in the coda destroyed the rhythmical sense by giving a simple horn passage undue prominence, but these eccentricities did not destroy the value of his work. It is also true that he seems to hold the mark piano in aversion, and all dynamic marks are exaggerated by him in the direction of loudness. Mendelsohn once complained of the tendency of directors to play forte the passages he had marked piano, and he suggested that in the scores p should be changed to pp and f to mf. This plan would hardly commend itself to Mr. Nikisch; for with all his great merits he loves startling effects and is in fact a fresco painter.

There are certain musicians and writers upon music who claim that the art of singing is in its decadence, that it will soon be numbered with the lost arts. This, they say, is due to many causes: the impatience and ignorance of beginners who have good voices, but little application and great self-conceit; the lack of faithful and skilled teachers; the evil influence of German singers who now in this country are admired and imitated; the encouragement given orchestral concerts and piano recitals to the neglect of choral societies and concerts of song; and above all to the vocal compositions written by so many modern composers, which abound in intervals repugnant to the voice, and in which the voice, the most beautiful of musical instruments, is deliberately maltreated and subordinated to the accompaniment. They hear the German singers in opera and in concert; they listen to the young singers who copy them, and they remember the words of Vernon Lee: "Let him or her be effective; act with impetuosity, declaim with vehemence, shriek and yell passionately, if he or she have dramatic instinct, or force upon tones, or bellow lower ones, or gabble shapeless roulades, if he or she have strong lungs or a flexible throat; any of these means will lead to distinction, and they are qualities, whether dramatic or vocal, which require little tuition and less practice; above all, which entirely dispense with the mere knowledge that such a thing as an art of singing has ever existed or can ever exist."

Now, the singing of Mrs. Wyman shows that there are singers who have not yet bowed the knee to Baal. Without going into the technicalities of her art, it is enough to say that she is a singer, not a declaimer. Her voice, although it is not powerful and although it is comparatively devoid of color, is nevertheless sympathetic and agreeable. She has been exceedingly well taught; her tones are pure and firm, free from any suspicion of tremolo, or vibrato, or the wabbling which is thought by many singers to intensify expression. The songs she sang were more adapted for the display of sustained tones than for the exhibition of facility in execution. Her phrasing showed a highly developed musical taste and the self-control which stamps the artist. She did not force her voice, she did not shriek that she might compel admiration. She knows the power of artful simplicity. Never was a phrase devoid of meaning italicized that she might infuse it with a foreign meaning; and she was content to wait for a climax. As simple and charming in her singing as in her appearance upon the stage, she gained her effects without effort, without affectation. Certain mannerisms, which when she sang here in March were unpleasant, have disappeared; nor last Saturday evening could she be accused of coldness. In the aria from "Sappho," the opera for which Augier wrote the libretto, and in which a political conspiracy took the place of a ballet, she might possibly have shown more fire and passion; but the three songs were sung with tender feeling. To these three songs Mr. Nikisch played an excellent accompaniment.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. The sixth of the series will be given Nov. 22, and the programme is as follows: Beethoven's First Symphony; Smetana's "Vltava," a symphonic poem, and Beethoven's Turkish March, from "Ruins of Athens." Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for violoncello by Haydn.

PHILIP HALE.

Campanini sang at the popular concert given last evening at Music Hall. His selections were "Celeste Aïda," the romanze from "Carmen," and the Duke's song from "Rigoletto." He was in excellent condition and master of his voice. He still charms; his voice still thrills, still woos; and even today there is no tenor upon the operatic or concert stage in this country who can compare with him in the skilful management of the voice. He is, in a word, the embodiment of healthy Italian traditions. The remaining numbers of the programme were played by the Germania Orchestra under Mr. Mollenhauer, and Mr. Gilder, pianist; and the Ladies' Schubert Quartette sang pleasing selections.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Much has been written concerning the similarity of Gade's compositions to those of Mendelssohn. However true this may be with regard to certain characteristics, his works bear the marks of his own individuality, as surely as Mendelssohn's are similarly expressed. That he had traits in common with Mendelssohn, whether they were the result of coincidence, or of cultivation, is quite apparent. There are passages for instance in the "Ossian" overture, opus 1, which headed the fifth Symphony concert last evening, that immediately bring to mind the German composer; yet one feels almost in the same space of time that Mendelssohn could not have written them. It is easy to see why this work made so strong an impression as it did at the time of its first performances. Its vein of melancholy, its charming tunefulness, its instrumentation, so full of warmth and color, make it an exceedingly attractive and promising opus 1. Weak spots are not unnaturally discernible; and when they appear, they seem almost absurdly incongruous, suggesting the thought that the enthusiastic young writer at times got frightened at his own boldness, and turned from his inspired course to throw a sop to old Tradition, whose menacing glare threatened him whenever he paused, as it were, for breath. All the same, it is productive of much enjoyment, giving one pleasure akin to that derived from contemplating a charming landscape painting, which, without possessing great strength, is replete with light, serenity and warm, cheerful color effects. It was finely played. The somber opening measures forming a kind of introduction were given with appropriate breadth and stateliness; the fiery, agitated principal subject came out clearly and brilliantly, and the graceful, song like character of the second theme was made delightfully apparent. Following the overture came Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, to whom the Symphony audiences have listened with much pleasure several times in past seasons. She first sang an aria from "Sappho," by Gounod, and after the succeeding orchestral number was heard again in three songs, with pianoforte accompanment by Mr Nikisch: "Regrets," by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "Anne Fiancee," by Ferrari. Mrs. Wyman's finely trained and controlled voice, with its wide compass, seemed in better condition than it was at her last appearance here. It is a matter for sincere regret that its nasal quality, and tendency to break into tremolo should still continue to mar its beauty as well as the otherwise artistic character of her singing. Aside from these defects, her solos were each and all thoroughly enjoyable, The aria, with its charming accompaniment in the wood-wind, muted strings, and harp, was finely sustained, and artistically rendered. It was with the songs, however that she won her success of the evening. They formed an exceedingly attractive group. The "Good night," which displayed her lower voice admirably, was happily placed between the other two of higher range, and must be considered her most effective, as it was the most popular number of all. Mr. Nikisch followed her with all possible sympathy and skill; and without doubt, part of the enthusiastic applause which greeted the conclusion of this number was intended for him.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capricciso, opus 66, including as it does in its score the piccolo, English horn, bass clarinet, triangle, harp, big drum and cymbals, makes a fascinating concert piece of the popular order; and yet has character enough to deserve a place on a symphony programme. The lively, elusive air of the first figure that is used so effectively throughout, lends truth to the title, and keeps the mind and imagination busy in chasing it about; while the syren-like waltz theme, with its sensuous instrumentation, must seldom fail to set the hearts of lovers of that dance palpitating with eager anticipation.

Evidently the composer himself was fond of this second theme, for he returns to it repeatedly, and parts with it reluctantly, as the broken phrases which are heard softly just before the brilliant coda breaks in, indicate. This number, also, was finely played, the rhythmic swing of the waltz movement, being especially captivating; while the bits of solo work for different wind instruments, and the cadenza for harp and horn were rendered in a manner above reproach.

Mendelssohn's symphony, No. 3, in A minor, named by himself the "Scotch," completed the programme. It received probably the most perfect reading that was ever heard of the work in Boston, one which thoroughly revealed its wealth of practical feeling and passionate expression, and the many beauties of its instrumentation.

The wonderful artistic skill which Mr. Nikisch displayed in leading his orchestra from one theme to another, and the exquisite appropriateness of his elastic beat, showed clearly the feelings and appreciation of a true musician. For instance, the moderate tempo with which he took the opening allegro, caused it to blend in a pecularly happy manner with the preceding andante, and materially heightened the effect of the succeeding animated episode; while the leading up to, and rendering of the short expressive coda at the close of the first part of the allegro rounded out the whole section with an effectiveness that could not otherwise have been obtained.

These are only examples of his proceedings throughout the entire work, whose harmonious relations he maintained with unerring judgment from beginning to end. The orchestra, too, seemed to meet his every wish; and whether in the broadest passages for full orchestra, in the theme of the adagio, or the crisp staccato work required in the scherzo and the finale, the men all played apparently "for love." It was indeed a performance to be remembered.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The first of a series of three subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, which have been announced for the early part of this season, was given in Steinert Hall last Monday evening. This is the third year of the organization, which retains the same members, with the exception of the viola player: T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. The opening number consisted of Haydn's quartet in D minor, opus 76, written after his return to Esterhaz from his second sojourn in London, where he had been writing and introducing to English lovers of music the celebrated symphonies, one of which was recently given here. Naturally, it would be, as it is one of his strongest efforts in this direction, with the influence of all that wide and novel experience behind it, as well as that of Mozart, who, in the interim between Haydn's earlier and later quartets, had been lending to the form practically established by the elder musician the embellishments of his own inimitable genius. It was interestingly given, although not with the smoothness that characterized the best playing of the quartet last season. The programme also contained three novelties—a Wiegendlied, by Fitzenhagen, a Theme with variations, by Klingel (both for four 'cellos), and Dvorak's quartet in C major, opus 61. Of Fitzenhagen we know nothing except that in the notes of the programme it was stated that he is a teacher of the 'cello at Moscow; and from the same source of information we learn that Klingel is considered one of the first 'cello virtuosos of the day, and is a teacher at the Leipzig Conservatory and leader of the 'cellos in the Gewandhaus Orchestra. On the whole, these novelties were not of an inspiring kind. The 'cello numbers, in which Messrs. Shulz, Campanari and Mingels assisted, were successful in creating curiosity, but hardly so from any other point of view. The Cradle Song is pretty and well harmonized. The variations, as a rule, did not exhibit the 'cellos in an interesting light, and there was besides considerable untunefulness and an absence of "oneness" on the part of the performers, which affected the value of the production, even technically considered. The first movement of the Dvorak quartet was impressive, owing to its length and vagueness, and to the extraordinary demands made by the composer upon the instruments. The andante was more agreeable to the musical sense, its second theme being especially so. The scherzo seemed the most spontaneous and attractive of all four movements, and was applauded warmly; while the finale, although containing both animation and fire, was like the first movement, too uncertain a quantity to be grasped, at least, at a first hearing. Throughout this work the playing, although much of it was strong and good, was hardly satisfactory on the whole; probably its many technical difficulties had a good deal to do with the matter. The quartet, however, are to be praised for their worthy endeavor to let Boston hear some new works; and without doubt, another concert will find them in their accustomed good form.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa

Date 11-7

The advance sale for the Boston Symphony Concerts at the Academy of Music has been very large; so large, it is reported, as to "insure their financial success at all hazards." The first of the proposed six concerts will be given on Wednesday evening, November 12th.

Clipping from Advertiser New York city

Date 11/8

The program for the Boston symphony orchestra's concert at Chickering hall, on Tuesday evening next, includes the overtures to "Oberon" by Weber and "Faust" by Wagner, together with Beethoven's third (Eroica) symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will interpret an aria and two songs. The subscription sale for the four concerts by the famous orchestra is the largest that has been effected during the band's experiences in New York.

Clipping from Courier New Haven Ct.

Date 11-7

HYPERION THEATER.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given Monday night. The orchestra is under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, its celebrated conductor, and it has increased in excellence if such a thing is possible, under his control. The sale of seats has been large.

...Symphony Concert, Mrs. Wyman Soloist.

The Lillputians at the Mollis Street—Final "Grand Duchess" Performances—Tomasini's Concerts—Boston Singers—"Paul Jones" and the "Merry Monarch"—Return of Strauss.

At the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, a most enjoyable programme was given under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, soprano, as the soloist.

Mrs. Wyman has made a number of most successful concert appearances in this city in former seasons, but upon none of these occasions has she given so great satisfaction as in her selections of last evening. She sung, as her number with orchestra, the great soprano aria from Gounod's "Sappho" and her interpretation of its vocal beauties was most enjoyable in every way. The phrasing and the delivery of the aria showed rare intelligence and dramatic instinct, and the voice of the singer met the demands of the composition most happily. The musical quality of Mrs. Wyman's voice was even more prominently shown in the group of songs with piano accompaniment which made her second contribution to the programme. These were "Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari, all of which proved excellent songs and comparative novelties. In her singing of these numbers Mrs. Wyman won a veritable vocal triumph by the graceful beauty of her delivery and the good taste and fine expression shown in their interpretation. The Massenet song fairly captivated the audience, and the singer was honored with hearty and prolonged applause after each appearance. Mr. Nikisch added greatly to the enjoyment of the songs by his admirable playing of the accompaniments.

The patrons of these concerts who are gaining their first acquaintance with the standard symphonies this season are fortunate, indeed, for Mr. Nikisch leaves little to be desired in his reading of such compositions, and his men have become so well acquainted with his ideas that the playing of such works is always attended with the best results. Scotch music is having a very prominent place in the concert programmes of this season, and possibly the symphony of the evening, Mendelssohn's No. 3, "The Scotch," was chosen with a view to being in the fashion of the day. Whatever causes may have dictated its choice, the pleasure given by its hearing was general, and the merits of its performance were quickly appreciated.

The brilliant characteristics of Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso" were splendidly brought out in the performance of the evening, and the "Ossian" overture by Gade made a notably successful opening number for the programme.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, and the programme will consist of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major, Haydn's concerto for violoncello, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," and Beethoven's Turkish march, from "Ruins of Athens."

New Haven Union

ALEXANDER TROUP, R. S. BUCKMASTER.

NEW HAVEN, SUNDAY, NOV. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The opening concert of the series at the Hyperion Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given to-morrow evening. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent. At the concert to-morrow evening the orchestra will have the assistance of Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a contralto of considerable reputation in Chicago, who has recently been singing in Boston and New York with much success.

Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Aria, "Samson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mrs. Wyman.
Two movements from the Symphony No. 4
Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
(a) Regrets.....Delibes
(b) Bonne Nuit.....Massenet
(c) A une Fiancee.....Ferrari
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
(b) Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Tickets are now on sale at M. Steinert Sons, 777 Chapel street.

THE STODDARD COURSE.

Hyperion Theater—Nikisch.

To-Morrow (Monday) Evening at 8, First Grand Concert By the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOIST:

MRS. WALTER C. WYMAN.

The programme includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—Prelude "Lohengrin", Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner and other numbers.

MRS. WYMAN

Will sing with Orchestra Aria "Samson and Dalila", Saint-Saens and songs with piano.

Tickets now on sale at M. Steinert & Sons, 777, Chapel street.

n9 1t C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Reappearance of Campanini at Music Hall Yesterday.

The reappearance of Sig. Campanini, the tenor, made the event of the Sunday popular concert at Music Hall last evening, and the large audience attending showed the favor with which this singer is held here. He had a very hearty greeting upon making his appearance, round after round of applause being given him, and he chose as his selections for the programme the "Aida" romanza "Celeste Aida" and the romance from Bizet's "Carmen." These numbers have, in former days, been favorite selections for the concert stage with this singer, and he has held vast audiences spellbound by the charm of his vocal gifts as exhibited in their delivery.

It is a pleasure to be able to say that Sig. Campanini recalled his best efforts of former years in his contribution to the programme, and gave genuine satisfaction even to those familiar with his greatest successes on the opera and concert stages. In personal appearance he looked as if he had drank from the fabled fountain of youth, and his voice seemed as full, fresh, true and sympathetic as it did 10 years ago. It goes without saying that, with such a voice he charmed and delighted his audience in the "Aida" romance, for no tenor of the present day has ever excelled him in his interpretation, phrasing and delivery of this number. He graciously acceded to the demands of the audience for an encore number, and won another ovation by his singing of the "Carmen" romance. Whatever operation his throat may have been subjected to, it is quite evident that he now enjoys as great freedom in the use of his voice as he has at any time during his career in this country.

Mr. John Francis Gilder appeared as the piano soloist of the evening, and was heard in a tarantella and "Cotton Field Dance" of his own composition, an etude de concert "Tremolo" by Gottschalk, "The Brook" and other equally popular selections added as encore numbers. Mr. Gilder represents a class of pianists almost unknown to the concert stage of today but a larger following of his ideas in concert performances would remove many of the present terrors of the ordinary piano recital programme. He has all the technical attainments of the modern school pianist, and his touch has a limped clearness and purity which is but seldom attained by the modern methods. He uses his gifts to give pleasure to those who listen and leaves the educational branch of piano playing to more pretentious performers. He gained his usual success in his efforts last evening, winning double recalls after each appearance, and again proved the value of the pianoforte in popular concerts, when properly used.

The Ladies' Schubert quartet, Maude Nichols, first soprano; Jennie Whitcombe Worster, second soprano; Elizabeth Roberts, first also; Anna Louise Whitcombe, second alto, contributed a number of most enjoyable selections, and the Germania orchestra, under Emil Mollenhauer, played a well chosen list of selections with excellent results.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 9, 1890.

The programme for last evening had no such incongruous make-up as that performed at the previous concert, but it lacked variety, a very considerable portion of it being in the key of A minor; and this included Gade's overture to "Ossian," the Gounod aria from "Sappho" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. There were also songs with piano, and Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66. With the vivace and the subsequent movements of the symphony came the best music of the concert. Dvorak's scherzo is an interesting specimen of the composer's talent, but it lacks abandon and has little of the elfishness that is the essential characteristic of the genuine scherzo. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and her pleasing voice and refined interpretations were rapturously applauded. The playing of the orchestra was at its best with the final movements of the symphony, which were exceptionally well received.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Mr. Adamowski with his customary devotion to the cause of chamber music offered the following répertoire for the first concert of the season by his quartette in Steinert hall Monday evening:

Quartette in D minor.....Haydn
a. Cradle Song.....Fitzenhagen
b. Theme and variation.
(For four 'cellos).....Klengel
Quartette in C major op. 61.....Dvorak

There can be no questioning that Mr. Adamowski's ensemble is composed of four good artists. They are refined, and well-educated musicians, and much of the playing of the above works was of the first quality; but so far as certain portions of the programme were concerned, notably the slow movements where simple and unobtrusive sentiment was required, the interpretations were often a unit of misconception. That is to say, the ensemble seemed united upon almost anything but the very simplicity and naturalness that should have been accorded.

Otherwise all went well. The more robust and magnetic movements were especially well played. The pianos and fortes, save with such portions of the programme as have been noted, were ardently observed, and much of the shading, too, was exceptionally well graded.

Of the works performed it must be said the Klengel and Fitzenhagen novelties seemed more skilfully made in point of technical detail, than interesting. The Dvorak quartette, too, falls short of the highest artistic worthiness. While it is a profound and scholarly work, it is strangely void of any high order of melody or sentiment. The scherzo is a very bright movement, 'tis true, but the other movements, especially the finale, are about as superfluous and uninteresting specimens of artistic pedantry as one could expect to hear.

Cambridge Tribune
Date 11-8

The Second Symphony Concert.

Cambridge audiences are to be congratulated on the programmes that Mr. Nikisch arranges for them. The two concerts already given in Sanders theatre were more interesting than any of those yet given in Boston this season. The pieces played last Thursday, except the solo, are thoroughly familiar to concert-goers, but their arrangement was a novelty. Mr. Gericke once said to the writer: "What can you hear after a Beethoven symphony?" On this theory, he almost always placed the symphony last, with the result that many people invariably left the hall before the end of the concert. Many of the best directors put the symphony at the beginning, or in the middle, which seems, in many cases, the preferable arrangement. Certainly, the audience is more ready and able to listen to what is apt to be the heaviest part of the concert, if it comes first. In last Thursday's concert the symphony was Beethoven's fourth. Its most obvious characteristic, distinguishing it, as a whole, from the others by Beethoven, is its unceasing brightness and cheerfulness. From beginning to end, excepting some transient gloom in the introduction and in the Finale, there is hardly a sombre bar. The gay first subject, the sportive conversation of the bassoon, oboe, flute and clarinet, the syncopations that are cheerful and not tragic, all leave an impression of unbroken happiness. The humorous phrases of the bassoon, and their excellent performance, were noteworthy. The performance of the whole symphony was all that could be desired. The last movement is a veritable perpetual motion, and much more interesting in every way than the piece of Paganini's that was played at the first concert.

After the symphony came four short pieces, all of a popular character. The novelty of the occasion was a Rondo Capriccioso for violin, by Saint-Saëns, brilliantly played by Mr. T. Adamowski. The piece itself is a fascinating example of the modern French school of orchestral writing. While lacking in the massive strength and depth of the German school, in artistic finish, in original, piquant and charmingly clear effects, this school is, to use the current French expression, quite fin du siècle. Against the beautiful and suggestive orchestral background Mr. Adamowski displayed all the fire and brilliancy, as well as the poetic grace and technical perfection, that he has taught us to expect from him.

Of the rest of the programme, the Prelude of "Lohengrin" received such a performance as we never heard before, from Mr. Gericke, Mr. Seidl or Mr. Thomas. The high notes of the opening were played by the flutes and violins with all possible purity and smoothness, and gradually the rest of the orchestra joined in making a climax that inspired the audience to an unusual degree. Whatever one may think of Wagner's theories, it must be admitted that in this prelude he has composed a masterpiece.

As to the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, some musicians say that a fantastic waltz of this kind is out of place in a Symphony concert, but we think it decidedly not out of place. Sensational it undoubtedly is, but it is fascinating in its ingenuity. Of the dramatis personæ of the piece, Mr. Kneisel presented death, and tuned up his violin, and led off the wild dance in the most fiery manner, contrasting well the grotesque, clattering theme, and the more sombre one that represents the loneliness of the nocturnal scene. The whole piece is a repetition of these two themes in ever-varying combinations. The stroke of midnight was especially well given on the harp and horn, and Mr. Greene made the bones rattle on his xylophone. Finally the cock, represented by the oboe, put an end to the orgy, and the spectral dancers laid themselves in their graves again.

Last on the programme was Mendelssohn's Wedding March. Why this was played we are at a loss to guess. Mr. Nikisch chose to play it, however, and he played it as it is seldom heard. We advise all who think of getting married to engage this orchestra at once. In this, the last number, the drummer, who restrained himself with evident effort all through the evening, finally could restrain himself no longer, and burst forth like a victorious battery of artillery in tremendous efforts to drown all the rest of the instruments. We cannot help thinking that something is wrong when the drums are heard thus plainly over the whole orchestra. Especially in a piece like the Wedding March, undue prominence of one instrument throws the whole piece out of proportion.

The audience was larger than at the previous concert. Strict regard for accuracy compels us to admit that perhaps a dozen seats were vacant, but this was fewer than before. The reciprocal influence of the audience and the orchestra upon each other was marked, for the applause, especially after Mr. Adamowski's solo and the "Lohengrin," was actually what passes in Cambridge for enthusiasm, and, on the other hand, the orchestra and the soloist have rarely played more enjoyably. It was gratifying to note that the attention of the audience was held to the end, and very few persons left the hall till the last strains of the Wedding March had died away. K. M.

Clipping from Boston
New Haven Courier
Date 11-8

HYPERION THEATER.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Monday night. The sale of seats has been large and the audience promises to be one of the most high class and distinguished of

---

Date 11-8

HYPERION THEATER.

Monday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its series of concerts in this city. Good seats are still to be had at Steinert's music store.

---

[40]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

And now let us see what is to be done at Boston. Here Mr. Arthur Nikisch promises a series of symphony concerts with such a list of works as no London society would dream of announcing. Besides the stock classical works, he intends performing Bruckner's "Te Deum" (which is described as a most profound composition); symphonies by Volkmann, Tschaikowsky and Chadwick: overtures by Goldmark, Svendsen, Berlioz and Volkmann, and miscellaneous works by Moszkowski, Fuchs, Heuberger, &c. Nor will English music be overlooked, for it is said that pieces by Mackenzie, Stanford and others will be included. What will be the result of all this concert giving and concert going? Will the people of New York and Boston learn to appreciate Wagner and to love Mozart and Beethoven? Will they cease to pay fancy prices to hear a popular prima donna or a fashionable pianist? Will they cease to sing "White Wings" and "Put Me in My Little Bed?" We must possess our souls in patience, for America is a great country, and perhaps the results when they do come will be as great in proportion as the time we shall have to wait for their realization.

We were not aware before that we were an unmusical nation. Probably the London "Musical World" has been listening to the vaporings of some disgruntled critic who could not succeed in getting his queer compositions in queer keys performed here. Americans are a musical nation and the avidity with which we assimilate music is remarkable and, it might be added, conducive of musical indigestion and plethora. The work of Messrs. Thomas, Gericke, Van der Stucken, Nikisch and Seidl has borne fruit, and we need not wait until the millennium for the results that the "Musical World" anticipates. Vulgar music will always obtain, but in that respect New York is infinitely the better off, for good music is cheaper here—and consequently within the reach of the masses—than in London. We nevertheless gladly reprint the opinion of our esteemed contemporary across the millpond on the momentous question.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOV. 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a very large audience with an evening of almost unalloyed pleasure at Chickering Hall last evening. It was the first concert of this famous body of musicians in this city this season, and there was abundant evidence in the size and character of the audience that it was looked upon as a notable occurrence. Indeed, every concert by the Boston orchestra is notable, for the performance of master music by such a splendidly trained band of instrumentalists under the guidance of such potent emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch must always rise to the importance of an event.

There may be differences of opinion as to Mr. Nikisch's reading, especially among those who make a fetish of tradition. But tradition is a very uncertain guide in musical interpretation, and doubtless he is the wisest conductor who follows Wagner's advice and finds his reading of a work in the work itself, and not in metronome marks, contemporary comment, or reminiscence. This is certainly what Mr. Nikisch does, and he wields a tremendous influence over an audience by the irresistible eloquence and striking significance of his readings. Yet one feels during the performance and remains convinced in the calmer moments which follow it that, though the conductor may have treated some tempi with freedom and accentuated certain passages originally, he has been guilty of no injustice to the composer whose music he was presenting. For it is beyond question that there is a great difference between radically changing the character of a movement by an alteration of tempo or the balance of parts on the one hand and bringing out more forcibly some of its beauties by an alteration of the pace which does not transform or obscure its spirit.

This seems a just view of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the final number on last evening's programme. He certainly did introduce ritardandi and accelerandi that were unfamiliar, and in a number of passages he lifted some of the intermediate voice parts into unusual prominence. The result was a justification of the means. There was no violation of the spirit of the symphony; it was still unmistakably the soul of Beethoven that spoke to us, but with a more than ordinarily luminous revelation of its unquestioned romanticism. Beethoven belonged as much to the romantic as to the classic school. It is due to this fact that he wrote not for a day, but for all time; that, as Mr. Edward Dannreuther has admirably said, "He passes beyond the horizon of a mere singer and poet, and touches upon the domain of the seer and the prophet." Mr. Nikisch's individuality of treatment was most conspicuous in the final movement of the symphony. It was the broadest and most heroic interpretation of the movement that we have ever heard, and it was achieved at some sacrifice of the traditional tempo, but the alteration was in the direction of weight, impressiveness, and majesty, and surely this is in accord with the thought of Beethoven in his composition of the symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture. The former was played in essentially the same style as it was under Mr. Gericke. The latter was performed magnificently. Every phrase of the composition had been studied by the conductor with a view to a complete exposition of its musical value, and the grand climax was developed with overwhelming power. It was a most dramatic performance. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who has not been heard before in this city. She sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch—Delibes's "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," and Ferrari's "A Une Fiancée." Her voice is smooth and full in quality, her phrasing good, and her method generally worthy of praise. Her singing of the French songs was especially commendable and won her well merited applause. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Nikisch proved to be a prince of accompanists.

BOSTON HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 9, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mrs. Wyman Soloist.

The Lilliputians at the Hollis Street—Final "Grand Duchess" Performances—Tonight's Concerts—Scotch Singers—"Paul Jones" and the "Merry Monarch"—Return of Strauss.

At the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, a most enjoyable programme was given under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, soprano, as the soloist.

Mrs. Wyman has made a number of most successful concert appearances in this city in former seasons, but upon none of these occasions has she given so great satisfaction as in her selections of last evening. She sung, as her number with orchestra, the great soprano aria from Gounod's "Sappho" and her interpretation of its vocal beauties was most enjoyable in every way. The phrasing and the delivery of the aria showed rare intelligence and dramatic instinct, and the voice of the singer met the demands of the composition most happily. The musical quality of Mrs. Wyman's voice was even more prominently shown in the group of songs with piano accompaniment which made her second contribution to the programme. These were "Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari, all of which proved excellent songs and comparative novelties. In her singing of these numbers Mrs. Wyman won a veritable vocal triumph by the graceful beauty of her delivery and the good taste and fine expression shown in their interpretation. The Massenet song fairly captivated the audience, and the singer was honored with hearty and prolonged applause after each appearance. Mr. Nikisch added greatly to the enjoyment of the songs by his admirable playing of the accompaniments.

The patrons of these concerts who are gaining their first acquaintance with the standard symphonies this season are fortunate, indeed, for Mr. Nikisch leaves little to be desired in his reading of such compositions, and his men have become so well acquainted with his ideas that the playing of such works is always attended with the best results. Scotch music is having a very prominent place in the concert programmes of this season, and possibly the symphony of the evening, Mendelssohn's No. 3, "The Scotch," was chosen with a view to being in the fashion of the day. Whatever causes may have dictated its choice, the pleasure given by its hearing was general, and the merits of its performance were quickly appreciated.

The brilliant characteristics of Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso" were splendidly brought out in the performance of the evening, and the "Ossian" overture by Gade made a notably successful opening number for the programme.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, and the programme will consist of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major, Haydn's concerto for violoncello, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," and Beethoven's Turkish march, from "Ruins of Athens."

BOSTON HERALD.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1890.

Reappearance of Campanini at the Music Hall "Pop."

The reappearance of Sig. Campanini, the tenor, made the event of the Sunday popular concert at Music Hall last evening, and the large audience attending showed the favor with which this singer is held here. He had a very hearty greeting upon making his appearance, round after round of applause being given him, and he chose as his selections for the programme the "Aida" romanza "Celeste Aida" and the romance from Bizet's "Carmen." These numbers have, in former days, been favorite selections for the concert stage with this singer, and he has held vast audiences spellbound by the charm of his vocal gifts as exhibited in their delivery.

It is a pleasure to be able to say that Sig. Campanini recalled his best efforts of former years in his contribution to the programme, and gave genuine satisfaction even to those familiar with his greatest successes on the opera and concert stages. In personal appearance he looked as if he had drank from the fabled fountain of youth, and his voice seemed as full, fresh, true and sympathetic as it did 10 years ago. It goes without saying that, with such a voice he charmed and delighted his audience in the "Aida" romance, for no tenor of the present day has ever excelled him in his interpretation, phrasing and delivery of this number. He graciously acceded to the demands of the audience for an encore number, and won another ovation by his singing of the "Carmen" romance. Whatever operation his throat may have been subjected to, it is quite evident that he now enjoys as great freedom in the use of his voice as he has at any time during his career in this country.

Mr. John Francis Gilder appeared as the piano soloist of the evening, and was heard in a tarantella and "Cotton Field Dance" of his own composition, an etude de concert "Tremolo" by Gottschalk, "The Brook" and other equally popular selections added as encore numbers. Mr. Gilder represents a class of pianists almost unknown to the concert stage of today but a larger following of his ideas in concert performances would remove many of the present terrors of the ordinary piano recital programme. He has all the technical attainments of the modern school pianist, and his touch has a limped clearness and purity which is but seldom attained by the modern methods. He uses his gifts to give pleasure to those who listen and leaves the educational branch of piano playing to more pretentious performers. He gained his usual success in his efforts last evening, winning double recalls after each appearance, and again proved the value of the pianoforte in popular concerts, when properly used.

The Ladies' Schubert quartet, Maude Nichols, first soprano; Jennie Whitcombe Worster, second soprano; Elizabeth Roberts, first also; Anna Louise Whitcombe, second alto, contributed a number of most enjoyable selections, and the Germania orchestra, under Emil Mollenhauer, played a well chosen list of selections with excellent results.

Clipping from Tribune Cambridge Mass

Date 11-8

The Second Symphony Concert.

Cambridge audiences are to be congratulated on the programmes that Mr. Nikisch arranges for them. The two concerts already given in Sanders theatre were more interesting than any of those yet given in Boston this season. The pieces played last Thursday, except the solo, are thoroughly familiar to concert-goers, but their arrangement was a novelty. Mr. Gericke once said to the writer: "What can you hear after a Beethoven symphony?" On this theory, he almost always placed the symphony last, with the result that many people invariably left the hall before the end of the concert. Many of the best directors put the symphony at the beginning, or in the middle, which seems, in many cases, the preferable arrangement. Certainly, the audience is more ready and able to listen to what is apt to be the heaviest part of the concert, if it comes first. In last Thursday's concert the symphony was Beethoven's fourth. Its most obvious characteristic, distinguishing it, as a whole, from the others by Beethoven, is its unceasing brightness and cheerfulness. From beginning to end, excepting some transient gloom in the introduction and in the Finale, there is hardly a sombre bar. The gay first subject, the sportive conversation of the bassoon, oboe, flute and clarinet, the syncopations that are cheerful and not tragic, all leave an impression of unbroken happiness. The humorous phrases of the bassoon, and their excellent performance, were noteworthy. The performance of the whole symphony was all that could be desired. The last movement is a veritable perpetual motion, and much more interesting in every way than the piece of Paganini's that was played at the first concert.

After the symphony came four short pieces, all of a popular character. The novelty of the occasion was a Rondo Capriccioso for violin, by Saint-Saëns, brilliantly played by Mr. T. Adamowski. The piece itself is a fascinating example of the modern French school of orchestral writing. While lacking in the massive strength and depth of the German school, in artistic finish, in original, piquant and charmingly clear effects, this school is, to use the current French expression, quite fin du siècle. Against the beautiful and suggestive orchestral background Mr. Adamowski displayed all the fire and brilliancy, as well as the poetic grace and technical perfection, that he has taught us to expect from him.

Of the rest of the programme, the Prelude of "Lohengrin" received such a performance as we never heard before, from Mr. Gericke, Mr. Seidl or Mr. Thomas. The high notes of the opening were played by the flutes and violins with all possible purity and smoothness, and gradually the rest of the orchestra joined in making a climax that inspired the audience to an unusual degree. Whatever one may think of Wagner's theories, it must be admitted that in this prelude he has composed a masterpiece.

As to the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, some musicians say that a fantastic waltz of this kind is out of place in a Symphony concert, but we think it decidedly not out of place. Sensational it undoubtedly is, but it is fascinating in its ingenuity. Of the dramatis personæ of the piece, Mr. Kneisel presented death, and tuned up his violin, and led off the wild dance in the most fiery manner, contrasting well the grotesque, clattering theme, and the more sombre one that represents the loneliness of the nocturnal scene. The whole piece is a repetition of these two themes in ever-varying combinations. The stroke of midnight was especially well given on the harp and horn, and Mr. Greene made the bones rattle on his xylophone. Finally the cock, represented by the oboe, put an end to the orgy, and the spectral dancers laid themselves in their graves again.

Last on the programme was Mendelssohn's Wedding March. Why this was played we are at a loss to guess. Mr. Nikisch chose to play it, however, and he played it as it is seldom heard. We advise all who think of getting married to engage this orchestra at once. In this, the last number, the drummer, who restrained himself with evident effort all through the evening, finally could restrain himself no longer, and burst forth like a victorious battery of artillery in tremendous efforts to drown all the rest of the instruments. We cannot help thinking that something is wrong when the drums are heard thus plainly over the whole orchestra. Especially in a piece like the Wedding March, undue prominence of one instrument throws the whole piece out of proportion.

The audience was larger than at the previous concert. Strict regard for accuracy compels us to admit that perhaps a dozen seats were vacant, but this was fewer than before The reciprocal influence of the audience and the orchestra upon each other was marked, for the applause, especially after Mr. Adamowski's solo and the "Lohengrin," was actually what passes in Cambridge for enthusiasm, and, on the other hand, the orchestra and the soloist have rarely played more enjoyably. It was gratifying to note that the attention of the audience was held to the end, and very few persons left the hall till the last strains of the Wedding March had died away. K. M.

Roll Ct.

Date 11-8

HYPERION THEATER.

Monday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its series of concerts in this city. Good seats are still to be had at Steinert's music store.

[40]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

And now let us see what is to be done at Boston. Here Mr. Arthur Nikisch promises a series of symphony concerts with such a list of works as no London society would dream of announcing. Besides the stock classical works, he intends performing Bruckner's "Te Deum" (which is described as a most profound composition); symphonies by Volkmann, Tschaikowsky and Chadwick: overtures by Goldmark, Svendsen, Berlioz and Volkmann, and miscellaneous works by Moszkowski, Fuchs, Heuberger, &c. Nor will English music be overlooked, for it is said that pieces by Mackenzie, Stanford and others will be included. What will be the result of all this concert giving and concert going? Will the people of New York and Boston learn to appreciate Wagner and to love Mozart and Beethoven? Will they cease to pay fancy prices to hear a popular prima donna or a fashionable pianist? Will they cease to sing "White Wings" and "Put Me in My Little Bed?" We must possess our souls in patience, for America is a great country, and perhaps the results when they do come will be as great in proportion as the time we shall have to wait for their realization.

We were not aware before that we were an unmusical nation. Probably the London "Musical World" has been listening to the vaporings of some disgruntled critic who could not succeed in getting his queer compositions in queer keys performed here. Americans are a musical nation and the avidity with which we assimilate music is remarkable and, it might be added, conducive of musical indigestion and plethora. The work of Messrs. Thomas, Gericke, Van der Stucken, Nikisch and Seidl has borne fruit, and we need not wait until the millennium for the results that the "Musical World" anticipates. Vulgar music will always obtain, but in that respect New York is infinitely the better off, for good music is cheaper here—and consequently within the reach of the masses—than in London. We nevertheless gladly reprint the opinion of our esteemed contemporary across the millpond on the momentous question.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 9, 1890.

The programme for last evening had no such incongruous make-up as that performed at the previous concert, but it lacked variety, a very considerable portion of it being in the key of A minor; and this included Gade's overture to "Ossian," the Gounod aria from "Sappho" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. There were also songs with piano, and Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66. With the vivace and the subsequent movements of the symphony came the best music of the concert. Dvorak's scherzo is an interesting specimen of the composer's talent, but it lacks abandon and has little of the elfishness that is the essential characteristic of the genuine scherzo. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and her pleasing voice and refined interpretations were rapturously applauded. The playing of the orchestra was at its best with the final movements of the symphony, which were exceptionally well received.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Mr. Adamowski with his customary devotion to the cause of chamber music offered the following répertoire for the first concert of the season by his quartette in Steinert hall Monday evening:

Quartette in D minor.....Haydn
a. Cradle Song.....Fitzenhagen
b. Theme and variation.
(For four 'cellos).....Klengel
Quartette in C major op. 61.....Dvorak

There can be no questioning that Mr. Adamowski's ensemble is composed of four good artists. They are refined, and well-educated musicians, and much of the playing of the above works was of the first quality; but so far as certain portions of the programme were concerned, notably the slow movements where simple and unobtrusive sentiment was required, the interpretations were often a unit of misconception. That is to say, the ensemble seemed united upon almost anything but the very simplicity and naturalness that should have been accorded.

Otherwise all went well. The more robust and magnetic movements were especially well played. The pianos and fortes, save with such portions of the programme as have been noted, were ardently observed, and much of the shading, too, was exceptionally well graded.

Of the works performed it must be said the Klengel and Fitzenhagen novelties seemed more skilfully made in point of technical detail, than interesting. The Dvorak quartette, too, falls short of the highest artistic worthiness. While it is a profound and scholarly work, it is strangely void of any high order of melody or sentiment. The scherzo is a very bright movement, 'tis true, but the other movements, especially the finale, are about as superfluous and uninteresting specimens of artistic pedantry as one could expect to hear.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOV. 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a very large audience with an evening of almost unalloyed pleasure at Chickering Hall last evening. It was the first concert of this famous body of musicians in this city this season, and there was abundant evidence in the size and character of the audience that it was looked upon as a notable occurrence. Indeed, every concert by the Boston orchestra is notable, for the performance of master music by such a splendidly trained band of instrumentalists under the guidance of such potent emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch must always rise to the importance of an event.

There may be differences of opinion as to Mr. Nikisch's reading, especially among those who make a fetish of tradition. But tradition is a very uncertain guide in musical interpretation, and doubtless he is the wisest conductor who follows Wagner's advice and finds his reading of a work in the work itself, and not in metronome marks, contemporary comment, or reminiscence. This is certainly what Mr. Nikisch does, and he wields a tremendous influence over an audience by the irresistible eloquence and striking significance of his readings. Yet one feels during the performance and remains convinced in the calmer moments which follow it that, though the conductor may have treated some tempi with freedom and accentuated certain passages originally, he has been guilty of no injustice to the composer whose music he was presenting. For it is beyond question that there is a great difference between radically changing the character of a movement by an alteration of tempo or the balance of parts on the one hand and bringing out more forcibly some of its beauties by an alteration of the pace which does not transform or obscure its spirit.

This seems a just view of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the final number on last evening's programme. He certainly did introduce ritardandi and acceleraudi that were unfamiliar, and in a number of passages he lifted some of the intermediate voice parts into unusual prominence. The result was a justification of the means. There was no violation of the spirit of the symphony; it was still unmistakably the soul of Beethoven that spoke to us, but with a more than ordinarily luminous revelation of its unquestioned romanticism. Beethoven belonged as much to the romantic as to the classic school. It is due to this fact that he wrote not for a day, but for all time; that, as Mr. Edward Dannreuther has admirably said, "He passes beyond the horizon of a mere singer and poet, and touches upon the domain of the seer and the prophet." Mr. Nikisch's individuality of treatment was most conspicuous in the final movement of the symphony. It was the broadest and most heroic interpretation of the movement that we have ever heard, and it was achieved at some sacrifice of the traditional tempo, but the alteration was in the direction of weight, impressiveness, and majesty, and surely this is in accord with the thought of Beethoven in his composition of the symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture. The former was played in essentially the same style as it was under Mr. Gericke. The latter was performed magnificently. Every phrase of the composition had been studied by the conductor with a view to a complete exposition of its musical value, and the grand climax was developed with overwhelming power. It was a most dramatic performance. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who has not been heard before in this city. She sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch—Delibes's "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," and Ferrari's "A Une Fiancée." Her voice is smooth and full in quality, her phrasing good, and her method generally worthy of praise. Her singing of the French songs was especially commendable and won her well-merited applause. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Nikisch proved to be a prince of accompanists.

New Haven Union

ALEXANDER TROUP. R. S. HUCKMASTER.

NEW HAVEN, SUNDAY, NOV., 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The opening concert of the series at the Hyperion Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given to-morrow evening. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra reached so high a standard of excellence last season that improvement in its work can hardly be expected. Yet through minor changes here and there and the constant watchfulness of Mr. Nikisch, coupled with a small increase in the number of players, some gain will undoubtedly be apparent. At the concert to-morrow evening the orchestra will have the assistance of Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a contralto of considerable reputation in Chicago, who has recently been singing in Boston and New York with much success.

Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Aria, "Samson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mrs. Wyman.
Two movements from the Symphony No. 4
Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
(a) Regrets.....Delibes
(b) Bonne Nuit.....Massenet
(c) A une Fiancee.....Ferrari
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
(b) Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Tickets are now on sale at M. Steinert Sons, 777 Chapel street.

THE STODDARD COURSE.

Hyperion Theater—Nikisch.

To-Morrow (Monday) Evening at 8, First Grand Concert By the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOIST:

MRS. WALTER C. WYMAN.

The programme includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—Prelude "Lohengrin", Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner and other numbers.

MRS. WYMAN

Will sing with Orchestra Aria "Samson and Dalila", Saint-Saens and songs with piano.

Tickets now on sale at M. Steinert & Sons, 777, Chapel street.

n9 1t C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Clipping from Courier New Haven Conn

Date 11-9

HYPERION THEATER.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Monday night. The sale of seats has been large and the audience promises to be one of the most high class and distinguished of

...e Sun.

...ESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the serial concerts that may be said to constitute, with the representations of opera at the Metropolitan, the musical season, as viewed from the standpoint of the thoughtful music lovers was given in Chickering Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, yesterday evening. For the past four years Mr. Higginson's admirable band has furnished four concerts during the winter in this city, and with each year the hold gained upon the public by the organization and its conductor has gathered strength. Their present status was indicated last night by the presence of an audience that crowded the hall, and by the somewhat uncommon appearance—in connection with lyric enterprises, at least—of a signboard announcing that standing room only was in reserve for the late comers.

In quality and numerical force, the orchestra differs not from the band of former years. The main element of its strength lies, properly and gratefully, in its strings, the absolute perfection of which leaves no chance for faultfinding. The mysterious delight of Berlioz over the utterances of a score of violins, singing with the suaveness and expression of a chorus of beautiful voices, would be called forth anew, if the French musician lived, by the work of Mr. Nikisch's quartet, which, on this side of the Atlantic, is absolutely beyond compare. Hardly less remarkable is the band's wood-wind, the oboes especially denoting in their semi-pastoral timbre the true character of the instrument; the horns, however, are not up to the high standard of the remainder of the organization. But what is most delightful in the performance of the Boston players is the exquisite homogeneity and loveliness of the tone they pour forth as a body of instrumentalists; the precision with which the musicians go through their task; the happy distribution of values, to borrow an expression from a sister art; and the finish lavished upon the tone-pictures set before the listener, and bestowed upon them with loving care and consummate technical knowledge. There is abundant masculinity in the playing of the men from Boston, but, after all, delicacy, proportion, and polish are the chief characteristics of their achievements.

Mr. Nikisch's programme last night included, as to orchestral numbers, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," and the "Eroica" symphony; the soloist of the concert was Mr. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho," and songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari. The instrumental compositions are all familiar to the frequenter of the concert room, and their rendering was distinguished by the excellences that were extolled in former years. In Weber's fairy strains the highest point of orchestral playing was unquestionably attained, and the purely melodic and poetical episodes of Wagner, unevenly tone-poem, were also treated with unexceptional felicity. The "Eroica" was handled by Mr. Nikisch in a fashion more academic than emotional, and for this there is reason, we should say, to be thankful. The admirers of ecstatic commentators, that would sacrifice to the violent expression of imaginary sentiments, measured eloquence, well-balanced light and shade, and carefully planned and faultlessly depicted gradations of accent, may have missed in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony a deeply dramatic element, the existence of which is at least problematical; to the auditor accessible to the charm of music per se, nothing more completely pleasure-giving could have been wished. The applause that followed the band's numbers was frequent and enthusiastic.

Mrs. Wyman, the soloist of the occasion, was particularly successful in her French songs. This lady, who hails from Chicago, possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, the medium tones of which are the best; she phrases with taste and skill, and her diction is the most expressive and artistic that has been enjoyed for a long while. In the air from "Sappho"—a rather thankless composition, by the way—Mrs. Wyman was not very happy; in Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" her accent and enunciation literally carried away the audience.

NEW YORK HERALD,

...EDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of this season's series of Boston Symphony concerts was given in Chickering Hall last evening.

That our music lovers appreciate the musical treats offered by this organization was evinced by the fact that there were no seats left at the box office at nine o'clock yesterday morning, and a huge red and black sign of "Standing Room Only" was flaunted in the eyes of the late comers.

It is always a pleasure to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the reception given Mr. Nikisch last evening expressed in a most hearty manner the esteem and respect felt for him and his able musicians. The programme was marked by the same rigorous conservatism that has pervaded every programme presented here by the orchestra. There were but three orchestral numbers:—Weber's overture to "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. In them all were noticed the same nervous, impassioned work of the conductor and the alert following of the men.

It makes but little difference as to the score. The work is always the same—carefully studied and executed with a precision and perfection of skill that comes only from constant rehearsing and infinite pains.

A soloist, unknown to us but a favorite in Boston, a Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, added to the enjoyment of the concert by singing in a delightful manner an aria from Gounod's "Sappho" and a group of French songs.

...OVEMBER 12, 1890.

BOSTON MUSICIANS HEARD.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been regarded among the important musical events of the past few seasons. The reception given to this fine organization last night at Chickering Hall showed that their good work is appreciated to the fullest extent here. Those who arrived at Chickering Hall towards the hour for the concert to commence and had not secured places in advance found it impossible to get a seat. When Mr. Nikisch made the first rap on his desk he called to order as fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage. As usual, he is particularly fortunate regarding the strength of his strings. The winds are strong in number but in quality much inferior to strings, to which division of the orchestra indeed belongs much of the credit for the clever work done in some of the numbers last night.

Mr. Nikisch succeeds, in spite of something very like "fussing," in always keeping his players up to a manly spirit of vigor. His presentation of the overture to "Oberon" was very acceptable, for this reason and for the absolute precision with which it was rendered. Some objection might be made to his violent contrasts of effect even here, for Mr. Nikisch knows no half tints. His colors are all vivid. But on the whole, the opening of the programme was satisfactory. Many good things might be said, too, regarding the "Faust" overture. A great fault in his rendering, however, is that he misses entirely Wagner's poetic spirit. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra has many good points, one of them being that he succeeds in keeping his finickyness of demeanor out of his music. He is always precise, generally forceful, sometimes fanciful, rarely poetic, never great. No man can be that unless he succeeds thoroughly in feeling the composer's ideas. Mr. Nikisch is too entirely self-centred for any such self-sacrifice. He essayed last night the greatest of symphonies, the "Eroica," with varied results. The poetry of the first movement was lost, but the manner of the "March Funebre" was of an impressive dignity.

A delightful feature of the concert was the vocal numbers rendered by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, and her participation contributed not a little to the success of the evening. The lady is from Chicago, but she sang an aria from Gounod's "Sapho" and three songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari with such perfect French that she might be taken for a Parisienne. Mrs. Wyman's voice is a mezzo soprano, warm and rich in color, the lower register being remarkably full and sonorous. The opening recitative of the "Sapho" aria was finely delivered and her singing of the aria was finished and artistic. Rarely have French songs been so well interpretated as those last night by Mrs. Wyman. Her enunciation is clear and beautiful, her phrasing artistic and her style pure and finished. Of the three songs, "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, proved the favorite, and at the conclusion the artiste was recalled several times, and finally repeated this exquisite gem. Mrs. Wyman's future appearances in New York will be looked forward to with pleasure. The piano accompaniments to the songs were delightfully played by Mr. Nikisch.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

MR. NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that vareity of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season. She sang the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet," and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful texture and her control of it is excellent. Her singing was delightful and the audience was enthusiastic.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

What gives promise to be the most profitable, if not delightful, series of concerts ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York was begun in Chickering Hall last night. According to local ideas, there is somewhat of a disparity between the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall; but while this is said it must be added that the bad effects of this disparity, as they were forced upon the attention on similar occasions in the past, were reduced to a minimum because of the homogeneity and nobility of the tone given out by the orchestra, and the nice balance between the various choirs. Occasionally, particularly in the soft passages, and even in the loud where the string tone predominated, the eloquence of the music, its stimulating power, was wonderfully heightened by the circumstance that the room was so small that one was obliged to feel something of the elemental force of the tones, but this advantage was partly offset by the circumstance that technical slips (of which there were more than a few) forced themselves more unpleasantly upon the ear than when the concerts were given in the larger Steinway Hall, with its perfect acoustics. New-Yorkers have heard so much good orchestral playing during the last two decades, that is, orchestral playing which was virile and which gave just expression to the composer's musical thoughts, that they have come to look forward to the Boston Orchestra's concerts chiefly to enjoy the technical finish of its performances. Though last night's concert was admirable in this respect, it could not escape notice that the changed surroundings measurably modified this one-sided kind of enjoyment. That splendid body of strings, so rich, so sonorous, so capable of striking like a thunderbolt at the inspiring command of Mr. Nikisch, could scarcely appear to better advantage anywhere, but not so the wind choirs. Their occasional slight crudities were heard more plainly than in past seasons.

This change, however, was not all due to the room. Some of the tender blossoms in the critical garden of Boston have been bruised by the blows of sound which Mr. Nikisch has permitted his men to hurl out in strongly dramatic climaxes and have shrunk in dismay at his disposition to care a little more for the spirit than the matter of the music which he has performed. If they think Mr. Nikisch, as he disclosed himself last night, drastic, we wonder what they thought of Mr. Seidl's readings last Monday night! Yet Mr. Nikisch is far from conventional. One of his cardinal principles is Mr. Seidl's constant rule of action: Do not under any circumstances become tedious. The judgment and the taste of the majority of the music-lovers of to-day approve the principle. They have felt the influence of latter-day romantic and dramatic music and become convinced that music has at least as much to do with the emotions as with sense-perception—perhaps more. All that is done under the sway of the newer principle need not, of course, to be approved. There were many things in the performance last night of the "Heroic" Symphony which might fairly be questioned on the score that neither the intentions of the composer as they are to be read in the printed pages nor the laws of beauty as they are universally accepted were subserved by them, though the work was never for a moment permitted to become tedious. The proof of this which was most obvious lay in the fact that in each instance the highest element of beauty, which is repose, was sacrificed. Yet for all that the evening was a season of great musical enjoyment, in which the loveliness of Weber's "Oberon" overture was as bewitching as the brilliancy and grandeur of the "Faust" overture of Weber's successor at Dresden were overpowering.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the vocalist of the evening, made a much deeper impression than she did when, in February, 1889, she sang at one of the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Her taste seems to be in the direction of French music. Last night she sang an air from Gounod's "Sapho" ("O ma Lyre immortelle") and three exceedingly dainty specimens of the song-form as the French have cultivated it (Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari). In the songs she was especially successful. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic mezzo-soprano, her style full of ardor, and she has rare skill in maintaining herself on any fervid plane to which the sentiment of the music carries her. She was most generously applauded and deserved it all. The hall was crowded.

Clipping from Press
New York city
Date 11-12

The Boston Symphony Concert.

"Standing room only" is an unusual sign to find displayed at a symphony concert, and yet this was the case at Chickering Hall last evening when the Boston Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Nikisch, gave the first of the four concerts that will form its New York season. The audience was fine in quality, too, as well as large, and enjoyed the entertainment much.

The programme was severely dignified. Weber's "Oberon" overture, Wagner's "Faust" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony being the orchestral numbers. The band is in finer form, if that were possible, than it was last spring, and played with the precision, power and delicacy that have become associated with its work. The wood wind and brass choirs seem to be better than in former seasons, while the string band remains without a rival in the masculine breadth and beautiful singing quality of its tone. The orchestra, however, appears to be rather too large for the hall. Some of the climaxes last evening were overwhelming in the volume and sonority of the tone. Yet the playing was superb throughout, and elicited hearty applause.

The singer was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who made a charming impression by her group of three French songs (by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari), but whose style and voice are scarcely adapted to the broad, dramatic measures of Gounod's aria "Sapho." She sang with an excellent voice and method, and quite took the audience by storm by the thoroughly artistic simplicity and feeling with which she gave the songs, one of which, Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," she repeated.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on December 9.

The...

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

PHILADELPHIA.

First Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Opera.

The high esteem in which the lovers of music in Philadelphia now hold the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again cordially manifested last night by the brilliant and crowded audience which heard the first concert of the season by this admirable organization at the Academy of Music. Before 8 o'clock every seat in the house was sold, so that many of those who wished to secure seats had to be content with standing room.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica"
Allegro con brio.
Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).
Finale (Allegro molto, Poco Andante ed espressione; Presto).
Ambroise Thomas.....Aria, Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Wagner......"A Faust Overture"
Massenet.....Aria, "Herodiade"
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"

The Eroica Symphony, by Beethoven—the opening number—was a revelation to the audience. In this work Beethoven departed from the usual custom of beginning with an introduction; two chords given out fortissimo serving in its place. Then enters the first theme, short but noble in character. In the second movement—a funeral march—Beethoven foreshadowed the downfall of the great Napoleon, to whom the symphony was dedicated. The third movement is an excessively bright tone picture of a "lovable, cheerful man, who, in health and happiness, passes through Nature's plains, smiling at her flowery fields, and making the forest heights resound with his merry hunting horn." The last movement is, perhaps, the least interesting to the average hearer, but abounds in beauties, nevertheless.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere only strengthened the good impression she made here last season. She was in splendid voice, and gave a delightful rendering to the aria from the mad scene in Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." When she had finished, the audience gently but persistently insisted upon a repetition of the number. After several recalls she repeated a part of it, evidently against the wishes of the leader, M. Nikisch. Later in the programme she sang "Herodiade," by Massenet, charmingly. Mlle De Vere will always be welcome in Philadelphia.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was rendered with careful attention to light and shade, and made a pleasant contrast to the other numbers on the programme. The overture to "Oberon," composed of themes from Weber's charming opera of the same name, made a fitting close to an excellent programme. Few composers have written such charming, fairy-like music as the opening movement—adagio sostenuto. The magic horn begins and the fairies answer by their presence, represented first by the strings and later on by wood. After a fortissimo chord from the full orchestra the allegro con fuoco section is ushered in, beginning with a subject taken from the quartette, "Over the Dark Blue Waters." Soon after the clarionet gives out a second subject—the theme of Huon's song—"From Boyhood Trained." Later on "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," is prominently heard. The great audience lingered to applaud the finale.

...ging from...
Bulletin Philadelphia P...
Date 11-10
...tion.

MUSICAL.

The Programme for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 3, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures—Weber's familiar prelude to Oberon, recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and Faust overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the mad scene from the Hamlet of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Massenet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of great variety, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer, will be the soloist.

Bulletin Philadelphia Pa.
Date 11/10

The Programme for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 3, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures—Weber's familiar prelude to Oberon, recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and Faust overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the mad scene from the Hamlet of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Massenet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of great variety, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer, will be the soloist.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the serial concerts that may be said to constitute, with the representations of opera at the Metropolitan, the musical season, as viewed from the standpoint of the thoughtful music lovers was given at Chickering Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, yesterday evening. For the past four years Mr. Higginson's admirable band has furnished four concerts during the winter in this city, and with each year the hold gained upon the public by the organization and its conductor has gathered strength. Their present status was indicated last night by the presence of an audience that crowded the hall, and by the somewhat uncommon appearance—in connection with lyric enterprises, at least—of a signboard announcing that standing room only was in reserve for the late comers.

In quality and numerical force, the orchestra differs not from the band of former years. The main element of its strength lies, properly and gratefully, in its strings, the absolute perfection of which leaves no chance for fault-finding. The mysterious delight of Berlioz over the utterances of a score of violins, singing with the suaveness and expression of a chorus of beautiful voices, would be called forth anew, if the French musician lived, by the work of Mr. Nikisch's quartet, which, on this side of the Atlantic, is absolutely beyond compare. Hardly less remarkable is the band's wood-wind, the oboes especially denoting in their semi-pastoral timbre the true character of the instrument; the horns, however, are not up to the high standard of the remainder of the organization. But what is most delightful in the performance of the Boston players is the exquisite homogeneity and loveliness of the tone they pour forth as a body of instrumentalists; the precision with which the musicians go through their task; the happy distribution of values, to borrow an expression from a sister art; and the finish lavished upon the tone-pictures set before the listener, and bestowed upon them with loving care and consummate technical knowledge. There is abundant masculinity in the playing of the men from Boston, but, after all, delicacy, proportion, and polish are the chief characteristics of their achievements.

Mr. Nikisch's programme last night included, as to orchestral numbers, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," and the "Eroica" symphony; the soloist of the concert was Mr. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho," and songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari. The instrumental compositions are all familiar to the frequenter of the concert room, and their rendering was distinguished by the excellences that were extolled in former years. In Weber's fairy strains the highest point of orchestral playing was unquestionably attained, and the purely melodic and poetical episodes of Wagner, uneven tone-poem, were also treated with unexceptional felicity. The "Eroica" was handled by Mr. Nikisch in a fashion more academic than emotional, and for this there is reason, we should say, to be thankful. The admirers of ecstatic commentators, that would sacrifice to the violent expression of imaginary sentiments, measured eloquence, well-balanced light and shade, and carefully planned and faultlessly depicted gradations of accent, may have missed in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony a deeply dramatic element, the existence of which is at least problematical; to the auditor accessible to the charm of music per se, nothing more completely pleasure-giving could have been wished. The applause that followed the band's numbers was frequent and enthusiastic.

Mrs. Wyman, the soloist of the occasion, was particularly successful in her French songs. This lady, who hails from Chicago, possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, the medium tones of which are the best; she phrases with taste and skill, and her diction is the most expressive and artistic that has been enjoyed for a long while. In the air from "Sappho"—a rather thankless composition, by the way—Mrs. Wyman was not very happy; in Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" her accent and enunciation literally carried away the audience.

NEW YORK HERALD,

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of this season's series of Boston Symphony concerts was given in Chickering Hall last evening.

That our music lovers appreciate the musical treats offered by this organization was evinced by the fact that there were no seats left at the box office at nine o'clock yesterday morning, and a huge red and black sign of "Standing Room Only" was flaunted in the eyes of the late comers.

It is always a pleasure to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the reception given Mr. Nikitsch last evening expressed in a most hearty manner the esteem and respect felt for him and his able musicians. The programme was marked by the same rigorous conservatism that has pervaded every programme presented here by the orchestra. There were but three orchestral numbers:—Weber's overture to "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture" and Beethoven's "Eroica symphony. In them all were noticed the same nervous, impassioned work of the conductor and the alert following of the men.

It makes but little difference as to the score. The work is always the same—carefully studied and executed with a precision and perfection of skill that comes only from constant rehearsing and infinite pains.

A soloist, unknown to us but a favorite in Boston, a Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, added to the enjoyment of the concert by singing in a delightful manner an aria from Gounod's "Sappho" and a group of French songs.

THE WORLD: WEDNESDAY,

NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

BOSTON MUSICIANS HEARD.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been regarded among the important musical events of the past few seasons. The reception given to this fine organization last night at Chickering Hall showed that their good work is appreciated to the fullest extent here. Those who arrived at Chickering Hall towards the hour for the concert to commence and had not secured places in advance found it impossible to get a seat. When Mr. Nikisch made the first rap on his desk he called to order as fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage. As usual, he is particularly fortunate regarding the strength of his strings. The winds are strong in number but in quality much inferior to strings, to which division of the orchestra indeed belongs much of the credit for the clever work done in some of the numbers last night.

Mr. Nikisch succeeds, in spite of something very like "fussing," in always keeping his players up to a manly spirit of vigor. His presentation of the overture to "Oberon" was very acceptable, for this reason and for the absolute precision with which it was rendered. Some objection might be made to his violent contrasts of effect even here, for Mr. Nikisch knows no half tints. His colors are all vivid. But on the whole, the opening of the programme was satisfactory. Many good things might be said, too, regarding the "Faust" overture. A great fault in his rendering, however, is that he misses entirely Wagner's poetic spirit. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra has many good points, one of them being that he succeeds in keeping his finickyness of demeanor out of his music. He is always precise, generally forceful, sometimes fanciful, rarely poetic, never great. No man can be that unless he succeeds thoroughly in feeling the composer's ideas. Mr. Nikisch is too entirely self-centred for any such self-sacrifice. He essayed last night the greatest of symphonies, the "Ervica," with varied results. The poetry of the first movement was lost, but the manner of the "March Funebre" was of an impressive dignity.

A delightful feature of the concert was the vocal numbers rendered by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, and her participation contributed not a little to the success of the evening. The lady is from Chicago, but she sang an aria from Gounod's "Sapho" and three songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari with such perfect French that she might be taken for a Parisienne. Mrs. Wyman's voice is a mezzo soprano, warm and rich in color, the lower register being remarkably full and sonorous. The opening recitative of the "Sapho" aria was finely delivered and her singing of the aria was finished and artistic. Rarely have French songs been so well interpretated as those last night by Mrs. Wyman. Her enunciation is clear and beautiful, her phrasing artistic and her style pure and finished. Of the three songs, "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, proved the favorite, and at the conclusion the artiste was recalled several times, and finally repeated this exquisite gem. Mrs. Wyman's future appearances in New York will be looked forward to with pleasure. The piano accompaniments to the songs were delightfully played by Mr. Mikisch.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

MR. NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that vareity of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season. She sang the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet," and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful texture and her control of it is excellent. Her singing was delightful and the audience was enthusiastic.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

What gives promise to be the most profitable, if not delightful, series of concerts ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York was begun in Chickering Hall last night. According to local ideas, there is somewhat of a disparity between the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall; but while this is said it must be added that the bad effects of this disparity, as they were forced upon the attention on similar occasions in the past, were reduced to a minimum because of the homogeneity and nobility of the tone given out by the orchestra, and the nice balance between the various choirs. Occasionally, particularly in the soft passages, and even in the loud where the string tone predominated, the eloquence of the music, its stimulating power, was wonderfully heightened by the circumstance that the room was so small that one was obliged to feel something of the elemental force of the tones, but this advantage was partly offset by the circumstance that technical slips (of which there were more than a few) forced themselves more unpleasantly upon the ear than when the concerts were given in the larger Steinway Hall, with its perfect acoustics. New-Yorkers have heard so much good orchestral playing during the last two decades, that is, orchestral playing which was virile and which gave just expression to the composer's musical thoughts, that they have come to look forward to the Boston Orchestra's concerts chiefly to enjoy the technical finish of its performances. Though last night's concert was admirable in this respect, it could not escape notice that the changed surroundings measurably modified this one-sided kind of enjoyment. That splendid body of strings, so rich, so sonorous, so capable of striking like a thunderbolt at the inspiring command of Mr. Nikisch, could scarcely appear to better advantage anywhere, but not so the wind choirs. Their occasional slight crudities were heard more plainly than in past seasons.

This change, however, was not all due to the room. Some of the tender blossoms in the critical garden of Boston have been bruised by the blows of sound which Mr. Nikisch has permitted his men to hurl out in strongly dramatic climaxes and have shrunk in dismay at his disposition to care a little more for the spirit than the matter of the music which he has performed. If they think Mr. Nikisch, as he disclosed himself last night, drastic, we wonder what they thought of Mr. Seidl's readings last Monday night! Yet Mr. Nikisch is far from conventional. One of his cardinal principles is Mr. Seidl's constant rule of action: Do not under any circumstances become tedious. The judgment and the taste of the majority of the music-lovers of to-day approve the principle. They have felt the influence of latter-day romantic and dramatic music and become convinced that music has at least as much to do with the emotions as with sense-perception—perhaps more. All that is done under the sway of the newer principle need not, of course, to be approved. There were many things in the performance last night of the "Heroic" Symphony which might fairly be questioned on the score that neither the intentions of the composer as they are to be read in the printed pages nor the laws of beauty as they are universally accepted were subserved by them, though the work was never for a moment permitted to become tedious. The proof of this which was most obvious lay in the fact that in each instance the highest element of beauty, which is repose, was sacrificed. Yet for all that the evening was a season of great musical enjoyment, in which the loveliness of Weber's "Oberon" overture was as bewitching as the brilliancy and grandeur of the "Faust" overture of Weber's successor at Dresden were overpowering.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the vocalist of the evening, made a much deeper impression than she did when, in February, 1889, she sang at one of the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Her taste seems to be in the direction of French music. Last night she sang an air from Gounod's "Sapho" ("O ma Lyre immortelle") and three exceedingly dainty specimens of the song-form as the French have cultivated it (Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari). In the songs she was especially successful. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic mezzo-soprano, her style full of ardor, and she has rare skill in maintaining herself on any fervid plane to which the sentiment of the music carries her. She was most generously applauded and deserved it all. The hall was crowded.

Clipping from Press

New York city

Date 11-12

The Boston Symphony Concert.

"Standing room only" is an unusual sign to find displayed at a symphony concert, and yet this was the case at Chickering Hall last evening when the Boston Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Nikisch, gave the first of the four concerts that will form its New York season. The audience was fine in quality, too, as well as large, and enjoyed the entertainment much.

The programme was severely dignified, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Wagner's "Faust" overture and Beethoven's "Ervica" symphony being the orchestral numbers. The band is in finer form, if that were possible, than it was last spring, and played with the precision, power and delicacy that have become associated with its work. The wood wind and brass choirs seem to be better than in former seasons, while the string band remains without a rival in the masculine breadth and beautiful singing quality of its tone. The orchestra, however, appears to be rather too large for the hall. Some of the climaxes last evening were overwhelming in the volume and sonority of the tone. Yet the playing was superb throughout, and elicited hearty applause.

The singer was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who made a charming impression by her group of three French song (by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari), but whose style and voice are scarcely adapted to the broad, dramatic measures of Gounod's aria "Sapho." She sang with an excellent voice and method, and quite took the audience by storm by the thoroughly artistic simplicity and feeling with which she gave the songs, one of which, Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," she repeated.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on December 9.

The Press

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

PHILADELPHIA.

First Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Opera.

The high esteem in which the lovers of music in Philadelphia now hold the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again cordially manifested last night by the brilliant and crowded audience which heard the first concert of the season by this admirable organization at the Academy of Music. Before 8 o'clock every seat in the house was sold, so that many of those who wished to secure seats had to be content with standing room.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica"
Allegro con brio.
Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).
Finale (Allegro molto; Poco Andante con espressione; Presto).
Ambroise Thomas.....Aria, Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Wagner......"A Faust Overture"
Massenet.....Aria, "Herodiade"
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"

The Eroica Symphony, by Beethoven—the opening number—was a revelation to the audience. In this work Beethoven departed from the usual custom of beginning with an introduction; two chords given out fortissimo serving in its place. Then enters the first theme, short but noble in character. In the second movement—a funeral march—Beethoven foreshadowed the downfall of the great Napoleon, to whom the symphony was dedicated. The third movement is an excessively bright tone picture of a "lovable, cheerful man, who, in health and happiness, passes through Nature's plains, smiling at her flowery fields, and making the forest heights resound with his merry hunting horn." The last movement is, perhaps, the least interesting to the average hearer, but abounds in beauties, nevertheless.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere only strengthened the good impression she made here last season. She was in splendid voice, and gave a delightful rendering to the aria from the mad scene in Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." When she had finished, the audience gently but persistently insisted upon a repetition of the number. After several recalls she repeated a part of it, evidently against the wishes of the leader, M. Nikisch. Later in the programme she sang "Herodiade," by Massenet, charmingly. Mlle De Vere will always be welcome in Philadelphia.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was rendered with careful attention to light and shade, and made a pleasant contrast to the other numbers on the programme. The overture to "Oberon," composed of themes from Weber's charming opera of the same name, made a fitting close to an excellent programme. Few composers have written such charming, fairy-like music as the opening movement—adagio sostenuto. The magic horn begins and the fairies answer by their presence, represented first by the strings and later on by wood. After a fortissimo chord from the full orchestra the allegro con fuoco section is ushered in, beginning with a subject taken from the quartette, "Over the Dark Blue Waters." Soon after the clarionet gives out a second subject—the theme of Huon's song—"From Boyhood Trained." Later on "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," is prominently heard. The great audience lingered to applaud the finale.

Bulletin Philadelphia P

Date 11-10

tion.

MUSICAL.

The Programme for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 3, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures—Weber's familiar prelude to Oberon, recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and Faust overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the mad scene from the Hamlet of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Massenet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of great variety, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer, will be the soloist.

Bulletin Philadelphia Pa.

Date 11/10

The Programme for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 3, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures—Weber's familiar prelude to Oberon, recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and Faust overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the mad scene from the Hamlet of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Massenet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of great variety, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer, will be the soloist.

Academy of Music. Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first page) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel those in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Von Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat jaded and his circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very repose fulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaneity of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a falling short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Clipping from Boston Herald

Date 11-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Delightful Music [illegible]

Hyperion Last Evening.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, gave the first of its series of concerts, and the programme was one of the most attractive they have ever given here.

The music was almost altogether of a gay and picturesque nature, the prelude of "Lohengrin" and the adagio introduction of the symphony being the only sombre numbers on the programme. Even the second number of the symphony which was an adagio and therefore somewhat dreaded by persons not over musically inclined, was so highly colored with the quick obligato and running accompaniment of thirty second notes that enliven the slow melody, as to give almost the effect of an allegro. The symphony was the Fourth of Beethoven's, and one that has not been heard here before in some time. It was exquisitely rendered, from the beautiful and mysterious introduction that suddenly leads into that wonderfully sportive chase of syncopation which constitutes the allegro of the first movement, and the divinely marvelous melody of the adagio, to the saucy and anything but stately minuet and the flirting, rippling vivacity of the brilliant finale.

The second selection rendered by the orchestra was the Andantino and Scherzo from the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. It also was of a most bright and pleasing description, and the second movement especially—the Scherzo—was one of the most delightful bits of music ever heard here. The stringed instruments were played pizzicato throughout, and the quaint responsive arrangement of the theme which begins on the strings is answered by the wood and is tossed from them to the brass, was a wonderfully unique piece of composition and was heartily encored by the audience.

The concert closed with a most realistic rendition of Wagner's "Ride of the Walkuries." The mad shrieks of the maidens, the burst of storm clouds and the whole grandeur and awfulness of the wild scene are portrayed as only Wagner knew how to do.

The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman of Chicago. She possesses a voice of remarkable sweetness of tone-quality, though not very powerful and the orchestra was almost too loud in its accompaniment at times. The extremities of her register, especially the lower notes, were marvelous in their clearness and beauty. She was accompanied on the piano in the second half of the programme by Herr Nikisch himself with exquisite taste, and her rendering of Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" was simply entrancing. Her last song, 'A Une Fiancee," by Ferrari, was roundly encored and in response she repeated "Bonne Nuit." The audience was a large one, but was seated principally in the lower balcony which was nearly filled ten minutes after the doors opened at seven o'clock. The lower portions of the house were but sparsely [illegible]

Clipping from News, New Haven Conn.

Date 11-11

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

True lovers of music had an opportunity for thorough enjoyment last evening. Mr. Nikisch fully displayed his genius as a conductor, and certainly no fault could be found with the execution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this, their first concert of the season in New Haven. Beethoven's admirers were treated to a rendition of his symphony in B flat such as is rarely exceeded in excellence. The Andantino and Scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, typical as they were of the ranger Russian element, were listened to in an absolute silence that was a high compliment in itself. The Wagner selections were so great a contrast to the rest of the program as to be almost startling, particularly the "Pride of the Walkuries," which is the most Wagnerian of Wagner music. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the soloist of the evening, rendered her selections with exquisite taste. A rich contralto voice of high culture is a rarity now-a-days, and Mrs. Wyman certainly possesses both. She received the heartiest applause of the evening, and an encore was exacted after the last piano song. Massenet's sweet little "Bonne Nuit" was repeated, although many had wished for some little English song, all her selections being from the French. The audience was large and thoroughly appreciative and came away apparently well pleased with the evening's enjoyment. The next concert will be looked forward to with much pleasure.

Clipping from [illegible] Reporter Worcester Mass

Date 11-10

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch [illegible] will give a concert in New Haven to-night. On Tuesday night a concert will be given in New York. On Wednesday morning the company will leave for Philadelphia, where a concert will be given that evening. On Thursday evening a concert will be given in Washington. The company will arrive back in Boston, Friday evening. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mme. Clementine de Vere and Herr Theodore Richmann will be the soloists during the trip.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the serial concerts that may be said to constitute, with the representations of opera at the Metropolitan, the musical season, as viewed from the standpoint of the thoughtful music lovers was given at Chickering Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, yesterday evening. For the past four years Mr. Higginson's admirable band has furnished four concerts during the winter in this city, and with each year the hold gained upon the public by the organization and its conductor has gathered strength. Their present status was indicated last night by the presence of an audience that crowded the hall, and by the somewhat uncommon appearance—in connection with lyric enterprises, at least—of a signboard announcing that standing room only was in reserve for the late comers.

In quality and numerical force, the orchestra differs not from the band of former years. The main element of its strength lies, properly and gratefully, in its strings, the absolute perfection of which leaves no chance for faultfinding. The mysterious delight of Berlioz over the utterances of a score of violins, singing with the suaveness and expression of a chorus of beautiful voices, would be called forth anew, if the French musician lived, by the work of Mr. Nikisch's quartet, which, on this side of the Atlantic, is absolutely beyond compare. Hardly less remarkable is the band's wood-wind, the oboes especially denoting in their semi-pastoral timbre the true character of the instrument; the horns, however, are not up to the high standard of the remainder of the organization. But what is most delightful in the performance of the Boston players is the exquisite homogeneity and loveliness of the tone they pour forth as a body of instrumentalists; the precision with which the musicians go through their task; the happy distribution of values, to borrow an expression from a sister art; and the finish lavished upon the tone-pictures set before the listener, and bestowed upon them with loving care and consummate technical knowledge. There is abundant masculinity in the playing of the men from Boston, but, after all, delicacy, proportion, and polish are the chief characteristics of their achievements.

Mr. Nikisch's programme last night included, as to orchestral numbers, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," and the "Eroica" symphony; the soloist of the concert was Mr. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho," and songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari. The instrumental compositions are all familiar to the frequenter of the concert room, and their rendering was distinguished by the excellences that were extolled in former years. In Weber's fairy strains the highest point of orchestral playing was unquestionably attained, and the purely melodic and poetical episodes of Wagner, uneven tone-poem, were also treated with unexceptional felicity. The "Eroica" was handled by Mr. Nikisch in a fashion more academic than emotional, and for this there is reason, we should say, to be thankful. The admirers of ecstatic commentators, that would sacrifice to the violent expression of imaginary sentiments, measured eloquence, well-balanced light and shade, and carefully planned and faultlessly depicted gradations of accent, may have missed in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony a deeply dramatic element, the existence of which is at least problematical; to the auditor accessible to the charm of music per se, nothing more completely pleasure-giving could have been wished. The applause that followed the band's numbers was frequent and enthusiastic.

Mrs. Wyman, the soloist of the occasion, was particularly successful in her French songs. This lady, who hails from Chicago, possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, the medium tones of which are the best; she phrases with taste and skill, and her diction is the most expressive and artistic that has been enjoyed for a long while. In the air from "Sappho"—a rather thankless composition, by the way—Mrs. Wyman was not very happy; in Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" her accent and enunciation literally carried away the audience.

Clipping from Journal Providence, R. I.

Date 11/9

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening next, a special feature will be the first appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, formerly a soprano of the Leipzic Opera, and for several years a favorite singer on the concert stage of that city. The programme also includes a violin solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra. A few subscription tickets are yet on sale at Steinert's music store, where tickets for the next concert may be obtained to-morrow. Miss Emma C. Thursby has been engaged for the later concert.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-10

at the time corpo[illegible] and he is held responsible in a great measure for the closing up of some of the streets in that locality.

Entertainments.

HYPERION THEATER.

Following is the programme to be rendered this evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4 B-flat
Adagio: Allegro vivace.
Adagio.
Minuet
Allegro, ma non troppo.
Saint Saens Aria, "My Heart to thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Dalila."
Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4.
Songs with Piano.
Delibes.....(a) Regrets
Massenet.....(b) Bonne Nuit
Ferrari.....(c) A une Fiancee
Wagner.....(a) Prelude, "Lohengrin"
(b) "Ride of the Walkuries"

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-10

THE HYPERION.

The following program will be given at the Hyperion theater to-night at the opening concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Arthur Nikisch:—

Symphony in B flat, No 4.....Beethoven
Aria—"Samson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mrs. Wyman.
Two movements from the Symphony No. 4,
Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano.
(a) Regrets.....Delibes
(b) Bonne Nuit.....Massenet
(c) Anne Francee.....Ferrari
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Prelude—"Lohengrin".....Wagner
(b) Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Seats may be secured during the day at M. Steinert & Sons' music store.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-10

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony Concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 8, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures, Weber's familiar prelude to "Oberon," recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and a "Faust" overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the Mad Scene from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Massenet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of especial dignity, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer,

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-11

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a very large audience with an evening of almost unalloyed pleasure at Chickering Hall last evening. It was the first concert of this famous body of musicians in this city this season, and there was abundant evidence in the size and character of the audience that it was looked upon as a notable occurrence. Indeed, every concert by the Boston orchestra is notable, for the performance of master music by such a splendidly trained band of instrumentalists under the guidance of such potent emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch must always rise to the importance of an event.

There may be differences of opinion as to Mr. Nikisch's reading, especially among those who make a fetish of tradition. But tradition is a very uncertain guide in musical interpretation, and doubtless he is the wisest conductor who follows Wagner's advice and finds his reading of a work in the work itself, and not in metronome marks, contemporary comment, or reminiscence. This is certainly what Mr. Nikisch does, and he wields a tremendous influence over an audience by the irresistible eloquence and striking significance of his readings. Yet one feels during the performance and remains convinced in the calmer moments which follow it that, though the conductor may have treated some tempi with freedom and accentuated certain passages originally, he has been guilty of no injustice to the composer whose music he was presenting. For it is beyond question that there is a great difference between radically changing the character of a movement by an alteration of tempo or the balance of parts on the one hand and bringing out more forcibly some of its beauties by an alteration of the pace which does not transform or obscure its spirit.

This seems a just view of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the final number on last evening's programme. He certainly did introduce ritardandi and accelerandi that were unfamiliar, and in a number of passages he lifted some of the intermediate voice parts into unusual prominence. The result was a justification of the means. There was no violation of the spirit of the symphony; it was still unmistakably the soul of Beethoven that spoke to us, but with a more than ordinarily luminous revelation of its unquestioned romanticism. Beethoven belonged as much to the romantic as to the classic school. It is due to this fact that he wrote not for a day, but for all time; that, as Mr. Edward Dannreuther has admirably said, "He passes beyond the horizon of a mere singer and poet, and touches upon the domain of the seer and the prophet." Mr. Nikisch's individuality of treatment was most conspicuous in the final movement of the symphony. It was the broadest and most heroic interpretation of the movement that we have ever heard, and it was achieved at some sacrifice of the traditional tempo, but the alteration was in the direction of weight, impressiveness, and majesty, and surely this is in accord with the thought of Beethoven in his composition of the symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture. The former was played in essentially the same style as it was under Mr. Gericke. The latter was performed magnificently. Every phrase of the composition had been studied by the conductor with a view to a complete exposition of its musical value, and the grand climax was developed with overwhelming power. It was a most dramatic performance. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who has not been heard before in this city. She sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch—Delibes's "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," and Ferrari's "A Une Fiancée." Her voice is smooth and full in quality, her phrasing good, and her method generally worthy of praise. Her singing of the French songs was especially commendable and won her well-merited applause. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Nikisch proved to be a prince of accompanists.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

There was a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening to hear the first of the six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here between now and next April, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme comprised three orchestral and two vocal numbers, and the symphony with which, reversing the practice of Mr. Gericke and following that of Mr. Thomas, the concert began was Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, better known as the "Eroica." This great composition covers so wide a range of thought, of feeling, of expression and of method that its interpretation affords a good test both of the quality of an orchestra and of the character and capacity and tendencies of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the work was just about what his rendering of other symphonies must have led the experienced concert-goer to expect. Less sentimental than his presentation of the C minor symphony last season, it was still marked by the same distinctive traits. It was full of romantic charm and poetic fervor. It was inspired by exquisite taste and graced by the utmost delicacy of detail. But it seemed to the writer to lack somewhat of that breadth and dignity inseparable from a wholly satisfying interpretation of Beethoven's music. While one is listening to it it seems that nothing could be better, but afterwards one is vaguely conscious of something wanting, of possible and desirable effects which have not been realized. This was particularly the case with the "March for the Death of a Hero." It was very beautiful, very touching, suffused with tenderness and pathos; but it didn't convey, at least not to my mind, the idea that it was a hero who was being carried to his rest. Its sentiment seemed rather to befit the obsequies of an Ophelia. Of course all this is essentially a matter of temperament. There is no absolute standard of right and wrong in such things, and there is no doubt as much to be said in favor of Mr. Nikisch's readings as of any other, but certainly his sympathies seem to be with the romantic rather than the classic school. The other two orchestral selections were Wagner's overture to "Faust" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Both were superbly played, the slow movement of the latter being especially delightful. Mlle. Clementine de Vere was the vocalist. Her selections were the "mad scena" from Thomas' "Hamlet" and the well-known soprano aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," in both of which she greatly distinguished herself. Her voice is a pure soprano, sweet and flexible and of exceptionally good quality in the upper register, while her method is that of the well-trained artist. The hearty encore of the "Hamlet" aria was well deserved and might fairly have been anticipated.

LEDGER & TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Nov. 13, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first page) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel these in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Von Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat sated and his circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very repose fulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaneity of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a failing short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Clipping from Palladium New Haven Conn.

Date 11-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Delightful Music [illegible]

Hyperion Last Evening.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, gave the first of its series of concerts, and the programme was one of the most attractive they have ever given here.

The music was almost altogether of a gay and picturesque nature, the prelude of "Lohengrin" and the adagio introduction of the symphony being the only sombre numbers on the programme. Even the second number of the symphony which was an adagio and therefore somewhat dreaded by persons not over musically inclined, was so highly colored with the quick obligato and running accompaniment of thirty second notes that enliven the slow melody, as to give almost the effect of an allegro. The symphony was the Fourth of Beethoven's, and one that has not been heard here before in some time. It was exquisitely rendered, from the beautiful and mysterious introduction that suddenly leads into that wonderfully sportive chase of syncopation which constitutes the allegro of the first movement, and the divinely marvelous melody of the adagio, to the saucy and anything but stately minuet and the flirting, rippling vivacity of the brilliant finale.

The second selection rendered by the orchestra was the Andantino and Scherzo from the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. It also was of a most bright and pleasing description, and the second movement especially—the Scherzo—was one of the most delightful bits of music ever heard here. The stringed instruments were played pizzicato throughout, and the quaint responsive arrangement of the theme which begins on the strings is answered by the wood and is tossed from them to the brass, was a wonderfully unique piece of composition and was heartily encored by the audience.

The concert closed with a most realistic rendition of Wagner's "Ride of the Walkuries." The mad shrieks of the maidens, the burst of storm clouds and the whole grandeur and awfulness of the wild scene are portrayed as only Wagner knew how to do.

The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman of Chicago. She possesses a voice of remarkable sweetness of tone-quality, though not very powerful and the orchestra was almost too loud in its accompaniment at times. The extremities of her register, especially the lower notes, were marvelous in their clearness and beauty. She was accompanied on the piano in the second half of the programme by Herr Nikisch himself with exquisite taste, and her rendering of Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" was simply entrancing. Her last song, 'A Une Fiancee," by Ferrari, was roundly encored and in response she repeated "Bonne Nuit." The audience was a large one, but was seated principally in the lower balcony which was nearly filled ten minutes after the doors opened at seven o'clock. The lower portions of the house were but sparsely occupied.

Clipping from News, New Haven Conn.

Date 11-11

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

True lovers of music had an opportunity for thorough enjoyment last evening. Mr. Nikisch fully displayed his genius as a conductor, and certainly no fault could be found with the execution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this, their first concert of the season in New Haven. Beethoven's admirers were treated to a rendition of his symphony in B flat such as is rarely exceeded in excellence. The Andantino and Scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, typical as they were of the ranger Russian element, were listened to in an absolute silence that was a high compliment in itself. The Wagner selections were so great a contrast to the rest of the program as to be almost startling, particularly the "Pride of the Walkuries," which is the most Wagnerian of Wagner music. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the soloist of the evening, rendered her selections with exquisite taste. A rich contralto voice of high culture is a rarity now-a-days, and Mrs. Wyman certainly possesses both. She received the heartiest applause of the evening, and an encore was exacted after the last piano song. Massenet's sweet little "Bonne Nuit" was repeated, although many had wished for some little English song, all her selections being from the French. The audience was large and thoroughly appreciative and came away apparently well pleased with the evening's enjoyment. The next concert will be looked forward to with much pleasure.

No Appropriation

Date 11-10

The programme for the first of the Boston Symphony Concerts, which will take place under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 12, is now announced. The symphony set down for performance is that by Beethoven, in E flat, No. 3, commonly called the "Eroica," from its original dedication to Napoleon Bonaparte. There are two overtures, Weber's familiar prelude to "Oberon," recognized as a test piece of orchestral playing, and a "Faust" overture by Wagner; and two vocal numbers, each of them of the first importance, namely, the Mad Scene from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas, and the great aria for soprano from Masstnet's "Herodiade." This will generally be recognized as a programme of great variety, value and interest. Mlle. Clementine de Vere, a thoroughly competent singer, will be the soloist.

Clipping from Reporter Woodstock

Date 11-10

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give a concert in New Haven to-night. On Tuesday night a concert will be given in New York. On Wednesday morning the company will leave for Philadelphia, where a concert will be given that evening. On Thursday evening a concert will be given in Washington. The company will arrive back in Boston, Friday evening. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mme. Clementine de Vere and Herr Theodore Richmann will be the soloists during the trip.

Palladium

Date 11-10

at the time corporation counsel, and he is held responsible in a great measure for the closing up of some of the streets in that locality.

Entertainments.

HYPERION THEATER.

Following is the programme to be rendered this evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4 B-flat
Adagio: Allegro vivace.
Adagio.
Minuet
Allegro, ma non troppo.
Saint Saens Aria, "My Heart to thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Dalila."
Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4.
Songs with Piano.
Delibes.....(a) Regrets
Massenet.....(b) Bonne Nuit
Ferrari.....(c) A une Fiancee
Wagner.....{(a) Prelude, "Lohengrin"
{(b) "Ride of the Walkueries"

11-12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the serial concerts that may be said to constitute, with the representations of opera at the Metropolitan, the musical season, as viewed from the standpoint of the thoughtful music lovers was given at Chickering Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, yesterday evening. For the past four years Mr. Higginson's admirable band has furnished four concerts during the winter in this city, and with each year the hold gained upon the public by the organization and its conductor has gathered strength. Their present status was indicated last night by the presence of an audience that crowded the hall, and by the somewhat uncommon appearance—in connection with lyric enterprises, at least—of a signboard announcing that standing room only was in reserve for the late comers.

In quality and numerical force, the orchestra differs not from the band of former years. The main element of its strength lies, properly and gratefully, in its strings, the absolute perfection of which leaves no chance for faultfinding. The mysterious delight of Berlioz over the utterances of a score of violins, singing with the suaveness and expression of a chorus of beautiful voices, would be called forth anew, if the French musician lived, by the work of Mr. Nikisch's quartet, which, on this side of the Atlantic, is absolutely beyond compare. Hardly less remarkable is the band's wood-wind, the oboes especially denoting in their semi-pastoral timbre the true character of the instrument; the horns, however, are not up to the high standard of the remainder of the organization. But what is most delightful in the performance of the Boston players is the exquisite homogeneity and loveliness of the tone they pour forth as a body of instrumentalists; the precision with which the musicians go through their task; the happy distribution of values, to borrow an expression from a sister art; and the finish lavished upon the tone-pictures set before the listener, and bestowed upon them with loving care and consummate technical knowledge. There is abundant masculinity in the playing of the men from Boston, but, after all, delicacy, proportion, and polish are the chief characteristics of their achievements.

Mr. Nikisch's programme last night included, as to orchestral numbers, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," and the "Groica" symphony; the soloist of the concert was Mr. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho," and songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari. The instrumental compositions are all familiar to the frequenter of the concert room, and their rendering was distinguished by the excellences that were extolled in former years. In Weber's fairy strains the highest point of orchestral playing was unquestionably attained, and the purely melodic and poetical episodes of Wagner, uneven tone-poem, were also treated with unexceptional felicity. The "Eroica" was handled by Mr. Nikisch in a fashion more academic than emotional, and for this there is reason, we should say, to be thankful. The admirers of ecstatic commentators, that would sacrifice to the violent expression of imaginary sentiments, measured eloquence, well-balanced light and shade, and carefully planned and faultlessly depicted gradations of accent, may have missed in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony a deeply dramatic element, the existence of which is at least problematical; to the auditor accessible to the charm of music per se, nothing more completely pleasure-giving could have been wished. The applause that followed the band's numbers was frequent and enthusiastic.

Mrs. Wyman, the soloist of the occasion, was particularly successful in her French songs. This lady, who hails from Chicago, possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, the medium tones of which are the best; she phrases with taste and skill, and her diction is the most expressive and artistic that has been enjoyed for a long while. In the air from "Sappho"—a rather thankless composition, by the way—Mrs. Wyman was not very happy; in Massenet's "Bonne Nuit" her accent and enunciation literally carried away the audience.

Jo... I...

Date 11/9

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...of the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening next, a special feature will be the first appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, formerly a soprano of the Leipzic Opera, and for several years a favorite singer on the concert stage of that city. The programme also includes a violin solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra. A few subscription tickets are yet on sale at Steinert's music store, where tickets for the next concert may be obtained to-morrow. Miss Emma C. Thursby has been engaged for a later concert.

Clipping from News New Haven Conn.

Date 11-10

THE HYPERION.

The following program will be given at the Hyperion theater to-night at the opening concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Arthur Nikisch:—

Symphony in B flat, No 4.....Beethoven
Aria—"Samson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mrs. Wyman.
Two movements from the Symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano.
(a) Regrets.....Delibes
(b) Bonne Nuit.....Massenet
(c) Anne Francee.....Farrari
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Prelude—"Lohengrin".....Wagner
(b) Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Seats may be secured during the day at M. Steinert & Sons' music store.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 11-12

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a very large audience with an evening of almost unalloyed pleasure at Chickering Hall last evening. It was the first concert of this famous body of musicians in this city this season, and there was abundant evidence in the size and character of the audience that it was looked upon as a notable occurrence. Indeed, every concert by the Boston orchestra is notable, for the performance of master music by such a splendidly trained band of instrumentalists under the guidance of such potent emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch must always rise to the importance of an event.

There may be differences of opinion as to Mr. Nikisch's reading, especially among those who make a fetish of tradition. But tradition is a very uncertain guide in musical interpretation, and doubtless he is the wisest conductor who follows Wagner's advice and finds his reading of a work in the work itself, and not in metronone marks, contemporary comment, or reminiscence. This is certainly what Mr. Nikisch does, and he wields a tremendous influence over an audience by the irresistible eloquence and striking significance of his readings. Yet one feels during the performance and remains convinced in the calmer moments which follow it that, though the conductor may have treated some tempi with freedom and accentuated certain passages originally, he has been guilty of no injustice to the composer whose music he was presenting. For it is beyond question that there is a great difference between radically changing the character of a movement by an alteration of tempo or the balance of parts on the one hand and bringing out more forcibly some of its beauties by an alteration of the [illegible] which does not transform or obscure its spirit.

This seems a just view of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the final number on last evening's programme. He certainly did introduce ritardandi and acceleranti that were unfamiliar, and in a number of passages he lifted some of the intermediate voice parts into unusual prominence. The result was a justification of the means. There was no violation of the spirit of the symphony; it was still unmistakably the soul of Beethoven that spoke to us, but with a more than ordinarily luminous revelation of its unquestioned romanticism. Beethoven belonged as much to the romantic as to the classic school. It is due to this fact that he wrote not for a day, but for all time; that, as Mr. Edward Dannreuther has admirably said, "He passes beyond the horizon of a mere singer and poet, and touches upon the domain of the seer and the prophet." Mr. Nikisch's individuality of treatment was most conspicuous in the final movement of the symphony. It was the broadest and most heroic interpretation of the movement that we have ever heard, and it was achieved at some sacrifice of the traditional tempo, but the alteration was in the direction of weight, impressiveness, and majesty, and surely this is in accord with the thought of Beethoven in his composition of the symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture. The former was played in essentially the same style as it was under Mr. Gericke. The latter was performed magnificently. Every phrase of the composition had been studied by the conductor with a view to a complete exposition of its musical value, and the grand climax was developed with overwhelming power. It was a most dramatic performance. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who has not been heard before in this city. She sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho," and three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch—Delibes's "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," and Ferrari's "A Une Fiancée." Her voice is smooth and full in quality, her phrasing good, and her method generally worthy of praise. Her singing of the French songs was especially commendable and won her well-merited applause. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Nikisch proved to be a prince of accompanists.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

There was a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening to hear the first of the six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here between now and next April, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme comprised three orchestral and two vocal numbers, and the symphony with which, reversing the practice of Mr. Gericke and following that of Mr. Thomas, the concert began was Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, better known as the "Eroica." This great composition covers so wide a range of thought, of feeling, of expression and of method that its interpretation affords a good test both of the quality of an orchestra and of the character and capacity and tendencies of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the work was just about what his rendering of other symphonies must have led the experienced concert-goer to expect. Less sentimental than his presentation of the C minor symphony last season, it was still marked by the same distinctive traits. It was full of romantic charm and poetic fervor. It was inspired by exquisite taste and graced by the utmost delicacy of detail. But it seemed to the writer to lack somewhat of that breadth and dignity inseparable from a wholly satisfying interpretation of Beethoven's music. While one is listening to it it seems that nothing could be better, but afterwards one is vaguely conscious of something wanting, of possible and desirable effects which have not been realized. This was particularly the case with the "March for the Death of a Hero." It was very beautiful, very touching, suffused with tenderness and pathos; but it didn't convey, at least not to my mind, the idea that it was a hero who was being carried to his rest. Its sentiment seemed rather to befit the obsequies of an Ophelia. Of course all this is essentially a matter of temperament. There is no absolute standard of right and wrong in such things, and there is no doubt as much to be said in favor of Mr. Nikisch's readings as of any other, but certainly his sympathies seem to be with the romantic rather than the classic school. The other two orchestral selections were Wagner's overture to "Faust" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Both were superbly played, the slow movement of the latter being especially delightful. Mlle. Clementine de Vere was the vocalist. Her selections were the "mad scena" from Thomas' "Hamlet" and the well-known soprano aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," in both of which she greatly distinguished herself. Her voice is a pure soprano, sweet and flexible and of exceptionally good quality in the upper register, while her method is that of the well-trained artist. The hearty encore of the "Hamlet" aria was well deserved and might fairly have been anticipated.

[41]

Clipping from Tribune
New York city N.Y.
Date 11-12

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

What gives promise to be the most profitable, if not delightful, series of concerts ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York was begun in Chickering Hall last night. According to local notions, there is somewhat of a disparity between the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall; but while this is said it must be added that the bad effects of this disparity, as they were forced upon the attention on similar occasions in the past, were reduced to a minimum because of the homogeneity and mobility of the tone given out by the orchestra, and the nice balance between the various choirs. Occasionally, particularly in the soft passages, and even in the loud where the string tone predominated, the eloquence of the music, its stimulating power, was wonderfully heightened by the circumstance that the room was so small that one was obliged to feel something of the elemental force of the tones, but this advantage was partly offset by the circumstance that technical slips (of which there were more than a few) forced themselves more unpleasantly upon the ear than when the concerts were given in the larger Steinway Hall, with its perfect acoustics. New-Yorkers have heard so much good orchestral playing during the last two decades, that is, orchestral-playing which was virile and which gave just expression to the composer's musical thoughts, that they have come to look forward to the Boston Orchestra's concerts chiefly to enjoy the technical finish of its performances. Though last night's concert was admirable in this respect, it could not escape notice that the changed surroundings measurably modified this one-sided kind of enjoyment. That splendid body of strings, so rich, so sonorous, so capable of striking like a thunderbolt at the inspiring command of Mr. Nikisch, could scarcely appear to better advantage anywhere, but not so the wind choirs. Their occasional slight crudities were heard more plainly than in past seasons.

This change, however, was not all due to the room. Some of the tender blossoms in the critical garden of Boston have been bruised by the blows of sound which Mr. Nikisch has permitted his men to hurl out in strongly dramatic climaxes and have shrunk in dismay at his disposition to care a little more for the spirit than the matter of the music which he has performed. If they think Mr. Nikisch, as he disclosed himself last night, drastic, we wonder what they thought of Mr. Seidl's readings last Monday night! Yet Mr. Nikisch is far from conventional. One of his cardinal principles is Mr. Seidl's constant rule of action: Do not under any circumstances become tedious. The judgment and the taste of the majority of the music-lovers of to-day approve the principle. They have felt the influence of latter-day romantic and dramatic music and become convinced that music has at least as much to do with the emotions as with sense-perception—perhaps more. All that is done under the sway of the newer principle need not, of course, to be approved. There were many things in the performance last night of the "Heroic" Symphony which might fairly be questioned on the score that neither the intentions of the composer as they are to be read in the printed pages nor the laws of beauty as they are universally accepted were subserved by them, though the work was never for a moment permitted to become tedious. The proof of this which was most obvious lay in the fact that in each instance the highest element of beauty, which is repose, was sacrificed. Yet for all that the evening was a season of great musical enjoyment, in which the loveliness of Weber's "Oberon" overture was as bewitching as the brilliancy and grandeur of the "Faust" overture of Weber's successor at Dresden were overpowering.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the vocalist of the evening, made a much deeper impression than she did when, in February, 1889, she sang at one of the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Her taste seems to be in the direction of French music. Last night she sang an air from Gounod's "Sapho" ("O ma Lyre immortelle") and three exceedingly dainty specimens of the song-form as the French have cultivated it ("Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari). In the songs she was especially successful. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic mezzo-soprano, her style full of ardor, and she has rare skill in maintaining herself on any level up to which the sentiment of the music carries her. She was most generously applauded, and deserved it all. The hall was crowded.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, November 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season. The great band was in excellent form, and the Eroica symphony has never been better performed here. Mlle. De Vere sang two important numbers delightfully, and the occasion gave rare pleasure to a crowded house.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa 11-13-90

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first page) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel those in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Von Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat sated and his circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very reposefulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaneity of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a failing short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Bulletin
VEMBER 13, 1890.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A very large and sympathetic assemblage filled the Academy of Music last evening to assist at the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has assembled a fine body of artists, apparently exceeding the number of any former season, and they are trained to do their work most efficiently. The strings are particularly strong and excellent, and only occasionally was there an opportunity of criticising the brass instruments.

Beethoven's third symphony, known as the Heroic, was the important number. The audience is familiar with this grand composition, and enjoyed it and admired it without help from the rather pompous, pedantic analysis and interpretation of its meaning given on the printed programme. Each movement was perfectly played. But the stately and solemn funeral march of the second made the deepest impression. In strong contrast to this was the succeeding scherzo, with its joyous, rippling, laughing rural tone-pictures, only interrupted by the horns of the hunters. In the final movement there are several motives, united naturally and gracefully, and wrought up with the consummate skill of the great master.

The second piece for orchestra was Wagner's Faust overture, rich in instrumental effects of great variety, and foreshadowing better than his other early works the grand ideas of his later years. Weber's overture to Oberon is one of the enchanting compositions in which this orchestra excels. The music is bathed in the atmosphere of fairy-land, surpassing in brightness, fancy and variety even the efforts of Mendelssohn in the same line. This and all the orchestral pieces were intensely enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded.

The vocalist of the evening was Mlle. Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before, but hardly ever to so great advantage. She sang the mad scene of Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. As a concert piece, this was not happily chosen, for it is wholly dramatic and needs acting and theatric surroundings. But Mlle. DeVere's singing, especially in the recitative passages, and her clear articulation of the French words were much admired. Her very high tones were pure and easily taken, but in the middle register her intonation was not always accurate; her trill is not well defined and in a chromatic scale her tones want distinctness. But she pleased the audience immensely, and was called out so often that she had to repeat the latter half of the aria. The air from Massenet's Herodiade was a still happier effort, for the difficulties are less great and the composition is less dramatic. Mlle. de Vere won many new admirers by her performance, and is now an established favorite here.

---

cast. Telegraph Nov 13 90

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FIRST CONCERT.

Musical people hereabouts had a look at each other again at the Academy last night. It was the occasion of the initial concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Philadelphia season, and Mr. Nikisch and his competent aggregation were given that cordial and responsive reception with which their coming is always signalled. It was the same thoughtful audience, distingue, and stamped with the never to be mistaken mark of culture and intelligence. This is but cause and effect. The average theatre goer finds nothing to his taste in the works of the master composers, or nothing to appreciate in the orchestral interpretation. The seeker after simple amusement cannot find it in the presence of these things any more than he can in reading, or in hearing read, a profound essay or a great poem. And what is music but poetry? What, for instance, is Beethoven's 3d Symphony but a mighty poem? The poet sets his ideas and conceptions to every day word language; the music master to tones and tempos. Each thought is clothed in sound; each beautiful conceit wrapped about with tonic splendor, a great rhythmical poem of melodies and harmonies. The programme last night was one of old favorites, and calls for little special critical attention. It combined Beethoven, Wagner, and Weber—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony No. 3, in E flat; Wagner's Faust Overture, and Weber's overture to Oberon. Mr. Nikisch gives a most tasteful reading of the symphony. Most skilful and pleasing was his treatment of the second movement. Full of funereal sadness and earnest emotion as he so prominently made it, the rare beauty of the conception was seen and comprehended. There was some surprise felt that with such a large orchestra the loud effects should be so comparatively feeble, and perhaps it was due to this very shortcoming that the emotional passages during the evening were so especially delightful. The closing number, the familiar Oberon overture with its speaking fairy scenes, appealed strongly to artistic appreciation. The orchestra, which was alert and heartily responsive to the conductor, was aided by Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the gifted and popular soloist. She sang two arias—the mad scene from Hamlet, by Ambroise Thomas, and Massenet's Herodiade. The mad, wild notes of the Hamlet scene gave special opportunity to her style of voice, and though a most exacting work, she proved her ability to cope with every trying and difficult vocal movement. The loud and long response of the audience must have been in some way a recompense for the arduous effort. Indeed, so repeated and vigorous was the appreciative applause that she was obliged to take the encore and sang the last half of the aria over again.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa
Date 11-14-90

...ish Girl."

The sale of season tickets for the six Symphony concerts to be given between now and the end of next April at the Academy of Music by the Boston Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, opened yesterday. Among the soloists already announced for these concerts are Vladimir de Pachman, pianist, and Clementine de Vere, the popular soprano singer. The first of the six concerts will take place on Wednesday evening, November 12.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

First Appearance For This Season of the Boston Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening opened fitly with Beethoven's third symphony. Mr. Nikisch had brought an unusually large number of musicians, the exactness of whose execution leaves nothing to be demanded in the direction of absolute refinement. For so great a body of strings, the thinness of tone was disappointing and the effect of the symphony was somewhat pale and dull. It was rather feminine than heroic, the many minute shadings weakening the larger contrasts. Mr. Nikisch is an exceedingly thoughtful and original conductor and he has some extraordinary readings—sometimes beautiful, sometimes perplexing—that not seldom render obscure a composition that never before seemed hard to understand. In the "Oberon" overture, which closed the concert, his characteristic excellence was thoroughly displayed. A more sensitive, poetical rendering of this lovely work could not be imagined and the execution of the orchestra here was faultless.

The soloist of the evening was Miss DeVere, who sang the mad scene from "Hamlet" in a voice as pure and lovely as when she was first heard here and with exquisite taste and skill. It was a performance that justly aroused real enthusiasm and the audience insisted on a repetition. When the singer returned in response to the call and the conductor ungallantly sent her back again, there was an expression of disapproval that compelled him to yield and the song was repeated with even greater beauty than before. Miss DeVere sang also the "Herodiade" aria, after the orchestra had played Wagner's wandering "Faust" overture.

TWO MUSICAL EVENTS.

The First Boston Symphony Concert—Performance of "L'Africaine."

The first Boston Symphony Concert took place at the Academy of Music last night. A very large audience welcomed Mr. Nikisch and his splendid orchestra. The orchestral numbers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Weber's "Oberon" Overture.

The band, which has been further strengthened by the addition of some violas, was in capital form and gave an exceptionally fine rendering of the symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of a Beethoven composition, but there certainly can be but a unanimous verdict about the perfect execution of the orchestra. The two overtures, so widely different in character, were superbly played.

The soloist of the occasion was Mlle. de Vere, who sung the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." Notwithstanding that the scene was vociferously redemanded and the last portion repeated much against the wishes of Mr. Nikisch it was by no means well sung. Indeed, bearing in mind the magnificent rendition of this capital scene by Mesdames Nilsson and Gerster Mlle. de Vere's performance seemed like the effort of a clever amateur.

The substitution of a cadence for the maniacal laugh is not to be commended. Later in the evening Mlle. de Vere was heard in the Romanza from Massenet's "Herodiadi," in which she appeared to better advantage.

...ston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that variety of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season. She sang the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet," and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful texture and her control of it is excellent. Her singing was delightful and the audience was enthusiastic.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOV. 14.

WASHINGTON'S EAR PLEASED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scores a Marked Success.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season tonight at Lincoln Music Hall.

The hall was crowded with a distinguished and very fashionable audience, who were lavish in their applause, but following the usual custom, Mr. Nikisch declined any encores.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in B flat.....Beethoven
Aria, Hans Heiling.....Marschner
Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Moto Perpetuo, concert allegro.....Paganini
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, Die Walkure.....Wagner

The second movement of the Tscharkowsky symphony, which is comparatively unknown in Washington, met with the fullest applause, although every number was enthusiastically received.

The orchestra was as perfect as ever, and under the direction of Mr. Nikisch gave a concert which was in every way worthy of the high standard of the famous orchestra.

Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the soloist, and made a distinctly favorable impression.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 16, 1890.

THE MUSIC HALL POPULAR.

The fifth of the Music Hall popular concerts will be given this evening, when the talent engaged will include Mrs. Nella Brown-Pond, the popular reader; Knoll and Marie McNeil, the cornet duetists; Mme. Louise Natalie, the operatic soprano; Constantine Sternberg, pianist; Miss Edith Christie, violinist, and the Orpheus instrumental quartet. Mme. Natalie is to sing the "Una Voce" and the "Caro Nome," Mr. Sternberg will play the Hungarian rhapsodie No. 14 and a "humoresque" of his own composition, Miss Christie will contribute Sarasate's "Gypsy dance," and the numbers by Mrs. Pond and the other artists will be equally interesting.

Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, will be the soloist at the Symphony concert of next Saturday evening, and the programme will include Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Haydn's concerto for violoncello, Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava" and Beethoven's Turkish march from "Ruins of Athens."

Clipping from Republican
Springfield Mass
Date 11-16-90

The Boston symphony orchestra has begun a series of concerts in New York and Anton Seidl has led an orchestra in Boston this week. This is an agreeable interchange of high musical talent. Nikisch is criticised in New York for sacrificing "the highest element of beauty, repose," to the purpose not to be tedious. Seidl seems to have done the same thing in Boston. Both thought it necessary to be "popular" at all hazards.

[41]

Clipping from Tribune New York city 11-9

Date 11-12

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

What gives promise to be the most profitable, if not delightful, series of concerts ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York was begun in Chickering Hall last night. According to local ideas, there is somewhat of a disparity between the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall; but while this is said it must be added that the bad effects of this disparity, as they were forced upon the attention on similar occasions in the past, were reduced to a minimum because of the homogeneity and nobility of the tone given out by the orchestra, and the nice balance between the various choirs. Occasionally, particularly in the soft passages, and even in the loud where the string tone predominated, the eloquence of the music, its stimulating power, was wonderfully heightened by the circumstance that the room was so small that one was obliged to feel something of the elemental force of the tones, but this advantage was partly offset by the circumstance that technical slips (of which there were more than a few) forced themselves more unpleasantly upon the ear than when the concerts were given in the larger Steinway Hall, with its perfect acoustics. New-Yorkers have heard so much good orchestral playing during the last two decades, that is, orchestral playing which was virile and which gave just expression to the composer's musical thoughts, that they have come to look forward to the Boston Orchestra's concerts chiefly to enjoy the technical finish of its performances. Though last night's concert was admirable in this respect, it could not escape notice that the changed surroundings measurably modified this one-sided kind of enjoyment. That splendid body of strings, so rich, so sonorous, so capable of striking like a thunderbolt at the inspiring command of Mr. Nikisch, could scarcely appear to better advantage anywhere, but not so the wind choirs. Their occasional slight crudities were heard more plainly than in past seasons.

This change, however, was not all due to the room. Some of the tender blossoms in the critical garden of Boston have been bruised by the blows of sound which Mr. Nikisch has permitted his men to hurl out in strongly dramatic climaxes and have shrunk in dismay at his disposition to care a little more for the spirit than the matter of the music which he has performed. If they think Mr. Nikisch, as he disclosed himself last night, drastic, we wonder what they thought of Mr. Seidl's readings last Monday night! Yet Mr. Nikisch is far from conventional. One of his cardinal principles is Mr. Seidl's constant rule of action: Do not under any circumstances become tedious. The judgment and the taste of the majority of the music-lovers of to-day approve the principle. They have felt the influence of latter-day romantic and dramatic music and become convinced that music has at least as much to do with the emotions as with sense-perception—perhaps more. All that is done under the sway of the newer principle need not, of course, to be approved. There were many things in the performance last night of the "Heroic" Symphony which might fairly be questioned on the score that neither the intentions of the composer as they are to be read in the printed pages nor the laws of beauty as they are universally accepted were subserved by them, though the work was never for a moment permitted to become tedious. The proof of this which was most obvious lay in the fact that in each instance the highest element of beauty, which is repose, was sacrificed. Yet for all that the evening was a season of great musical enjoyment, in which the loveliness of Weber's "Oberon" overture was as bewitching as the brilliancy and grandeur of the "Faust" overture of Weber's successor at Dresden were overpowering.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the vocalist of the evening, made a much deeper impression than she did when, in February, 1889, she sang at one of the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Her taste seems to be in the direction of French music. Last night she sang an air from Gounod's "Sapho" ("O ma Lyre immortelle") and three exceedingly dainty specimens of the song-form as the French have cultivated it (Regrets" by Delibes, "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet and "A une Fiancee" by Ferrari). In the songs she was specially successful. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic mezzo-soprano, her style full of ardor, and she has rare skill in maintaining herself on any fervid plane to which the sentiment of the music carries her. She was most generously applauded and deserved it all. The hall was crowded.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, November 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season. The great band was in excellent form, and the Eroica symphony has never been better performed here. Mlle. De Vere sang two important numbers delightfully, and the occasion gave rare pleasure to a crowded house.

Ledger Phila Nov 13 90

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first page) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel those in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Von Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat sated and his circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very reposefulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaneity of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a failing short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Bulletin

VEMBER 13, 1890.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A very large and sympathetic assemblage filled the Academy of Music last evening to assist at the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has assembled a fine body of artists, apparently exceeding the number of any former season, and they are trained to do their work most efficiently. The strings are particularly strong and excellent, and only occasionally was there an opportunity of criticising the brass instruments.

Beethoven's third symphony, known as the Heroic, was the important number. The audience is familiar with this grand composition, and enjoyed it and admired it without help from the rather pompous, pedantic analysis and interpretation of its meaning given on the printed programme. Each movement was perfectly played. But the stately and solemn funeral march of the second made the deepest impression. In strong contrast to this was the succeeding scherzo, with its joyous, rippling, laughing rural tone-pictures, only interrupted by the horns of the hunters. In the final movement there are several motives, united naturally and gracefully, and wrought up with the consummate skill of the great master.

The second piece for orchestra was Wagner's Faust overture, rich in instrumental effects of great variety, and foreshadowing better than his other early works the grand ideas of his later years. Weber's overture to Oberon is one of the enchanting compositions in which this orchestra excels. The music is bathed in the atmosphere of fairy-land, surpassing in brightness, fancy and variety even the efforts of Mendelssohn in the same line. This and all the orchestral pieces were intensely enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded.

The vocalist of the evening was Mlle. Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before, but hardly ever to so great advantage. She sang the mad scene of Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. As a concert piece, this was not happily chosen, for it is wholly dramatic and needs acting and theatric surroundings. But Mlle. DeVere's singing, especially in the recitative passages, and her clear articulation of the French words were much admired. Her very high tones were pure and easily taken, but in the middle register her intonation was not always accurate; her trill is not well defined and in a chromatic scale her tones want distinctness. But she pleased the audience immensely, and was called out so often that she had to repeat the latter half of the aria. The air from Massenet's Herodiade was a still happier effort, for the difficulties are less great and the composition is less dramatic. Mlle. de Vere won many new admirers by her performance, and is now an established favorite here.

cast. Telegraph Nov 13 90

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FIRST CONCERT.

Musical people hereabouts had a look at each other again at the Academy last night. It was the occasion of the initial concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Philadelphia season, and Mr. Nikisch and his competent aggregation were given that cordial and responsive reception with which their coming is always signalled. It was the same thoughtful audience, distingue, and stamped with the never to be mistaken mark of culture and intelligence. This is but cause and effect. The average theatre goer finds nothing to his taste in the works of the master composers, or nothing to appreciate in the orchestral interpretation. The seeker after simple amusement cannot find it in the presence of these things any more than he can in reading, or in hearing read, a profound essay or a great poem. And what is music but poetry? What, for instance, is Beethoven's 3d Symphony but a mighty poem? The poet sets his ideas and conceptions to every day word language; the music master to tones and tempos. Each thought is clothed in sound; each beautiful conceit wrapped about with tonic splendor, a great rhythmical poem of melodies and harmonies. The programme last night was one of old favorites, and calls for little special critical attention. It combined Beethoven, Wagner, and Weber—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony No. 3, in E flat; Wagner's Faust Overture, and Weber's overture to Oberon. Mr. Nikisch gives a most tasteful reading of the symphony. Most skilful and pleasing was his treatment of the second movement. Full of funereal sadness and earnest emotion as he so prominently made it, the rare beauty of the conception was seen and comprehended. There was some surprise felt that with such a large orchestra the loud effects should be so comparatively feeble, and perhaps it was due to this very shortcoming that the emotional passages during the evening were so especially delightful. The closing number, the familiar Oberon overture with its speaking fairy scenes, appealed strongly to artistic appreciation. The orchestra, which was alert and heartily responsive to the conductor, was aided by Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the gifted and popular soloist. She sang two arias—the mad scene from Hamlet, by Ambroise Thomas, and Massenet's Herodiade. The mad, wild notes of the Hamlet scene gave special opportunity to her style of voice, and though a most exacting work, she proved her ability to cope with every trying and difficult vocal movement. The loud and long response of the audience must have been in some way a recompense for the arduous effort. Indeed, so repeated and vigorous was the appreciative applause that she was obliged to take the encore and sang the last half of the aria over again.

MR. NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that vareity of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season. She sang the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet," and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful texture and her control of it is excellent. Her singing was delightful and the audience was enthusiastic.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOV. 14.

WASHINGTON'S EAR PLEASED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scores a Marked Success.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season tonight at Lincoln Music Hall,

The hall was crowded with a distinguished and very fashionable audience, who were lavish in their applause, but following the usual custom, Mr. Nikisch declined any encores.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in B flat.....Beethoven
Aria, Hans Heiling.....Marschner
Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Moto Perpetuo, concert allegro.....Paganini
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, Die Walkure.....Wagner

The second movement of the Tscharkowsky symphony, which is comparatively unknown in Washington, met with the fullest applause, although every number was enthusiastically received,

The orchestra was as perfect as ever, and under the direction of Mr. Nikisch gave a concert which was in every way worthy of the high standard of the famous orchestra.

Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the soloist, and made a distinctly favorable impression.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 16, 1890.

THE MUSIC HALL POPULAR.

The fifth of the Music Hall popular concerts will be given this evening, when the talent engaged will include Mrs. Nella Brown-Pond, the popular reader; Knoll and Marie McNeil, the cornet duetists; Mme. Louise Natalie, the operatic soprano; Constantine Sternberg, pianist; Miss Edith Christie, violinist, and the Orpheus instrumental quartet. Mme. Natalie is to sing the "Una Voce" and the "Caro Nome," Mr. Sternberg will play the Hungarian rhapsodie No. 14 and a "humoresque" of his own composition, Miss Christie will contribute Sarasate's "Gypsy dance," and the numbers by Mrs. Pond and the other artists will be equally interesting.

Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, will be the soloist at the Symphony concert of next Saturday evening, and the programme will include Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Haydn's concerto for violoncello, Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava" and Beethoven's Turkish march from "Ruins of Athens."

Clipping from Ledger Phila Pa

Date Nov 16 90

The Boston symphony orchestra has begun a series of concerts in New York and Anton Seidl has led an orchestra in Boston this week. This is an agreeable interchange of high musical talent. Nikisch is criticised in New York for sacrificing "the highest element of beauty, repose," to the purpose not to be tedious. Seidl seems to have done the same thing in Boston. Both thought it necessary to be "popular" at all hazards.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 13, 1890.

First Appearance For This Season of the Boston Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening opened fitly with Beethoven's third symphony. Mr. Nikisch had brought an unusually large number of musicians, the exactness of whose execution leaves nothing to be demanded in the direction of absolute refinement. For so great a body of strings, the thinness of tone was disappointing and the effect of the symphony was somewhat pale and dull. It was rather feminine than heroic, the many minute shadings weakening the larger contrasts. Mr. Nikisch is an exceedingly thoughtful and original conductor and he has some extraordinary readings—sometimes beautiful, sometimes perplexing—that not seldom render obscure a composition that never before seemed hard to understand. In the "Oberon" overture, which closed the concert, his characteristic excellence was thoroughly displayed. A more sensitive, poetical rendering of this lovely work could not be imagined and the execution of the orchestra here was faultless.

The soloist of the evening was Miss DeVere, who sang the mad scene from "Hamlet" in a voice as pure and lovely as when she was first heard here and with exquisite taste and skill. It was a performance that justly aroused real enthusiasm and the audience insisted on a repetition. When the singer returned in response to the call and the conductor ungallantly sent her back again, there was an expression of disapproval that compelled him to yield and the song was repeated with even greater beauty than before. Miss DeVere sang also the "Herodiade" aria, after the orchestra had played Wagner's wandering "Faust" overture.

TWO MUSICAL EVENTS.

The First Boston Symphony Concert—Performance of "L'Africaine.

Ledger Phila Nov 13 90

The first Boston Symphony Concert took place at the Academy of Music last night. A very large audience welcomed Mr. Nikisch and his splendid orchestra. The orchestral numbers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Weber's "Oberon" Overture.

The band, which has been further strengthened by the addition of some violas, was in capital form and gave an exceptionally fine rendering of the symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of a Beethoven composition, but there certainly can be but a unanimous verdict about the perfect execution of the orchestra. The two overtures, so widely different in character, were superbly played.

The soloist of the occasion was Mlle. de Vere, who sung the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." Notwithstanding that the scene was vociferously redemanded and the last portion repeated much against the wishes of Mr. Nikisch it was by no means well sung. Indeed, bearing in mind the magnificent rendition of this capital scene by Mesdames Nilsson and Gerster Mlle. de Vere's performance seemed like the effort of a clever amateur.

The substitution of a cadence for the maniacal laugh is not to be commended. Later in the evening Mlle. de Vere was heard in the Romanza from Massenet's "Herodiadi," in which she appeared to better advantage.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa

Date Nov 16 90

...mer Girl."

The sale of season tickets for the six Symphony concerts to be given between now and the end of next April at the Academy of Music by the Boston Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, opened yesterday. Among the soloists already announced for these concerts are Vladimir de Pachman, pianist, and Clementine de Vere, the popular soprano singer. The first of the six concerts will take place on Wednesday evening, November 12.

[42]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 15, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme of last Saturday was one of Mr. Nikisch's best selections. At first it might seem scarcely discreet to put Gade and Mendelssohn in the same evening, because the former was in so many respects but a follower—almost an imitator—of the latter. But Gade was represented by themost powerful and individual of all his shorter works,—the "Ossian" overture, in which he feels and makes others feel the atmosphere of the bare, gloomy, wind-swept heaths and lowering mountains, the drifting fogs and clouds, the dreary winds, and the ghostly apparitions, martial, imposing and magnificent, in spite of their intangible essence with "the stars dim twinkling through their forms." Besides, all the rest of the programme intervened between this overture and the "Scotch" symphony, which in its own poetical way recalls the character of the Highland landscape, temper and trend of music. Midway between these lay that wild, erratic, extravagant irresistible "Scherzo Cappriccioso" of Dvorak, whirling down upon one with a thought strangely like the chief theme of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," and then rushing off with clangor and fury into unimagined regions of excitement. The performance of these three compositions was perfect so far as the obedience and precision of the orchestra were concerned, but Mr. Nikisch marred some passages by his exaltation of details and by his obstinacy in excluding anything like a pianissimo from his readings. There was vocal music, most delightful and honorable, by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the contralto, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho" and a group of three songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari, the French text being used for all. It is a question, as we said at the time of Mrs. Wyman's last previous appearance, whether the beauty and freedom of her tone may not be endangered by such adherence to the narrowing French language; but there can be no question as to the refinement, just reserve, and exquisite proportions of her readings. Her voice and manner have little which is touching in them, but her art is so exact and her sensibility so fine that her suggestion is richer than the demonstration of many a warmer singer.

There will be no concert this week, but on Saturday evening next the orchestra will play from Beethoven the first symphony and the Turkish march, as well as Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. Hekking will play a 'cello concerto by Haydn which will be new to Boston.

The Sunday night populars at the Music Hall are doing well. The instrumental selections are generally by a first-class band and there are solo numbers and songs, the vocalists thus far having been such favorites as Marion Manola, Pauline Hall and Campanini.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1890.

The first appearance in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, next Wednesday.

Clipping from Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa
Date 11-13

Bless Our Native Land.

MR. NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that vareity of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season, [illegible] the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet" and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful tex[illegible] [illegible] excellent. He[illegible] [illegible] audience

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1890.

Fifth Symphony—Mrs. W. C. Wyman, Soloist.

The Philharmonic Concert—Campanini Returns.

Concerts in the Near Future—Paragraphs—Nuggets.

The fifth Symphony programme was:

Gade.	Overture, "Ossian."
Gounod.	Aria, from "Sappho."
Dvorák.	Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.
	Songs with piano,
Delibes.	"Regrets."
Massenet.	"Bonne Nuit."
Ferrari.	"A une Fiancee."
Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch).

The readings of both the overture and the symphony were interesting on account of the liberties the conductor took—musical liberties they were, by which the composer gained. The Scherzo Capriccioso is a brilliant piece of scoring, illustrating the command of orchestral technique Dvorák has, and the lavish coloring he delights in. It was played with great spirit and created much enthusiasm.

The soloist was Mrs. W. C. Wyman, one of the few French-taught artists who sing well, with a tone audible in a large hall. Mrs. Wyman's voice is smooth and agreeable, and her vocal delivery is, in most respects, commendable. The rather hackneyed scene from Gounod's first opera is well written for the voice, and Mrs. Wyman gave it with intelligence. The songs, sung to the lovely accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, were delicious in themselves, but too light in character for the occasion. There will be no concert this week. Next week the symphony will be Beethoven's first. A descriptive piece by Smetana, entitled "Vetara," and Beethoven's Turkish March, will also be heard. Anton Hekking will play Haydn's 'cello cocerto.

Campanini sang at Music Hall last night, with all the old-time finish of style, perfection of voice production, and with more strength of tone and beautiful quality than he has shown for years. It is said that he has recently submitted to an operation, and that his throat has been rid of an abnormal growth. Something has conspired to restore tone to the singer whom we all delighted in for years, and who always, even in affliction, remained an artist. Campanini sang the romance from "Aida," and an aria from "Carmen:" for encores, "Dorine Pura," and "La donna Mobile." His exquisite use of the middle voice, his ability to modify the tone from forte to piano without changing its position or the timbre, is possessed by few of the world's singers. The flush of youth has left his voice, but this is only apparent when he pushes it. Such singing as Campanini's is worth more to the vocal student than scores of lessons; should he be announced to sing here again we most strenuously urge all students of the voice, and all admirers of pure singing to avail themselves of a great opportunity.

The orchestra is off this week for the first trip of the season. The itinerary is: New Haven, Nov. 10—Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; aria, "My heart to thy sweet voice," from "Samson and Dalila," Saint Saëns (Mrs. W. C. Wyman); andantino and scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; songs with P. F. prelude, "Lohengrin;" "Ride of the Walküres," Wagner. New York, Nov. 11—Overture, "Oberon," Weber; aria, "O ma lyre immortelle, from "Sapho," Gounod (Mrs. W. C. Wyman); "A Faust Overture," Wagner; songs with P. F.; "Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; Symphony (Heroic), Beethoven. Philadelphia, Nov. 12—Symphony (Heroic), Beethoven; aria, mad scene from "Hamlet," A. Thomas (Miss De Vere); "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Aria from "Heroiade," Massenet (Miss De Vere); overture, "Oberon," Weber. Washington, Nov. 13—Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Aria from "Hans Heiling," Marschner (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantine and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini (played by all the violins); Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, Wagner (Wotan, Mr. Reichmann). There will be Baltimore concerts later in the season; difficulty in securing a hall caused their postponement.

Record, Philadelphia Pa
Date 11-13

[illegible] always pleasing.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season. The great band was in excellent form, and the Eroica symphony has never been better performed here. Mlle. De Vere sang two important numbers delightfully, and the occasion gave rare pleasure to a crowded house.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1890.

* * * * *

At the Symphony Concert Mrs. Walter C. Wyman sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho"; "Regrets" by Delibes; "Good night" by Massenet; and "To a betrothed" by Ferrari. The well known aria is pathetic to the last degree; the songs are melodious, skilfully written for the singer, while the accompaniments beautiful in themselves do not disturb but rather set in relief the voice. Now Mrs. Wyman is not a great singer in the common meaning of the word. Her voice is not powerful, and when she sings there is a suspicion that she chooses songs which lie for the most part outside of the range of her natural voice; so that the voice being constantly forced upward, it is a question whether in a few years she will not lose in part the control of her lower tones. But she is beyond doubt and without all peradventure a most admirable artist, and her singing is to be most heartily praised; for in it natural taste and cunning art join in friendly rivalry. Her voice is sympathetic; her phrasing, in other words her balancing of musical sentences, her musical punctuation is free from exaggeration. There is none of that cheap and spasmodic delivery which passes to-day for true expression. She has none of the vulgar tricks which too often win applause even at Symphony concerts. When she wishes to sing forte she does not find it necessary to scream; nor does she fall from the pitch the moment she essays a piano. When she sang here in the spring the nasal quality of some of her tones displeased; her attack of upper tones was not free from the charge of "scooping"; and she was cold. The Mrs. Wyman who sang Saturday seemed to be a different woman; perhaps the change was in herself, perhaps the difference was due to the selections. However this may be, last Saturday she delighted both musicians and amateurs. The pleasure derived from hearing her would be intensified in a smaller hall, but even in Music Hall she was heard without apparent effort on her part. The applause which was given was nearty, long-continued and spontaneous.

* * * * *

At Music Hall last Sunday evening Campanini sang. Whether it was due to the cutting away of a tumor which had grown in his throat, or whether it was owing to a long rest, the fact remains that Campanini was in excellent voice. And who to-day in this country can compare with him? Leaving out of the question the magic charm of his voice, which is at once luscious and manly, what singer now before the public is more a master of the noble art of song? He is the epitome of the wisdom of the Italians. And at the same concert the Ladies' Schubert Quartet sang besides other numbers simple arrangements of "The Blue Bells of Scotland" and "Massa's in the Cold Ground." In purity of intonation, appreciation of delicate effects, in artistic subordination of one to another, the singing of this quartet was most excellent. The second alto, who sang the solo part of the famous negro-minstrel melody, has a voice which haunts. As employed by her in that solo, it seemed unearthly, free of all human association, disembodied; a voice which in a moonless night might come to the ears of one who wandering from his path treads upon some long-forgotten grave.

* * * * *

The applause which was given Campanini and the Schubert Quartet was hearty, long-continued and spontaneous. Now many in the audience and in the same place had given noisy exhibitions of delight when not long ago Miss Pauline Hall screamed and Miss Manola allowed herself to be seen and heard.

* * * * *

So it would seem that at both Symphony and Popular concerts the majority of the audience is pleased equally with good singing and bad singing, and its applause, like the rain, falls upon the just and the unjust. Nor does it matter in the slightest degree whether the audience be at the Boston Theater Sunday night or at Music Hall Saturday evening; in each case we observe the same phenomena; false intonation, screaming, slovenly phrasing, these do not offend; on the other hand pure intonation and the display of vocal skill are applauded and by the very people who cheer the unworthy and the guilty. This is true of concerts and operas. Truly a strange state of affairs.

* * * * *

The orchestral numbers of the Symphony program of last Saturday were Gade's Overture "Ossian"; "Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso;" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." Although exceptions could be taken with justice to the rulings of Mr. Nikisch upon the Symphony, the playing of the orchestra was excellent from beginning to end. The selections were familiar to the audience, and they require no extended comment. It was an extremely interesting concert, and it was of rational length.

* * * * *

Clipping from Times, Philadelphia Pa.
Date 11-13

First Appearance For This Season of the Boston Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening opened fitly with Beethoven's third symphony. Mr. Nikisch had brought an unusually large number of musicians, the exactness of whose execution leaves nothing to be demanded in the direction of absolute refinement. For so great a body of strings, the thinness of tone was disappointing and the effect of the symphony was somewhat pale and dull. It was rather feminine than heroic, the many minute shadings weakening the larger contrasts. Mr. Nikisch is an exceedingly thoughtful and original conductor and he has some extraordinary readings—sometimes beautiful, sometimes perplexing—that not seldom render obscure a composition that never before seemed hard to understand. In the "Oberon" overture, which closed the concert, his characteristic excellence was thoroughly displayed. A more sensitive, poetical rendering of this lovely work could not be imagined and the execution of the orchestra here was faultless.

The soloist of the evening was Miss DeVere, who sang the mad scene from "Hamlet" in a voice as pure and lovely as when she was first heard here and with exquisite taste and skill. It was a performance that justly aroused real enthusiasm and the audience insisted on a repetition. When the singer returned in response to the call and the conductor ungallantly sent her back again, there was an expression of disapproval that compelled him to yield and the song was repeated with even greater beauty than before. Miss DeVere sang also the "Herodiade" aria after the orchestra had played Wagner's w[illegible] ering "Faust" overture.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES

SUNDAY, NOV. 16, 1890.

MUSIC HALL POPULARS.

Nella Brown-Pond, Louise Natali, Edith Christie, Sternberg and Other Talent Tonight.

Judging from the list of talent engaged, the fifth Sunday popular this evening in Music Hall should prove as successful as its predecessors. Miss Nella Brown-Pond, a reader who enjoys deserved popularity here, will make her final appearance. Louise Natali, well remembered for honors won in American opera as well as concert, is to be heard, with Miss Edith Christie, the violinist. The return of Mr. Constantin Sternberg, the distinguished pianist, is sure to be welcomed, and the cornet solos of A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil, with the performances of the Orpheus instrumental quartet, are likely to add materially to the interest of the occasion. This is the programme:

Quartet in F (two movements).....Mozart
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.
Aria, Una voce poco fa.....Rossini
Miss Louise Natali.
Piano solo, Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 14.....Liszt
Constantin Sternberg.
Reading.
Nella Brown-Pond.
Violin solo, Zigeunerweisen.....Sarasate
Miss Edith Christie.
Duo for two cornets, Fantastico Italiano.....Gatti
A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil.
Quartet, Suite in G.....Saint George
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.
Song, Caro Nome (Rigoletto).....Verdi
Miss Louise Natali.
Piano solo, Humoristique.....Sternberg
Constantin Sternberg.
Reading.
Nella Brown-Pond.
Duo for two cornets, Knollenian Polka.....Knoll
A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil.
Overture, Rubezahl.....Flotow
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.

SYMPHONY TRIUMPHS.

Return of Mr. Nikisch and His Orchestra—Saturday's Attractive Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned on Friday from its first trip of the season outside of New England. The success achieved by the organization was wonderful. The strongest proof of this is in the figures. In each city, New Haven, New York, Washington and Philadelphia, the sale was in advance of last year, notably in Philadelphia, where the season sale was nearly $3000 in advance of last year, and the receipts for the first concert $600 in advance of the first concert last season. Every seat in the house was sold. Over 500 purchasers of "rush tickets" stood outside the entrance to the top gallery nearly an hour, a pleasant reminder of the usual scene at Music Hall on Friday afternoon.

In New York, at Chickering Hall, the sign "standing room only" was displayed before the doors opened, and the brilliant audience, the enthusiastic applause, with the flattering press comments, afforded ample evidence of the unqualified success of the concert. In Washington, a city never professedly musical, the season sale was over $2000 in advance of last year, and Lincoln Hall was packed to the doors. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Theodore Reichmann, the soloist, were the recipients of floral offerings. Throughout the trip the orchestral selections arousing the most enthusiasm were the two movements from the Tschaikowsky symphony, the Eroica symphony of Beethoven, the Oberon overture and the Perpetuo Moto of Paganini for violins.

The programme for the return of the orchestra, next Saturday, includes Beethoven's first symphony, the Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens," by the same composer, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. Anton Hekking, the celloist, is to perform, for its first hearing in this city, a concerto by Haydn.

The Boston symphony orchestra had a most brilliant tour.

Clipping from
No. [illegible] Pa.
Date 11-13

There was a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening to hear the first of the six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here between now and next April, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme comprised three orchestral and two vocal numbers, and the symphony with which, reversing the practice of Mr. Gericke and following that of Mr. Thomas, the concert began was Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, better known as the "Eroica." This great composition covers so wide a range of thought, of feeling, of expression and of method that its interpretation affords a good test both of the quality of an orchestra and of the character and capacity and tendencies of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the work was just about what his rendering of other symphonies must have led the experienced concert-goer to expect. Less sentimental than his presentation of the C minor symphony last season, it was still marked by the same distinctive traits. It was full of romantic charm and poetic fervor. It was inspired by exquisite taste and graced by the utmost delicacy of detail. But it seemed to the writer to lack somewhat of that breadth and dignity inseparable from a wholly satisfying interpretation of Beethoven's music. While one is listening to it it seems that nothing could be better, but afterwards one is vaguely conscious of something wanting, of possible and desirable effects which have not been realized. This was particularly the case with the "March for the Death of a Hero." It was very beautiful, very touching, suffused with tenderness and pathos: but it didn't convey, at least not to my mind, the idea that it was a hero who was being carried to his rest. Its sentiment seemed rather to befit the obsequies of an Ophelia. Of course all this is essentially a matter of temperament. There is no absolute standard of right and wrong in such things, and there is no doubt as much to be said in favor of Mr. Nikisch's readings as of any other, but certainly his sympathies seem to be with the romantic rather than the classic school. The other two orchestral selections were Wagner's overture to "Faust" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Both were superbly played, the slow movement of the latter being especially delightful. Mlle. Clementine de Vere was the vocalist. Her selections were the "mad scena" from Thomas' "Hamlet" and the well-known soprano aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," in both of which she greatly distinguished herself. Her voice is a pure soprano, sweet and flexible and of exceptionally good quality in the upper register, while her method is that of the well-trained artist. The hearty encore of the "Hamlet" aria was well deserved and might fairly have been anticipated.

[42]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 15, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme of last Saturday was one of Mr. Nikisch's best selections. At first it might seem scarcely discreet to put Gade and Mendelssohn in the same evening, because the former was in so many respects but a follower —almost an imitator—of the latter. But Gade was represented by themost powerful and individual of all his shorter works,—the "Ossian" overture, in which he feels and makes others feel the atmosphere of the bare, gloomy, wind-swept heaths and lowering mountains, the drifting fogs and clouds, the dreary winds, and the ghostly apparitions, martial, imposing and magnificent, in spite of their intangible essence with "the stars dim twinkling through their forms." Besides, all the rest of the programme intervened between this overture and the "Scotch" symphony, which in its own poetical way recalls the character of the Highland landscape, temper and trend of music. Midway between these lay that wild, erratic, extravagant irresistible "Scherzo Cappriccioso" of Dvorak, whirling down upon one with a thought strangely like the chief theme of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," and then rushing off with clangor and fury into unimagined regions of excitement. The performance of these three compositions was perfect so far as the obedience and precision of the orchestra were concerned, but Mr. Nikisch marred some passages by his exaltation of details and by his obstinacy in excluding anything like a pianissimo from his readings. There was vocal music, most delightful and honorable, by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the contralto, who sang an air from Gounod's "Sappho" and a group of three songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari, the French text being used for all. It is a question, as we said at the time of Mrs. Wyman's last previous appearance, whether the beauty and freedom of her tone may not be endangered by such adherence to the narrowing French language; but there can be no question as to the refinement, just reserve, and exquisite proportions of her readings. Her voice and manner have little which is touching in them, but her art is so exact and her sensibility so fine that her suggestion is richer than the demonstration of many a warmer singer.

There will be no concert this week, but on Saturday evening next the orchestra will play from Beethoven the first symphony and the Turkish march, as well as Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. Hekking will play a 'cello concerto by Haydn which will be new to Boston.

The Sunday night populars at the Music Hall are doing well. The instrumental selections are generally by a first-class band and there are solo numbers and songs, the vocalists thus far having been such favorites as Marion Manola, Pauline Hall and Campanini.

Boston Daily Traveller

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1890.

The first appearance in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, next Wednesday.

Clipping from Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-13

"Bless Our Native Land."

MR. NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. Mr. Nikisch comes this year with more strings than the orchestra has ever yet contained and with a number of new ideas in interpreting familiar scores. The programme was short last evening, with nothing new in it, but all of them are standard and never grow tiresome. The orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely without a score and showed more than ever his individuality. Captious critics have found fault with this conductor for the liberties he takes with the original "Eroica" score. This seems superfluous since he has a far different organization to work with than was contemplated by the composer. The orchestra played it with delicacy, but threw into it a fire only possible with the wealth of strings such as it possesses, since it is essentially a string orchestra, that vareity of instrument predominating in the ratio of 57 to 18 of all other kinds. Its possibilities for delicacy were admirably shown in the opening measures of the scherzo, when the delicate pianissimo phrasing on fifty-six strings was as light and graceful as if from a single one. Its possibilities for power were demonstrated in the Walpurgis night passages in the "Faust" overture.

While Mr. Nikisch delights in surprising his audiences, it is always delightfully so. It may be fairly said that the orchestra was never so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful. There was a refinement of delicacy, a wealth of color and richness of musical beauty in its production of the Oberon overture that marked it clearly among the events of a year. The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementine de Vere, who has been heard here before this season. She sang the aria from the mad scene in "Hamlet," and the "Herodiade" aria of Massenet. Her voice has a beautiful tex ture and her control of it is excellent. He singing was delightful and the audienc enthusiastic.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1890.

Fifth Symphony—Mrs. W. C. Wyman, Soloist.

The Philharmonic Concert—Campanini Returns.

Concerts in the Near Future—Paragraphs—Nuggets.

The fifth Symphony programme was:

Gade.	Overture, "Ossian."
Gounod.	Aria, from "Sappho."
Dvorák.	Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.
	Songs with piano,
Delibes.	"Regrets."
Massenet.	"Bonne Nuit."
Ferrari.	"A une Fiancee."
Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch).

The readings of both the overture and the symphony were interesting on account of the liberties the conductor took —musical liberties they were, by which the composer gained. The Scherzo Capriccioso is a brilliant piece of scoring, illustrating the command of orchestral technique Dvorák has, and the lavish coloring he delights in. It was played with great spirit and created much enthusiasm.

The soloist was Mrs. W. C. Wyman, one of the few French-taught artists who sing well, with a tone audible in a large hall. Mrs. Wyman's voice is smooth and agreeable, and her vocal delivery is, in most respects, commendable. The rather hackneyed scene from Gounod's first opera is well written for the voice, and Mrs. Wyman gave it with intelligence. The songs, sung to the lovely accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, were delicious in themselves, but too light in character for the occasion. There will be no concert this week. Next week the symphony will be Beethoven's first. A descriptive piece by Smetana, entitled "Vetara," and Beethoven's Turkish March, will also be heard. Anton Hekking will play Haydn's 'cello cocerto.

Campanini sang at Music Hall last night, with all the old-time finish of style, perfection of voice production, and with more strength of tone and beautiful quality than he has shown for years. It is said that he has recently submitted to an operation, and that his throat has been rid of an abnormal growth. Something has conspired to restore tone to the singer whom we all delighted in for years, and who always, even in affliction, remained an artist. Campanini sang the romance from "Aida," and an aria from "Carmen:" for encores, "Dorine Pura," and "La donna Mobile." His exquisite use of the middle voice, his ability to modify the tone from forte to piano without changing its position or the timbre, is possessed by few of the world's singers. The flush of youth has left his voice, but this is only apparent when he pushes it. Such singing as Campanini's is worth more to the vocal student than scores of lessons; should he be announced to sing here again we most strenuously urge all students of the voice, and all admirers of pure singing to avail themselves of a great opportunity.

The orchestra is off this week for the first trip of the season. The itinerary is: New Haven, Nov. 10—Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; aria, "My heart to thy sweet voice," from "Samson and Dalila," Saint Saëns (Mrs. W. C. Wyman); andantino and scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; songs with P. F.; prelude, "Lohengrin"; "Ride of the Walküres," Wagner. New York, Nov. 11—Overture, "Oberon," Weber; aria, "O ma lyre immortelle, from "Sappho," Gounod (Mrs. W. C. Wyman); "A Faust Overture," Wagner; songs with P. F.; "Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; Symphony (Heroic), Beethoven. Philadelphia, Nov. 12—Symphony (Heroic), Beethoven; aria, mad scene from "Hamlet," A. Thomas (Miss De Vere); "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Aria from "Heroiade," Massenet (Miss De Vere); overture, "Oberon," Weber. Washington, Nov. 13—Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Aria from "Hans Heiling," Marschner (Mr. Theodor Reichmann); Andantine and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini (played by all the violins); Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, Wagner (Wotan, Mr. Reichmann). There will be Baltimore concerts later in the season; difficulty in securing a hall caused their postponement.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-13

is always pleasing.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season. The great band was in excellent form, and the Eroica symphony has never been better performed here. Mlle. De Vere sang two important numbers delightfully, and the occasion gave rare pleasure to a crowded house.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1890

* * * * *

At the Symphony Concert Mrs. Walter C. Wyman sang an aria from Gounod's "Sappho"; "Regrets" by Delibes; "Good night" by Massenet; and "To a betrothed" by Ferrari. The well known aria is pathetic to the last degree; the songs are melodious, skilfully written for the singer, while the accompaniments beautiful in themselves do not disturb but rather set in relief the voice. Now Mrs. Wyman is not a great singer in the common meaning of the word. Her voice is not powerful, and when she sings there is a suspicion that she chooses songs which lie for the most part outside of the range of her natural voice; so that the voice being constantly forced upward, it is a question whether in a few years she will not lose in part the control of her lower tones. But she is beyond doubt and without all peradventure a most admirable artist, and her singing is to be most heartily praised; for in it natural taste and cunning art join in friendly rivalry. Her voice is sympathetic; her phrasing, in other words her balancing of musical sentences, her musical punctuation is free from exaggeration. There is none of that cheap and spasmodic delivery which passes to-day for true expression. She has none of the vulgar tricks which too often win applause even at Symphony concerts. When she wishes to sing forte she does not find it necessary to scream; nor does she fall from the pitch the moment she essays a piano. When she sang here in the spring the nasal quality of some of her tones displeased; her attack of upper tones was not free from the charge of "scooping"; and she was cold. The Mrs. Wyman who sang Saturday seemed to be a different woman; perhaps the change was in herself, perhaps the difference was due to the selections. However this may be, last Saturday she delighted both musicians and amateurs. The pleasure derived from hearing her would be intensified in a smaller hall, but even in Music Hall she was heard without apparent effort on her part. The applause which was given was hearty, long-continued and spontaneous.

* * * * *

At Music Hall last Sunday evening Campanini sang. Whether it was due to the cutting away of a tumor which had grown in his throat, or whether it was owing to a long rest, the fact remains that Campanini was in excellent voice. And who to-day in this country can compare with him? Leaving out of the question the magic charm of his voice, which is at once luscious and manly, what singer now before the public is more a master of the noble art of song? He is the epitome of the wisdom of the Italians. And at the same concert the Ladies' Schubert Quartet sang besides other numbers simple arrangements of "The Blue Bells of Scotland" and "Massa's in the Cold Ground." In purity of intonation, appreciation of delicate effects, in artistic subordination of one to another, the singing of this quartet was most excellent. The second alto, who sang the solo part of the famous negro-minstrel melody, has a voice which haunts. As employed by her in that solo, it seemed unearthly, free of all human association, disembodied; a voice which in a moonless night might come to the ears of one who wandering from his path treads upon some long-forgotten grave.

* * * * *

The applause which was given Campanini and the Schubert Quartet was hearty, long-continued and spontaneous. Now many in the audience and in the same place had given noisy exhibitions of delight when not long ago Miss Pauline Hall screamed and Miss Manola allowed herself to be seen and heard.

* * * * *

So it would seem that at both Symphony and Popular concerts the majority of the audience is pleased equally with good singing and bad singing, and its applause, like the rain, falls upon the just and the unjust. Nor does it matter in the slightest degree whether the audience be at the Boston Theater Sunday night or at Music Hall Saturday evening; in each case we observe the same phenomena; false intonation, screaming, slovenly phrasing, these do not offend; on the other hand pure intonation and the display of vocal skill are applauded and by the very people who cheer the unworthy and the guilty. This is true of concerts and operas. Truly a strange state of affairs.

* * * * *

The orchestral numbers of the Symphony program of last Saturday were Gade's Overture "Ossian"; "Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso;" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." Although exceptions could be taken with justice to the rulings of Mr. Nikisch upon the Symphony, the playing of the orchestra was excellent from beginning to end. The selections were familiar to the audience, and they require no extended comment. It was an extremely interesting concert, and it was of rational length.

* * * * *

Clipping from Times, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-13

First Appearance For This Season of the Boston Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening opened fitly with Beethoven's third symphony. Mr. Nikisch had brought an unusually large number of musicians, the exactness of whose execution leaves nothing to be demanded in the direction of absolute refinement. For so great a body of strings, the thinness of tone was disappointing and the effect of the symphony was somewhat pale and dull. It was rather feminine than heroic, the many minute shadings weakening the larger contrasts. Mr. Nikisch is an exceedingly thoughtful and original conductor and he has some extraordinary readings—sometimes beautiful, sometimes perplexing—that not seldom render obscure a composition that never before seemed hard to understand. In the "Oberon" overture, which closed the concert, his characteristic excellence was thoroughly displayed. A more sensitive, poetical rendering of this lovely work could not be imagined and the execution of the orchestra here was faultless.

The soloist of the evening was Miss DeVere, who sang the mad scene from "Hamlet" in a voice as pure and lovely as when she was first heard here and with exquisite taste and skill. It was a performance that justly aroused real enthusiasm and the audience insisted on a repetition. When the singer returned in response to the call and the conductor ungallantly sent her back again, there was an expression of disapproval that compelled him to yield and the song was repeated with even greater beauty than before. Miss DeVere sang also the "Herodiade" aria after the orchestra had played Wagner's wa[v]ering "Faust" overture.

Boston Sunday Globe

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 16, 1890.

MUSIC HALL POPULARS.

Nella Brown-Pond, Louise Natali, Edith Christie, Sternberg and Other Talent Tonight.

Judging from the list of talent engaged, the fifth Sunday popular this evening in Music Hall should prove as successful as its predecessors. Miss Nella Brown-Pond, a reader who enjoys deserved popularity here, will make her final appearance. Louise Natali, well remembered for honors won in American opera as well as concert, is to be heard, with Miss Edith Christie, the violinist. The return of Mr. Constantin Sternberg, the distinguished pianist, is sure to be welcomed, and the cornet solos of A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil, with the performances of the Orpheus instrumental quartet, are likely to add materially to the interest of the occasion. This is the programme;

Quartet in F (two movements).....Mozart
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.
Aria, Una voce poco fa.....Rossini
Miss Louise Natali.
Piano solo, Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 14.....Liszt
Constantin Sternberg.
Reading.
Nella Brown-Pond.
Violin solo, Zigeunerweisen.....Sarasate
Miss Edith Christie.
Duo for two cornets, Fantastico Italiano.....Gatti
A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil.
Quartet, Suite in G.....Saint George
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.
Song, Caro Nome (Rigoletto).....Verdi
Miss Louise Natali.
Piano solo, Humoristique.....Sternberg
Constantin Sternberg.
Reading.
Nella Brown-Pond.
Duo for two cornets, Knollenian Polka.....Knoll
A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil.
Overture, Rubezahl.....Flotow
Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.

SYMPHONY TRIUMPHS.

Return of Mr. Nikisch and His Orchestra —Saturday's Attractive Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned on Friday from its first trip of the season outside of New England. The success achieved by the organization was wonderful. The strongest proof of this is in the figures. In each city, New Haven, New York, Washington and Philadelphia, the sale was in advance of last year, notably in Philadelphia, where the season sale was nearly $3000 in advance of last year, and the receipts for the first concert $600 in advance of the first concert last season. Every seat in the house was sold. Over 500 purchasers of "rush tickets" stood outside the entrance to the top gallery nearly an hour, a pleasant reminder of the usual scene at Music Hall on Friday afternoon.

In New York, at Chickering Hall, the sign "standing room only" was displayed before the doors opened, and the brilliant audience, the enthusiastic applause, with the flattering press comments, afforded ample evidence of the unqualified success of the concert. In Washington, a city never professedly musical, the season sale was over $2000 in advance of last year, and Lincoln Hall was packed to the doors. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Theodore Reichmann, the soloist, were the recipients of floral offerings. Throughout the trip the orchestral selections arousing the most enthusiasm were the two movements from the Tschaikowsky symphony, the Eroica symphony of Beethoven, the Oberon overture and the Perpetuo Moto of Paganini for violins.

The programme for the return of the orchestra, next Saturday, includes Beethoven's first symphony, the Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens," by the same composer, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. Anton Hekking, the celloist, is to perform, for its first hearing in this city, a concerto by Haydn.

The Boston symphony orchestra had a most brilliant tour.

Clipping from

Date

There was a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening to hear the first of the six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here between now and next April, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme comprised three orchestral and two vocal numbers, and the symphony with which, reversing the practice of Mr. Gericke and following that of Mr. Thomas, the concert began was Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, better known as the "Eroica." This great composition covers so wide a range of thought, of feeling, of expression and of method that its interpretation affords a good test both of the quality of an orchestra and of the character and capacity and tendencies of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the work was just about what his rendering of other symphonies must have led the experienced concert-goer to expect. Less sentimental than his presentation of the C minor symphony last season, it was still marked by the same distinctive traits. It was full of romantic charm and poetic fervor. It was inspired by exquisite taste and graced by the utmost delicacy of detail. But it seemed to the writer to lack somewhat of that breadth and dignity inseparable from a wholly satisfying interpretation of Beethoven's music. While one is listening to it it seems that nothing could be better, but afterwards one is vaguely conscious of something wanting, of possible and desirable effects which have not been realized. This was particularly the case with the "March for the Death of a Hero." It was very beautiful, very touching, suffused with tenderness and pathos: but it didn't convey, at least not to my mind, the idea that it was a hero who was being carried to his rest. Its sentiment seemed rather to befit the obsequies of an Ophelia. Of course all this is essentially a matter of temperament. There is no absolute standard of right and wrong in such things, and there is no doubt as much to be said in favor of Mr. Nikisch's readings as of any other, but certainly his sympathies seem to be with the romantic rather than the classic school. The other two orchestral selections were Wagner's overture to "Faust" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Both were superbly played, the slow movement of the latter being especially delightful. Mlle. Clementine de Vere was the vocalist. Her selections were the "mad scena" from Thomas' "Hamlet" and the well-known soprano aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," in both of which she greatly distinguished herself. Her voice is a pure soprano, sweet and flexible and of exceptionally good quality in the upper register, while her method is that of the well-trained artist. The hearty encore of the "Hamlet" aria was well deserved and might fairly have been anticipated.

[43]

Philadelphia ...
Date 11-13

HARVARD EASILY DEFEATS AMHERST.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Nov. 12.—Harvard defeated Amherst at foot ball on Hampden Park this afternoon, 64 to 0.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first use) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel those in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and that of Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat sated and the circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very reposefulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaneity of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a falling short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Clipping from ... Advertiser
New York City
Date 11-12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Perhaps the chief charm of the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra is in its marvellous responsiveness to its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch. This was never better demonstrated than last night in Chickering hall on the occasion of the first of the series of orchestral concerts to be given in this city by the famous organization from Boston. Mr. Nikisch's intense and musical personality dominates his band to an overpowering degree, a result which is not always agreeable to those to whom subjectivity in music is something to be deprecated. But then the outcome of it is so splendid as to effectually silence all cavillers.

Frequently has Mr. Nikisch been reproached for his lack of good taste in the arrangement of his programs. No objection, however, could possibly be sustained against last night's scheme.

It was simple, very effective in contrasts, and just lengthy enough to allow one the pleasures that arise from a memory that has not been dulled by a surfeit of good things. Opening with that most charming of fairy overtures, the "Oberon" of Weber, and ending with the noble "Eroica" symphony of the prince of symphonists, Ludwig Van Beethoven, the lovers of Wagner enjoyed all the more keenly that composer's dramatic and powerful "Faust" overture, framed, as it was, by the other master's works.

The Weber overture has always been a piece d'occasion with this orchestra, being an especial favorite with its former conductor, Mr. Gericke. Mr. Nikisch's reading of its romantic measures is more elastic than his predecessor's. His range of dynamics is wider, more varied, hence a greater degree of color in his interpretation. The homogeneity of tone in staccato chords was admirable. The whole overture was given with utmost finesse, and yet was not a whit lacking in tenderness, color and freedom.

The noble "Eine Faust Overture" was played in the most dramatic and telling fashion. An early work of Wagner, it nevertheless contains in embryo ideas that he developed in his later manner more fully, particularly as regards the orchestration, which is not Wagner's best. Mr. Nikisch, by his interpretation, brought out every salient point, rendered pregnant with meaning every phrase—in a word, gave a fiery, impassioned performance of one of the most impressive modern overtures, the orchestral canvas of which reveals its composer's lofty struggles, shadowy ideals and virile humanism. The "Eroica" symphony received a most happy reading, the second and third movements being taken in faster tempo than we are accustomed to. The result in the case of the scherzo was very effective.

Mr. Nikisch knows the value of tonal perspective, and the clarity of all inner figuration in the scores played by him is remarkable. One is at a loss which to admire the most, the purity of the string choir or the rich fulness of the woodwind of this orchestra. The variations in the symphony were given with great variety of coloring and dynamic contrast. Mr. Nikisch certainly sees Beethoven through Nikisch glasses.

The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who first sang the familiar aria from Gounod's "Sappho" in good style and with cultivated voice. Later she rendered, in the most charming fashion, a group of French songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Mrs Wyman's methods are distinctively Gallic, even to a slight artificiality of expression. She is, nevertheless, a most agreeable artist. She was accompanied in the songs by Mr. Nikisch in the most artistic manner. Not the least graceful thing of the evening was the musicianly manner in which he blended a theme from the D minor overture of Wagner's, in the prelude to Delibes's dainty chanson. Mr. Nikisch proved himself a finished pianist

Clipping from ... Post
New York City
Date 11-12

It has been heretofore announced in these columns that under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch the symphony concerts organized in Boston by the liberality of Mr. Higginson have become so remunerative that at the recent auction sale of seats for the season more than $15,000 over and above all probable expenses was cleared, so that Mr. Higginson will now be able to recoup himself for his generous outlay in former years. In New York too the orchestra has constantly gained in favor, as was strikingly shown by the crowded condition of Chickering Hall last evening when the first concert of the season was given. Indeed, the last comers were unable to purchase seats and had to be contented with standing-room.

The change to Chickering Hall, necessitated by the closing of Steinway Hall, is to be regretted, as Chickering Hall is not well suited for orchestral concerts. The majority of the audience are brought so near to one side or the other of the orchestra that the volumes of tone produced by the different groups of instruments do not have time to blend thoroughly by the time they reach the auditorium. Mr. Nikisch, however, had evidently been informed of this peculiarity, and he succeeded in keeping the brass from unduly asserting itself, as it is apt to do in this place. There is another peculiarity of Chickering Hall which did much to mar the most beautiful thing on the programme. While the exquisitely dreamy opening bars of the "Oberon" overture were being played very softly, the noise of carriages rattling down the street came in so loudly that the whole effect was marred. This thing happens often in this place, and the remedy for it is a few blocks of asphalt pavement.

The most commendable feature of Mr. Nikisch's conducting, his dramatic animation, was shown to best advantage in the Oberon overture. Wagner's "Faust" overture, that magnificently gloomy work of which Bülow wrote many years ago that it is a treatise on instrumentation in itself, was played in a manner which both proved the truth of this assertion, and demonstrated the excellent composition and balance of the Boston orchestra. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony was much less modernized than some of his previous performances had led one to expect. He did, however, throw many side lights on Beethoven's work, and bring out some poetic details that other conductors had ignored, especially in the first movement. Like Wagner, Mr. Nikisch always pursues the melos, in whatever part of the orchestral score it may be apparently concealed, and makes it stand out in its proper perspective. Mr. Nikisch also appeared to great advantage as an accompanist at the piano of songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari, which Mrs. Wyman sang with good tone and excellent method. She also sang an aria from Gounod's "Sapho," which made one wonder again how the inspired composer of "Faust" could be so uninspired in his other works.

Press Philadelphia
Date 11-13

First Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Opera.

The high esteem in which the lovers of music in Philadelphia now hold the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again cordially manifested last night by the brilliant and crowded audience which heard the first concert of the season by this admirable organization at the Academy of Music. Before 8 o'clock every seat in the house was sold, so that many of those who wished to secure seats had to be content with standing room.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica"
Allegro con brio.
Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).
Finale (Allegro molto; Poco Andante con espressione; Presto).
Ambroise Thomas.....Aria, Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Wagner.....Overture, "A Faust Overture"
Massenet.....Aria, "Herodiade"
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"

The Eroica Symphony, by Beethoven—the opening number—was a revelation to the audience. In this work Beethoven departed from the usual custom of beginning with an introduction; two chords given out fortissimo serving in its place. Then enters the first theme, short but noble in character. In the second movement—a funeral march—Beethoven foreshadowed the downfall of the great Napoleon, to whom the symphony was dedicated. The third movement is an excessively bright tone picture of a "lovable, cheerful man, who, in health and happiness, passes through Nature's plains, smiling at her flowery fields, and making the forest heights resound with his merry hunting horn." The last movement is, perhaps, the least interesting to the average hearer, but abounds in beauties, nevertheless.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere only strengthened the good impression she made here last season. She was in splendid voice, and gave a delightful rendering to the aria from the mad scene in Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." When she had finished, the audience gently but persistently insisted upon a repetition of the number. After several recalls she repeated a part of it, evidently against the wishes of the leader, M. Nikisch. Later in the programme she sang "Herodiade," by Massenet, charmingly. Mlle De Vere will always be welcome in Philadelphia.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was rendered with careful attention to light and shade, and made a pleasant contrast to the other numbers on the programme. The overture to "Oberon," composed of themes from Weber's charming opera of the same name, made a fitting close to an excellent programme. Few composers have written such charming, fairy-like music as the opening movement—adagio sostenuto. The magic horn begins and the fairies answer by their presence, represented first by the strings and later on by wood. After a fortissimo chord from the full orchestra the allegro con fuoco section is ushered in, beginning with a subject taken from the quartette, "Over the Dark Blue Waters." Soon after the clarionet gives out a second subject—the theme of Huon's song—"From Boyhood Trained." Later on "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," is prominently heard. The great audience lingered to applaud the finale.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 11-12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of four concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night to an audience of large proportion and appreciation. If possible the band is better than ever it was and played with surprising nerve, unity, power and expression; the strings, especially, are of more than vocal sweetness, and their shading is perfect. There are seventy-six men in the orchestra, and under the incisive leadership of Arthur Nikisch, who seems to control them by nervous force, they play as a single instrument, and a marvelously fine one. Mr. Nikisch in his readings respects the author and adheres to his meaning, though he introduces some originalities of time and accent that would remove his work from the monotony of routine or imitation, even if his style of performance were less positive and spirited than it is. His programme last evening included the "Oberon" overture, wherein the horns produced a beautiful tone and the play of muted violins was fairy like; the "Faust" overture by Wagner—a thing of rugged power and dramatic significance; and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which was given with a breadth and majesty befitting the subject. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a singer of substantial voice, well worn in the lower register, a good school, but expression, gave four songs in French, a familiar air from Gounod's "Sappho," Delibes' pretty "Regrets," Massenet's pretty "Good Night" and Ferrari's blithesome "To a Fiancee," proving himself an able accompanist at the piano. The next concert will be given on the 9th of December. There is no talk of bringing the orchestra to Brooklyn this winter, but already we have Thomas, Seidl and Wilhelmj with it. It is possible among almost a million of people to gather an audience for Mr. Nikisch

Clipping from ... Post
Washington D.C.
11-13
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra To-night

Music lovers will be glad to be reminded of the first concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, which will be given to-night at Lincoln Hall. Herr Theodor Reichmann, the famous Wagnerian baritone, will be the soloist. A novel feature of the concert will be the performance of the "Moto Perpetuo," by Paganini, which will be played by the thirty-two violinists of the orchestra. Other notable numbers on the programme are Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Wotan's Farewell, and Firecharm, from "Die Walkure," Wagner. A magnificent audience is assured.

Star Washington D.C.
Date 11-12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor—will give the first concert of its series at Lincoln Hall tomorrow (Thursday) evening. The orchestral program includes representative compositions by Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Paganini and Wagner. Mr. Theodor Reichmann is the soloist, and will sing an aria from "Hans Heiling," Marschner and Wotan's Farewell from Die Walkure, Wagner. The sale of seats is now progressing at 937 Pennsylvania avenue.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1890.

MUSIC HALL POPULAR.

The managers of the Music Hall popular concerts offered the patrons of these enjoyable Sunday night entertainments an excellent variety of attractive features in last evening's programme, and a good sized audience was called out by the announcements made. The artists participating last evening were: Nella Brown-Pond, the popular reader; Knoll and Marie McNeil, the cornet duetists; Louise Natalie, the operatic soprano; Constantine Steinberg, the pianist; Edith Christie, the violinist, and the Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.

Mrs. Pond is always a welcome artist in any entertainment, and her contributions last evening, "The Christmas Dinner Party," "Douglass" and the "Foolish Little Maiden," were greatly enjoyed. She quickly ingratiates herself with any audience, and never fails to win a hearty recognition of her rare gifts as a reader.

Mme. Louise Natalie, the soprano of the American opera company, heard here last season, is a favorite with Boston audiences, and she again gave great pleasure in her contributions to the programme, her selections being the "Una Voce" and the "Caro Nome," both of which familiar numbers were sung with admirable skill and good taste, the singer gaining recalls after each appearance.

Miss Christie played the "Zegeurnerweisen," by Sarasate, in a very artistic fashion, her technical skill and fine tone giving the best results in her interpretation of this selection, as well as in the encore number, which was imperatively demanded at its conclusion.

Constantine Sternberg, the pianist, has been absent from the concert halls of the northern states for a term of years, and his life "down South" appears to have given him added charms as a performer. His announced selections were the Liszt Hungarian rhapsody No. 14 and a "Humoristique" of his own composition, to which he was compelled to add other numbers in response to the applause called out by his playing.

The cornet players, Knoll and Marie McNeil will be recalled as among the artists who aided in making the success of the last "Midsummer Musical Festival" at the Point of Pines, and they had a hearty greeting from those of the audience who knew of their excellent solo attainments at that series of concerts. They proved to be equally good as players indoors, and their artistic merits again found ready recognition, their duet playing creating a furor at each of their appearances.

The Orpheus quartet added a satisfactory element in the way of instrumental selections, and filled out the programme with good effect.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 16.

Signor Campanini's singing at last Sunday night's concert in Music Hall showed him in full command of his voice, which really seemed to have recovered its early purity, strength, and charm. He sang very beautifully and with all of his former grace of style and warmth of feeling, exciting all of the enthusiasm that attended him in his best days of the past.

At to-night's Sunday "Popular" in Music Hall Mrs. Nella Brown-Pond, Miss Louise Natalie, Constantin Sternberg, Miss Edith Christie, Knoll and Marie McNeil and the Orpheus Instrumental Quartet will appear.

Star Washington D.C.
Date 11-14

AMUSEMENTS.

An Audience filling every seat in Music Hall and embracing the best people in the city greeted Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night on the occasion of the first of the series of concerts to be given here this winter. The program was varied sufficiently to please all shades of musical taste, and that it was thoroughly enjoyed was manifest by the emphatic applause given to every number. The Beethoven symphony and the fire scene from "Die Walkure" were the numbers in which the interest centered, and both compositions, so widely different in motion and construction, were performed with a perfection that belongs only to this orchestra. In the Paganini selection the finest exhibition of unison movement in the large number of violins ever witnessed here was given. Mr. Theodore Reichmann sang an aria by Marschner and Wotan's Farewell, displaying a baritone of exceptional power and melody, which completely captivated his hearers.

[43]

Ledger Philadelphia Pa.
Date 11-13

HARVARD EASILY DEFEATS AMHERST.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Nov. 12.—Harvard defeated Amherst at foot ball on Hampden Park this afternoon, 64 to 0.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Philadelphia season last night, with a concert that attracted to the Academy of Music an audience that was fine musically as well as in size. The programme (which contained annotations of interest concerning the orchestral numbers upon its first page) contained no novelty, but there have been few later compositions of their kind that excel those in the trio that Conductor Nikisch placed on the list. These were Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, in E flat; Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Von Weber's "Oberon" Overture. As there could hardly be a group, fine as it is, more familiar to symphony concert goers here, there is need for nothing in the way of discussion beyond a few words as to the conductor's treatment of them. The symphony was placed first, and for this change from former concerts by this organization the audience doubtless felt grateful. With the protracted opening movement and the funeral march of the second coming at the close of a concert, when the interest of the listener is somewhat sated and his circulation growing sluggish, a tendency to drowsiness that is increased by the very reposefulness of the music is inevitable to all but the most wide-awake enthusiast. As it was, the freshness and spontaniety of the music were fully enjoyed. Mr. Nikisch's reading presented no features that call for particular notice. He conducted wholly without notes, and evidently knew the score almost by heart, as could be seen from the watchful way in which he directed individual instruments as well as their combinations. As a general thing, his tempos are slower than the audience has been accustomed to, but there was a fire and swing, not to say an abandon, in portions of the evening's performance that were a refreshing improvement upon the way in which the same organization was conducted heretofore. It will suffice to say of the orchestra that it was always responsive to its conductor, playing with refined feeling and artistic finish. The one defect appeared to be a falling short of the colossal effects such an orchestra should produce, and for which the conductor strove when they were called for in the symphony and the "Faust" overture, and this was probably owing to an arrangement that locked the first violins and a portion of the lower strings at the front of the stage (virtually in the body of the house), while the double basses, brasses, bassoons, etc., were at the rear of the usual enclosure. This gave the upper strings in loud passages a stridency that only the brass wind overcame, and between the two the color of the other instruments was blurred.

The soloist was Mlle. Clementine De Vere. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" brilliantly, like the artist that she is, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience by it. After being several times recalled, she amiably signified her willingness to respond with an encore. After so exacting an aria it was not altogether generous to her to exact it, and the conductor was loth to grant an encore, but as such a musical, well-trained voice and ability to vocalize do not go often together these days, there was strong temptation on the part of the audience to look for it. She repeated the latter half of the florid aria with fully as much effectiveness as at first, and was heard afterwards in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, which she gave with nice dramatic finish. The orchestra, Mr. Nikisch and Mlle. De Vere all had reason to be gratified with their reception.

Clipping from New York City
Date 11-12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Perhaps the chief charm of the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra is in its marvellous responsiveness to its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch. This was never better demonstrated than last night in Chickering hall on the occasion of the first of the series of orchestral concerts to be given in this city by the famous organization from Boston. Mr. Nikisch's intense and musical personality dominates his band to an overpowering degree, a result which is not always agreeable to those to whom subjectivity in music is something to be deprecated. But then the outcome of it is so splendid as to effectually silence all cavillers.

Frequently has Mr. Nikisch been reproached for his lack of good taste in the arrangement of his programs. No objection, however, could possibly be sustained against last night's scheme.

It was simple, very effective in contrasts, and just lengthy enough to allow one the pleasures that arise from a memory that has not been dulled by a surfeit of good things. Opening with that most charming of fairy overtures, the "Oberon" of Weber, and ending with the noble "Eroica" symphony of the prince of symphonists, Ludwig Van Beethoven, the lovers of Wagner enjoyed all the more keenly that composer's dramatic and powerful "Faust" overture, framed, as it was, by the other master's works.

The Weber overture has always been a piece d'occasion with this orchestra, being an especial favorite with its former conductor, Mr. Gerieke. Mr. Nikish's reading of its romantic measures is more elastic than his predecessor's. His range of dynamics is wider, more varied, hence a greater degree of color in his interpretation. The homogeneity of tone in staccato chords was admirable. The whole overture was given with utmost finesse, and yet was not a whit lacking in tenderness, color and freedom.

The noble "Eine Faust Overture" was played in the most dramatic and telling fashion. An early work of Wagner, it nevertheless contains in embryo ideas that he developed in his later manner more fully, particularly as regards the orchestration, which is not Wagner's best. Mr. Nikisch, by his interpretation, brought out every salient point, rendered pregnant with meaning every phrase—in a word, gave a fiery, impassioned performance of one of the most impressive modern overtures, the orchestral canvas of which reveals its composer's lofty struggles, shadowy ideals and virile humanism. The "Eroica" symphony received a most happy reading, the second and third movements being taken in faster tempo than we are accustomed to. The result in the case of the scherzo was very effective.

Mr. Nikisch knows the value of tonal perspective, and the clarity of all inner figuration in the scores played by him is remarkable. One is at a loss which to admire the most, the purity of the string choir or the rich fulness of the woodwind of this orchestra. The variations in the symphony were given with great variety of coloring and dynamic contrast. Mr. Nikisch certainly sees Beethoven through Nikisch glasses.

The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who first sang the familiar aria from Gounod's "Sappho" in good style and with cultivated voice. Later she rendered, in the most charming fashion, a group of French songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Mrs Wyman's methods are distinctively Gallic, even to a slight artificiality of expression. She is, nevertheless, a most agreeable artist. She was accompanied in the songs by Mr. Nikisch in the most artistic manner. Not the least graceful thing of the evening was the musicianly manner in which he blended a theme from the D minor overture of Wagner's, in the prelude to Delibes's dainty chanson. Mr. Nikisch proved himself a finished pianist

Clipping from Tribune New York City
Date 11-12

It has been heretofore announced in these columns that under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch the symphony concerts organized in Boston by the liberality of Mr. Higginson have become so remunerative that at the recent auction sale of seats for the season more than $15,000 over and above all probable expenses was cleared, so that Mr. Higginson will now be able to recoup himself for his generous outlay in former years. In New York too the orchestra has constantly gained in favor, as was strikingly shown by the crowded condition of Chickering Hall last evening when the first concert of the season was given. Indeed, the last comers were unable to purchase seats and had to be contented with standing-room.

The change to Chickering Hall, necessitated by the closing of Steinway Hall, is to be regretted, as Chickering Hall is not well suited for orchestral concerts. The majority of the audience are brought so near to one side or the other of the orchestra that the volumes of tone produced by the different groups of instruments do not have time to blend thoroughly by the time they reach the auditorium. Mr. Nikisch, however, had evidently been informed of this peculiarity, and he succeeded in keeping the brass from unduly asserting itself, as it is apt to do in this place. There is another peculiarity of Chickering Hall which did much to mar the most beautiful thing on the programme. While the exquisitely dreamy opening bars of the "Oberon" overture were being played very softly, the noise of carriages rattling down the street came in so loudly that the whole effect was marred. This thing happens often in this place, and the remedy for it is a few blocks of asphalt pavement.

The most commendable feature of Mr. Nikisch's conducting, his dramatic animation, was shown to best advantage in the Oberon overture. Wagner's "Faust" overture, that magnificently gloomy work of which Bülow wrote many years ago that it is a treatise on instrumentation in itself, was played in a manner which both proved the truth of this assertion, and demonstrated the excellent composition and balance of the Boston orchestra. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Eroica" symphony was much less modernized than some of his previous performances had led one to expect. He did, however, throw many side lights on Beethoven's work, and bring out some poetic details that other conductors had ignored, especially in the first movement. Like Wagner, Mr. Nikisch always pursues the melos, in whatever part of the orchestral score it may be apparently concealed, and makes it stand out in its proper perspective. Mr. Nikisch also appeared to great advantage as an accompanist at the piano of songs by Delibes, Massenet, and Ferrari, which Mrs. Wyman sang with good tone and excellent method. She also sang an aria from Gounod's "Sapho," which made one wonder again how the inspired composer of "Faust" could be so uninspired in his other works.

Press Phil. Pa.
Date 11-13

First Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Opera.

The high esteem in which the lovers of music in Philadelphia now hold the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again cordially manifested last night by the brilliant and crowded audience which heard the first concert of the season by this admirable organization at the Academy of Music. Before 8 o'clock every seat in the house was sold, so that many of those who wished to secure seats had to be content with standing room.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica"
Allegro con brio.
Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).
Finale (Allegro molto; Poco Andante con espressione; Presto).
Ambroise Thomas.....Aria, Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Wagner......"A Faust Overture"
Massenet.....Aria, "Herodiade"
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"

The Eroica Symphony, by Beethoven—the opening number—was a revelation to the audience. In this work Beethoven departed from the usual custom of beginning with an introduction; two chords given out fortissimo serving in its place. Then enters the first theme, short but noble in character. In the second movement—a funeral march—Beethoven foreshadowed the downfall of the great Napoleon, to whom the symphony was dedicated. The third movement is an excessively bright tone picture of a "lovable, cheerful man, who, in health and happiness, passes through Nature's plains, smiling at her flowery fields, and making the forest heights resound with his merry hunting horn." The last movement is, perhaps, the least interesting to the average hearer, but abounds in beauties, nevertheless.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere only strengthened the good impression she made here last season. She was in splendid voice, and gave a delightful rendering to the aria from the mad scene in Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." When she had finished, the audience gently but persistently insisted upon a repetition of the number. After several recalls she repeated a part of it, evidently against the wishes of the leader, M. Nikisch. Later in the programme she sang "Herodiade," by Massenet, charmingly. Mlle De Vere will always be welcome in Philadelphia.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was rendered with careful attention to light and shade, and made a pleasant contrast to the other numbers on the programme. The overture to "Oberon," composed of themes from Weber's charming opera of the same name, made a fitting close to an excellent programme. Few composers have written such charming, fairy-like music as the opening movement—adagio sostenuto. The magic horn begins and the fairies answer by their presence, represented first by the strings and later on by wood. After a fortissimo chord from the full orchestra the allegro con fuoco section is ushered in, beginning with a subject taken from the quartette, "Over the Dark Blue Waters." Soon after the clarionet gives out a second subject—the theme of Huon's song—"From Boyhood Trained." Later on "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," is prominently heard. The great audience lingered to applaud the finale.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 11-12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of four concerts [illegible] by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night to an audience of large proportion and appreciation. If possible the band is better than ever it was and played with surprising verve, unity, power and expression; the strings, especially, are of more than vocal sweetness, and their shading is perfect. There are seventy-six men in the orchestra, and under the incisive leadership of Arthur Nikisch, who seems to control them by nervous force, they play as a single instrument, and a marvelously fine one. Mr. Nikisch in his readings respects the author and adheres to his meaning, though he introduces some originalities of time and accent that would remove his work from the monotony of routine or imitation, even if his style of performance were less positive and spirited than it is. His programme last evening included the "Oberon" overture, wherein the horns produced a beautiful tone and the play of muted violins was fairy like; the "Faust" overture by Wagner—a thing of rugged power and dramatic significance; and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which was given with a breadth and majesty befitting the subject. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a singer of substantial voice, a trifle worn in the lower register, a good schooling and expression, gave four songs in French, a lugubrious air from Gounod's "Sappho," Delibes' sentimental "Regrets," Massenet's pretty "Good Night" and Ferrari's blithesome "To a Fiancee," Mr. Nikisch proving himself an able accompanist at the piano. The next concert will be given on the 9th of December. There is no talk of bringing the orchestra to Brooklyn this winter, but although we have Thomas, Seidl and Winch it ought to be possible among almost a million of people to gather an audience for Mr. Nikisch [illegible].

Clipping from Post Washington D.C.
Date 11-13

The Boston Symphony Orchestra To-night.

Music lovers will be glad to be reminded of the first concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, which will be given to-night at Lincoln Hall. Herr Theodor Reichmann, the famous Wagnerian baritone, will be the soloist. A novel feature of the concert will be the performance of the "Moto Perpetuo" by Paganini, which will be played by the thirty-two violinists of the orchestra. Other notable numbers on the programme are Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Wotan's Farewell, and Firecharm, from "Die Walkure," Wagner. A magnificent audience is assured.

Star [illegible] D.C.
Date 11-12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor—will give the first concert of its series at Lincoln Hall tomorrow (Thursday) evening. The orchestral program includes representative compositions by Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Paganini and Wagner. Mr. Theodor Reichmann is the soloist, and will sing an aria from "Hans Heiling," Marschner and Wotan's Farewell from Die Walkure, Wagner. The sale of seats is now progressing at 937 Pennsylvania avenue.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1890.

MUSIC HALL POPULAR.

The managers of the Music Hall popular concerts offered the patrons of these enjoyable Sunday night entertainments an excellent variety of attractive features in last evening's programme, and a good sized audience was called out by the announcements made. The artists participating last evening were: Nella Brown-Pond, the popular reader; Knoll and Marie McNeil, the cornet duetists; Louise Natalie, the operatic soprano; Constantine Steinberg, the pianist; Edith Christie, the violinist, and the Orpheus Instrumental Quartet.

Mrs. Pond is always a welcome artist in any entertainment, and her contributions last evening, "The Christmas Dinner Party," "Douglass" and the "Foolish Little Maiden," were greatly enjoyed. She quickly ingratiates herself with any audience, and never fails to win a hearty recognition of her rare gifts as a reader.

Mme. Louise Natalie, the soprano of the American opera company, heard here last season, is a favorite with Boston audiences, and she again gave great pleasure in her contributions to the programme, her selections being the "Una Voce" and the "Caro Nome," both of which familiar numbers were sung with admirable skill and good taste, the singer gaining recalls after each appearance.

Miss Christie played the "Zegeurnerweisen," by Sarasate, in a very artistic fashion, her technical skill and fine tone giving the best results in her interpretation of this selection, as well as in the encore number, which was imperatively demanded at its conclusion.

Constantine Sternberg, the pianist, has been absent from the concert halls of the northern states for a term of years, and his life "down South" appears to have given him added charms as a performer. His announced selections were the Liszt Hungarian rhapsody No. 14 and a "Humoristique" of his own composition, to which he was compelled to add other numbers in response to the applause called out by his playing.

The cornet players, Knoll and Marie McNeil will be recalled as among the artists who aided in making the success of the last "Midsummer Musical Festival" at the Point of Pines, and they had a hearty greeting from those of the audience who knew of their excellent solo attainments at that series of concerts. They proved to be equally good as players indoors, and their artistic merits again found ready recognition, their duet playing creating a furor at each of their appearances.

The Orpheus quartet added a satisfactory element in the way of instrumental selections, and filled out the programme with good effect.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 16.

Signor Campanini's singing at last Sunday night's concert in Music Hall showed him in full command of his voice, which really seemed to have recovered its early purity, strength, and charm. He sang very beautifully and with all of his former grace of style and warmth of feeling, exciting all of the enthusiasm that attended him in his best days of the past.

At to-night's Sunday "Popular" in Music Hall Mrs. Nella Brown-Pond, Miss Louise Natalie, Constantin Sternberg, Miss Edith Christie, Knoll and Marie McNeil and the Orpheus Instrumental Quartet will appear.

Date 11-14

AMUSEMENTS.

AN AUDIENCE filling every seat in Music Hall and embracing the best people in the city greeted Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night on the occasion of the first of the series of concerts to be given here this winter. The program was varied sufficiently to please all shades of musical taste, and that it was thoroughly enjoyed was manifest by the emphatic applause given to every number. The Beethoven symphony and the fire scene from "Die Walkure" were the numbers in which the interest centered, and both compositions, so widely different in motion and construction, were performed with a perfection that belongs only to this orchestra. In the Paganini selection the finest exhibition of unison movement in the large number of violins ever witnessed here was given. Mr. Theodore Reichmann sang an aria by Marschner and Wotan's Farewell, displaying a baritone of exceptional power and melody, which completely captivated his hearers.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Nov. 11, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 12, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Nov. 13, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

g from Post
Washington
11/10
1/11

ncert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ried as the moods of an April day programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln st night. From Beethoven, in his nial manner, to Wagner, in most c, most enthralling charm, was a ange, but none the less was it en-
Indeed, the nobility of the open-closing works contrasted strongly hat might be called the musical y of the intermediate numbers.
his concert, the first of the orchesthe season, Mr. Nikisch presented ven's fourth symphony, an andan-nd scherzo from the fourth symby Tschaikowsky, Paganini's Mota ns, and the fire scene from "Die re," Theodore Reichmann singing s music in the latter number. The ra comes to us this season enlarged peerless as ever in all the details ombine to make perfect the intern of orchestral music. The Paga-mber proved an excellent vehicle display of the virtuosity of the players, although it simply emphahat has long been apparent, and sian music was interesting. The ven symphony, with its beauty, elody, and evanescent humor, has been interpreted in more sympamanner, and the fire scene from Valkure" was given with a con-emotion and spirit that almost sated for the lack of scenic effect.
Reichmann sang an aria by Marsch-
Wotan's farewell. His magnifi-tone, forcefullyet musical, liquid as a tenor in its higher register, ply resonant in its lower notes,
the audience and gained him an Both numbers were splendidly
, the latter with intense feeling matic force. He was presented huge diamond-shaped floral tribute, a lyre of roses. Mr. Nikisch was ient, also, of a floral remembrance.
pleasant to add that the house was d and that the sale of season tickets as large as last year.

The Evening Times.

. NOVEMBER 19.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Splendid Entertainment in Providence This Evening.

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, takes place in Infantry Hall, Providence, this evening. The selections include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and the soloists are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra. Mrs. Nikisch makes her first public appearance in concert in America on this occasion, and the event will be of importance on that account. She made her debut in her native city of Cologne as Amalie Heussnex, and in 1882 married Mr. Nikisch, since which time she has not appeared on the operatic stage. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, and she comes with an excellent reputation as an artist. She will be heard in an aria from Thomas' "Mignon" and in a group of songs to the piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1890

MRS. NIKISCH'S AMERICAN DEBUT.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her American debut in this city this evening and scored an unqualified success. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano and very pure in lower tones. She was five times recalled.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[44]

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Nov. 11, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Nov. 13, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

WM. F.

1416 Ch

THE MOST MAGN
IN

WEBE

Used by more Artis
C

Our terms will suit a cash or time arrangement lected by a buyer recogni in the United States.

ADDRESS FOR

WM. F.

1416 Ch

Clipping from Post Washington

Date 11/12/11

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As varied as the moods of an April day was the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Hall last night. From Beethoven, in his most genial manner, to Wagner, in most pathetic, most enthralling charm, was a wide range, but none the less was it enjoyable. Indeed, the nobility of the opening and closing works contrasted strongly with what might be called the musical jugglery of the intermediate numbers.

For this concert, the first of the orchestra for the season, Mr. Nikisch presented Beethoven's fourth symphony, an andantino and scherzo from the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky, Paganini's Moto Perpetus, and the fire scene from "Die Walkure," Theodore Reichmann singing Wotan's music in the latter number. The orchestra comes to us this season enlarged and as peerless as ever in all the details which combine to make perfect the interpretation of orchestral music. The Paganini number proved an excellent vehicle for the display of the virtuosity of the violin players, although it simply emphasized what has long been apparent, and the Russian music was interesting. The Beethoven symphony, with its beauty, grace, melody, and evanescent humor, has never been interpreted in more sympathetic manner, and the fire scene from "Die Walkure" was given with a contrasted emotion and spirit that almost compensated for the lack of scenic effect.

Mr. Reichmann sang an aria by Marschner and Wotan's farewell. His magnificent barytone, forcefullyet musical, liquid and soft as a tenor in its higher register, and deeply resonant in its lower notes, thrilled the audience and gained him an ovation. Both numbers were splendidly rendered, the latter with intense feeling and dramatic force. He was presented with a huge diamond-shaped floral tribute, bearing a lyre of roses. Mr. Nikisch was the recipient, also, of a floral remembrance.

It is pleasant to add that the house was crowded and that the sale of season tickets is twice as large as last year.

The Evening Times.

NOVEMBER 19.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Splendid Entertainment in Providence This Evening.

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, takes place in Infantry Hall, Providence, this evening. The selections include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and the soloists are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra. Mrs. Nikisch makes her first public appearance in concert in America on this occasion, and the event will be of importance on that account. She made her debut in her native city of Cologne as Amalie Heussnex, and in 1882 married Mr. Nikisch, since which time she has not appeared on the operatic stage. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, and she comes with an excellent reputation as an artist. She will be heard in an aria from Thomas' "Mignon" and in a group of songs to the piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1890

MRS. NIKISCH'S AMERICAN DEBUT.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her American debut in this city this evening and scored an unqualified success. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano and very pure in lower tones. She was five times recalled.

[44]

[45]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE regular New York concert season was this time ushered in by that excellent Boston organization, the Symphony Orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch's direction. The inaugural concert of the series of four which are to be given this winter took place on Tuesday night of last week and proved an undoubted and deserved success, Chickering Hall being crowded to its utmost capacity with a fashionable, musical and most enthusiastic audience. Those who had, perhaps not unjustly, feared that the concert room would prove too small for the volume of tone emitted by an orchestra of eighty-five performers were, this time at least, agreeably disappointed. The orchestra sounds rich, noble and, of course, most sonorous, but at no time obstreperous. This fact can, however, easily be accounted for by a glance at the program, which contained no "brassy" number, and moreover Mr. Nikisch, who was aware of the acoustic dangers that were threatening him, kept the heavy artillery of his forces well in the background. The string orchestra sounded as brilliantly and, as the Germans would say, "schneidig," as they did of yore, thus justifying and strengthening the great reputation they hold here; and as for the wood wind we failed entirely to notice any of those grave defects which one of our most esteemed colleagues complains of, who also appears to be essentially in error in his conceptions of one of the vital characteristics of another work produced that evening, for he speaks of the "brilliancy" of Wagner's "Faust" overture, this very picture of gloom, doubt and despair, this very essence of pessimism in music.

The program, though containing absolutely nothing new, was well balanced, interesting and in good taste. It read as follows:

Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Aria, "Sappho" ..... Gounod
"Eine Faust Ouverture" ..... Wagner
Songs ..... "Regrets" Delibes; "Bonne Nuit" Massenet; "A Une Fiancée" Ferrari
With piano accompaniment.
Symphony in E flat, No. 3 ("Eroica") ..... Beethoven

The best and most spontaneous reading which Mr. Nikisch gave was undoubtedly that of the "Faust" overture, which we never before heard interpreted with greater dramatic fervor and stronger emotional feeling. It alone would have stamped him as one of the greatest conductors of our times.

The "Oberon" overture was given with delightful shading, utmost rhythmic precision and an unusual amount of dash and elan.

As to the "Eroica," Nikisch's conception did not differ as widely from the accepted and traditional readings as some people had anticipated, or, shall we say, feared? There were changes, but they were not iconoclastic or even exaggerated. The tempo of the second theme of the first movement was taken a trifle broader than that of the opening theme, but this served to produce an excellent and well accented musical contrast. The funeral march was taken at a little greater speed than Thomas' tempo, who, however, always seemed dragging and too slow in this lengthy movement. The scherzo went smoothly and the variations of the last movement were interpreted with a somewhat novel but also thoroughly musical individualization of each particular variation.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman's singing was highly enjoyable. Her mezzo soprano voice is most agreeable in the middle and lower register, and she phrased with musicianly instinct; moreover, her pronunciation of the French text is excellent. The group of piquant French songs was exquisitely accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch in person, who, to judge from the finished manner in which he performed the difficult accompaniment to the Ferrari song, is a pianist of no small attainments.

Mrs. Wyman was enthusiastically recalled, and allayed the demand for an encore with a repetition of Massenet's pretty trifle, "Bonne Nuit."

* * *

A stunning good concert that of Nikisch's, wasn't it?

In addition to the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a remarkable organization of skilled men, its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is a musical thinker, and one whose readings are worthy of respectful attention, no matter how they differ from our preconceived notions.

This is the first and most important item, and the second is like unto it, viz., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Nikisch, has been engaged for the May Festival of '91. The chorus is already hard at work, and Mr. Hobart Weld, than whom there is no more enthusiastic music lover and music worker in Buffalo, is daily besieged by letters from soloists from everywhere and nowhere, who fain would lend the sunshine of their presence—for a considerable consideration!

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1890.

The Symphony Orchestra in Providence.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, R. I., was given last evening to a large and fashionable audience. The event was specially notable because of the appearance, for the first time in this country, of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the well-known conductor, and the addition of Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, as soloist. Of the work of the orchestra there is need to say little. The selections included Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4," in B flat, Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and the Lohengrin prelude—a well chosen programme, and one which could not fail of appreciation in any city.

Mrs. Nikisch made her appearance after the overture, giving as a first selection the aria "Know'st Thou that Fair Land," from Thomas's Mignon, with orchestral accompaniment, and had a very cordial reception. She is a lady of beautiful personal appearance, and looked charmingly in a pink brocaded dress with a large corsage bouquet. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of great purity and sweetness. She uses it naturally and without any attempt at artificiality, winning the hearts of the audience at once. She is as winsome and pleasing in her stage presence as in her singing, and praise is justly her due for an unusually artistic and musicianly interpretation of the aria. Later she gave a group of German songs simply, easily, effectively, and received for them an ovation. Her appearance is an assured success, and she will be heartily welcomed in future appearances. She received the plaudits of the audience very modestly and gracefully. Mr. Kneisel gave two movements from Goldmark's concerto for the violin, its first performance in America, and the favorite leader of the orchestra received an ovation only second to that given Mrs. Nikisch. The enthusiasm seemed "catching." The fine hall, the delightful playing, all conspired to make the concert one of the finest the writer has heard this season from this organization. It is rare to hear at any time such an interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1890.

The first appearance on a concert stage in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch occurred at Providence last night. She sang the aria from "Mignon," "Connais-tu le Pays," and a group of songs by Rubinstein, Wallnofar and Schumann, and won from her audience the heartiest congratulation in all

---

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 20, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH'S TRIUMPH.

Her American Debut at Providence, R. I., a Remarkable Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 19, 1890. The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its series of six concerts in Infantry Hall tonight to the largest audience the organization has ever had in this city, due, no doubt, to the fact that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was to make her debut in America.

Mrs. Nikisch made her first appearance on the operatic stage at the Stadt Theatre in Cologne, in 1881, remaining there two years. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic for a year, and a later engagement at the Hof Theatre in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage.

Since her retirement from the operatic stage she has appeared with marked success at concerts in Stuttgart, Heidelberg, and other large cities abroad.

Mrs. Nikisch sang for her opening number tonight the favorite aria, "Connais Tu la Pays," from "Mignon."

She won the audience at the very outset by her charming stage presence, and her singing revealed her artistic training and a faultless method. Her voice is a rich mezzo-soprano of a delightful quality.

Three hearty recalls rewarded her charming rendition of the aria.

For her second number Mrs. Nikisch sang a group of three songs by Rubinstein, Wallnofar and Schumann, with piano accompaniment most artistically played by Mr. Nikisch.

She scored a second success, winning the heartiest applause at the close of each song.

Mrs. Nikisch wore a dress of pink tulle, with gauze overdress and ottoman silk trimmings of the same shade.

Mr. Franz Kneisel won much applause by a superb rendering of two movements of the concerto for violin, by Goldmark.

The orchestral work was up to its usual high standard, and especially in the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the fourth symphony of Beethoven.

These concerts are already a recognized feature of the musical season in Providence, and another year will very likely see a more extended series.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, NOV. 21, 1890.

MME. NIKISCH appears to have almost vindicated her claim to the title of a better half.

[45]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE regular New York concert season was this time ushered in by that excellent Boston organization, the Symphony Orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch's direction. The inaugural concert of the series of four which are to be given this winter took place on Tuesday night of last week and proved an undoubted and deserved success, Chickering Hall being crowded to its utmost capacity with a fashionable, musical and most enthusiastic audience. Those who had, perhaps not unjustly, feared that the concert room would prove too small for the volume of tone emitted by an orchestra of eighty-five performers were, this time at least, agreeably disappointed. The orchestra sounds rich, noble and, of course, most sonorous, but at no time obstreperous. This fact can, however, easily be accounted for by a glance at the program, which contained no "brassy" number, and moreover Mr. Nikisch, who was aware of the acoustic dangers that were threatening him, kept the heavy artillery of his forces well in the background. The string orchestra sounded as brilliantly and, as the Germans would say, "schneidig," as they did of yore, thus justifying and strengthening the great reputation they hold here; and as for the wood wind we failed entirely to notice any of those grave defects which one of our most esteemed colleagues complains of, who also appears to be essentially in error in his conceptions of one of the vital characteristics of another work produced that evening, for he speaks of the "brilliancy" of Wagner's "Faust" overture, this very picture of gloom, doubt and despair, this very essence of pessimism in music.

The program, though containing absolutely nothing new, was well balanced, interesting and in good taste. It read as follows:

Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Aria, "Sappho" ..... Gounod
"Eine Faust Ouverture" ..... Wagner
Songs ..... "Regrets" ..... Delibes
"Bonne Nuit" ..... Massenet
"À Une Fiancée" ..... Ferrari
With piano accompaniment.
Symphony in E flat, No. 3 ("Eroica") ..... Beethoven

The best and most spontaneous reading which Mr. Nikisch gave was undoubtedly that of the "Faust" overture, which we never before heard interpreted with greater dramatic fervor and stronger emotional feeling. It alone would have stamped him as one of the greatest conductors of our times.

The "Oberon" overture was given with delightful shading, utmost rhythmic precision and an unusual amount of dash and elan.

As to the "Eroica," Nikisch's conception did not differ as widely from the accepted and traditional readings as some people had anticipated, or, shall we say, feared? There were changes, but they were not iconoclastic or even exaggerated. The tempo of the second theme of the first movement was taken a trifle broader than that of the opening theme, but this served to produce an excellent and well accented musical contrast. The funeral march was taken at a little greater speed than Thomas' tempo, who, however, always seemed dragging and too slow in this lengthy movement. The scherzo went smoothly and the variations of the last movement were interpreted with a somewhat novel but also thoroughly musical individualization of each particular variation.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman's singing was highly enjoyable. Her mezzo soprano voice is most agreeable in the middle and lower register, and she phrased with musicianly instinct; moreover, her pronunciation of the French text is excellent. The group of piquant French songs was exquisitely accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch in person, who, to judge from the finished manner in which he performed the difficult accompaniment to the Ferrari song, is a pianist of no small attainments.

Mrs. Wyman was enthusiastically recalled, and allayed the demand for an encore with a repetition of Massenet's pretty trifle, "Bonne Nuit."

* * *

A stunning good concert that of Nikisch's, wasn't it?

In addition to the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a remarkable organization of skilled men, its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is a musical thinker, and one whose readings are worthy of respectful attention, no matter how they differ from our preconceived notions.

This is the first and most important item, and the second is like unto it, viz., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Nikisch, has been engaged for the May Festival of '91. The chorus is already hard at work, and Mr. Hobart Weld, than whom there is no more enthusiastic music lover and music worker in Buffalo, is daily besieged by letters from soloists from everywhere and nowhere, who fain would lend the sunshine of their presence—for a considerable consideration!

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1890.

The Symphony Orchestra in Providence.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, R. I., was given last evening to a large and fashionable audience. The event was specially notable because of the appearance, for the first time in this country, of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the well-known conductor, and the addition of Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, as soloist. Of the work of the orchestra there is need to say little. The selections included Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4," in B flat, Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and the Lohengrin prelude—a well chosen programme, and one which could not fail of appreciation in any city.

Mrs. Nikisch made her appearance after the overture, giving as a first selection the aria "Know'st Thou that Fair Land," from Thomas's Mignon, with orchestral accompaniment, and had a very cordial reception. She is a lady of beautiful personal appearance, and looked charmingly in a pink brocaded dress with a large corsage bouquet. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of great purity and sweetness. She uses it naturally and without any attempt at artificiality, winning the hearts of the audience at once. She is as winsome and pleasing in her stage presence as in her singing, and praise is justly her due for an unusually artistic and musicianly interpretation of the aria. Later she gave a group of German songs simply, easily, effectively, and received for them an ovation. Her appearance is an assured success, and she will be heartily welcomed in future appearances. She received the plaudits of the audience very modestly and gracefully. Mr. Kneisel gave two movements from Goldmark's concerto for the violin, its first performance in America, and the favorite leader of the orchestra received an ovation only second to that given Mrs. Nikisch. The enthusiasm seemed "catching." The fine hall, the delightful playing, all conspired to make the concert one of the finest the writer has heard this season from this organization. It is rare to hear at any time such an interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1890.

The first appearance on a concert stage in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch occurred at Providence last night. She sang the aria from "Mignon," "Connais-tu le Pays," and a group of songs by Rubinstein, Wallnofar and Schumann, and won from her audience the heartiest recognition in all.

BOSTON HERALD.
THURSDAY, NOV. 20, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH'S TRIUMPH.

Her American Debut at Providence, R. I., a Remarkable Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 19, 1890. The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its series of six concerts in Infantry Hall tonight to the largest audience the organization has ever had in this city, due, no doubt, to the fact that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was to make her debut in America.

Mrs. Nikisch made her first appearance on the operatic stage at the Stadt Theatre in Cologne, in 1881, remaining there two years. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic for a year, and a later engagement at the Hof Theatre in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage.

Since her retirement from the operatic stage she has appeared with marked success at concerts in Stuttgart, Heidelberg, and other large cities abroad.

Mrs. Nikisch sang for her opening number tonight the favorite aria, "Connais Tu la Pays," from "Mignon."

She won the audience at the very outset by her charming stage presence, and her singing revealed her artistic training and a faultless method. Her voice is a rich mezzo-soprano of a delightful quality.

Three hearty recalls rewarded her charming rendition of the aria.

For her second number Mrs. Nikisch sang a group of three songs by Rubinstein, Wallnofar and Schumann, with piano accompaniment most artistically played by Mr. Nikisch.

She scored a second success, winning the heartiest applause at the close of each song.

Mrs. Nikisch wore a dress of pink tulle, with gauze overdress and ottoman silk trimmings of the same shade.

Mr. Franz Kneisel won much applause by a superb rendering of two movements of the concerto for violin, by Goldmark.

The orchestral work was up to its usual high standard, and especially in the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the fourth symphony of Beethoven.

These concerts are already a recognized feature of the musical season in Providence, and another year will very likely see a more extended series.

BOSTON HERALD.
FRIDAY, NOV. 21, 1890.

MME. NIKISCH appears to have almost vindicated her claim to the title of a better half.

[46]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert in their Series at Infantry Hall.

The second concert in the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall before an audience even larger than that which was present at the first concert. The programme was as follows:

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
A. Thomas.....Aria from "Mignon."
Mrs. Nikisch.
Wagner.....Prelude, "Lohengrin."
Goldmark.....Second and Third Movements from Concerto for Violin
(First time in America.)
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
Rubinstein.....(a) "Es blinkt der Thau"
Wagner.....(b) "Unter'm Lindenbaum"
Schumann.....(c) "Ueber'm Garten durch die Luefte"
Mrs. Nikisch.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4, in B-flat

It did not seem, somehow, as if Mr. Nikisch had quite struck the right note in the formation of this programme. It was not that he offered his audience what they would not have; on the contrary, everything was drawn from what is best in the world of music. And when the performance was everywhere so fine, so stimulating, complaint seems doubly ungracious. Yet it did not seem that there was that rather indefinable fitness of part to part, that mutual complementing of one thing with another that makes the well-rounded whole of a "good programme." The lack surely was not of a concession to more moods than one; the music was spoken in the language of many schools, for the most part of their loftiest style and highest aim.

Furthermore the concert was notable in affording teh first public appearance in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose debut has been awaited with much pleasant expectation. Mrs. Nikisch, as has already been made known, was before her marriage a dramatic singer in Cologne and Leipzig, in which cities she has won an excellent name; and her coming to America was made the occasion of her reappearance upon the concert stage. From the unqualified success of her performance last evening it was made evident that she will be an important and highly prized addition to American concert singers. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is a mezzo, rather than a true soprano, with its best tones in the lower register, but of a delightfully pure and even quality throughout. Her singing of the aria from "Mignon" was of an exquisitely graceful and touching expressiveness, full of passion and power in the middle portion, touched with a true feeling and animated by an instinctively artistic impulse through its whole extent. Mrs. Nikisch's style is essentially lyric, so far as it was shown last evening, and not only was this the dominant note in the "Mignon" aria, but it was made even more charmingly evident in the three songs by three masters of the German "Lieder" form. Her singing of these was a delight in its freshness and spontaneity, its just and characteristic interpretation of the sentiment and its freedom from all affectation and exaggeration that so easily spoil the perfect and delicate outlines of such compositions. Especially fine in its breadth and fire was her rendering of the wonderful song of Schumann's; while not the least charming characteristic of the performance was the perfect balance that existed between the singer's work and her husband's refined and exquisitely shaded accompaniments. The three recalls that Mrs. Nikisch responded to after her aria, and the two after her group of songs showed the warmth and appreciation with which her singing was received by the audience.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the second soloist in the evening's scheme; he played for perhaps the first time in this country two movements from Goldmark's violin concerto. It is not an interesting work, as a whole, though possessing many passages of beauty, besides being difficult and effective for the soloist's technical powers. It seems to lack inspiration and unity of purpose, as do so many of Goldmark's works, except the few upon which his reputation chiefly rests. The orchestral accompaniment is exceedingly rich and highly colored, and full of novel instrumental effects—effects so striking, indeed, as frequently to divert attention from the discourse of the solo violin. Mr. Kneisel played the work in a thoroughly artistic style, with an unerring mastery of its many difficulties, and with the solidity and breadth of style that interpret a work for itself alone, and not as a vehicle for a virtuoso's display. His playing was very warmly applauded, and he was several times recalled.

It will doubtless be conceded that Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," was the discordant note in the programme. Belonging to that class of picturesque concert overtures which Mendelssohn was the first to elaborate—it is his contribution to the enrichment of modern musical form—the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" is one of the weakest of all his works. Feeble in invention, patchy and disjointed in elaboration, coarse and trivial in instrumentation, it not only tells nothing of the story with which it is labelled, and thus falls in its avowed capacity of "programme music," but it offers very little for enjoyment as absolute music, as a piece of thinking in the language of tone. Mr. Nikisch played it with a minuteness and elaboration of detail that brought the composer's purpose as clearly to view as though there had been in it something to repay the effort.

Mr. Nikisch again revealed his great sympathy with Wagner, and his deep insight into his artistic nature, by the performance of the Vorspiel to "Lohengrin." Never before, it is safe to say, has so thrilling, so intensely emotional an interpretation of the master's music been vouchsafed in this city, as that. Formless as it is, according to the rules of musical grammar, the Lohengrin prelude yet has a form that gives perfect expression to its poetical content. Mr. Nikisch's conception was flawless in its adjustment of part to part, and the perfect balance of the whole, in the ethereal refinement of the first portion, the wonderfully wrought climax with its gorgeous wealth of instrumental color, and the return to the celestial beauty of the opening measures. Such a performance brings very near to the auditor Wagner's own interpretation of the prelude—the throng of angels descending to the earth in a flood of heavenly radiance with the holy grail that gave Lohengrin his supernatural power.

Beethoven's fourth symphony is that one of the nine which is probably least played, with perhaps the exception of the first. It is far from being in the master's deeper manner; indeed, it is overflowing with joyous good humor, and is filled with the humorous and grotesque touches, as well as with the violent contrasts and sudden changes of mood that Beethoven delighted in. All the points were [illegible] by Mr. Nikisch [illegible]

Times, Sunday, November 16, 1

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Musical criticism is undoubtedly the most inexact science in the world. Which assertion is easily translatable into another argument in support of the now familiar proposition that all music is subjective. However, this matter of subjectivity may be given fifty bars' rest, while we pursue the topic which suggested anew the fallibility of musical criticism. Standards of judgment vary. One man says that all music should be beautiful, but he does not know what "beautiful" is, and he shares this elementary ignorance with Thales, Heraclitus, Plato, Aristotle, Plotinus, Sir William Hamilton, Ruskin, Spencer, Voltaire, Diderot, Kant, Wieland, Vischer, Schopenhauer, and Oscar Wilde, all of whom tried to define the beautiful with conspicuous lack of success. Another man—and he, be it noted, is always a rabid Wagnerite—abides by the dictum of Jean Jacques Rousseau: "La tout est beau, parce que tout est vrai." Which assertion crumbles into absurdity in the presence of a brownstone front or a fugue by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley.

These remarks, wandering and irrelevant as they may appear, are the result of the recent performance of the "Eroica" symphony by the gentlemen of Boston under the guidance of Arthur Nikisch. There was a wide difference in the opinions expressed in regard to that performance. Some persons of excellent knowledge and desirable judgment felt that Mr. Nikisch had no right to disturb the traditions. The "Eroica" had always been played in a certain way, and no one should play it in another way. That way was supposed to be the correct one, or, in other words, simply the one which would have pleased Beethoven. No doubt, those who felt thus would have sympathized with Mendelssohn had they been present at that performance of the F major symphony of Beethoven, about which Wagner chats in his delightful volume on the conductor's art. He says:

"Now, the late Capellmeister Reissiger of Dresden once conducted this symphony there, and I happened to be present at the performance, together with Mendelssohn; we talked about the dilemma just described (the difficulty of making a certain passage intelligible when played at the customary tempo) and its proper solution; concerning which I told Mendelssohn that I believed I had convinced Reissiger, who had promised that he would take the tempo slower than usual. Mendelssohn perfectly agreed with me. We listened. The third movement began, and I was terrified on hearing precisely the old Ländler tempo; but before I could give vent to my annoyance Mendelssohn smiled, and pleasantly nodded his head, as if to say: 'Now it's all right! Bravo!' So my terror changed to astonishment. Reissiger, for reasons which I shall discuss presently, may not have been so very much to blame for persisting in the old tempo; but Mendelssohn's indifference with regard to this queer artistic contretemps raised doubts in my mind whether he saw any distinction and difference in the case at all. I fancied myself standing before an abyss of superficiality—a veritable void."

The root of the difference of opinion in regard to such a dramatic performance of the "Eroica" as that of Mr. Nikisch is a difference of opinion as to Beethoven's designs. There could be no lack of agreement to the assertion that any performance which violated those designs was wrong and indefensible. The great difficulty, however, seems to the writer to be a belief that the tempo is the most important element in the revelation of the composer's intention, and that one can read his soul in his metronome marks. Unfortunately, in the matter of Beethoven's symphonies the metronome marks cannot be trusted. The writer would like to quote (but that is impracticable) about four pages of Schindler's biography, but the reader who cares to look into this matter is referred to "The Life of Beethoven," edited by Ignace Moscheles and published in this country by the Ditsons. On pages 141–145 Schindler, whose biography of the master forms part of the work mentioned, discusses the subject of Beethoven's tempi.

After quoting Matheson's dictum that a movement must be taken a little more slowly by a large chorus or orchestra than by a small one, Schindler says that this fact is too frequently forgotten by conductors at the expense of intelligibility. "I have had frequent occasion to remark this neglect," he says, "occasioned by ignorance in the performance of Beethoven's works, and in those cases the effect was, of course, a true offspring of the cause, and exhibited a total misconception of the real spirit of the compositions. To perform Beethoven's compositions without regard to meaning and clearness is hunting to death the ideas of the immortal composer." Now, it appears that in the course of Beethoven's life he heard performances of his own works in which the tempi were taken wrong in spite of the admitted correctness of the metronome marks. In one case the master seriously thought of altering the title and the metronome mark of the allegretto of the seventh because it was played too fast. He admitted that the conductor had obeyed the metronomic sign, but declared that he had not intended that his symphonies should be performed by such large orchestras.

Now, the most important testimony on this topic left us by Schindler is as follows: "His own [Beethoven's] observations, coupled with accounts received from various places, describing the ineffective performance of the symphonies in consequence of mistaken ideas of their tempi, induced Beethoven in the Winter of 1825-6 to investigate the cause of the errors. This he did in my presence, and he ascertained that the metronomic signs in the printed scores were faulty in fixing the tempi too quick; and, indeed, he declared that many of these metronomic signs were not authorized by him. I may here mention that the symphonies, from No. 1 to No. 6 inclusive, were published before the invention of Maelzel's metronome; and it is only to the Seventh and Ninth Symphonies that the metronomic signs can, with positive certainty, be said to have been given by Beethoven. Whether or not he metronomed the Eighth Symphony (the score of which was only lately published) I cannot positively determine."

We have now three important facts: First, that Beethoven was annoyed by hearing his works generally played too fast; second, that his first six symphonies were not metronomed by him; and third, that he said the marks in them indicated tempi too quick. It seems to have been a general failing of conductors ever since to take some of Beethoven's tempi too fast, thus making that sacrifice of clearness and intelligibility of which Schindler justly complains. Now, there is no doubt whatever that Mr. Nikisch played the scherzo faster and the second part of the last movement slower than we are accustomed to hear them given. The scherzo is marked allegro vivace, and if the untrustworthy metronome mark is to be disregarded Mr. Nikisch's tempo was correct. Indeed, it was correct, even accepting the metronome mark; for no sane person in our day expects a conductor to time a movement to the fraction of a second. The metronome average pace. As for the poco andante of the finale, there can be little doubt that it was slower than tradition says it should be; but if Beethoven had a notion to change the title of the second movement of the seventh because it was played too fast and was generally troubled by too much speed in the performance of his works, is it not safe to assume that tradition may be mistaken in regard to this movement? One thing is certain, if there is any truth—and there surely is a good deal—in Wagner's theory that the tempo of music is plainly indicated by its character, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the poco andante was more than justified, for never before in our recollection has its eloquence seemed so impressive. Its majesty and breadth were overwhelming.

There was another feature of Mr. Nikisch's reading which must be considered, and that was the manner in which he brought to light certain melodic phrases in the intermediate voice parts. He lifted into prominence some utterances of the clarinets and horns which have never before been so effectively displayed. Hitherto they have been treated as portions of the ceaseless but subdued undercurrent, as parts of the harmonic foundations over which the melodies of other instruments were built. Mr. Nikisch's keen analytical study of the score, which enables him to carry a Beethoven symphony in his head, revealed to him the fact that some of these passages were not simple harmony, but melodious and eloquent bits of counterpoint. He promptly caused them to be given solo treatment by his players, and repressed other parts of the orchestra in order that they might stand clearly forth in all their beauty and significance. This disturbance of the traditional balance of the parts no doubt surprised and troubled some of Mr. Nikisch's hearers. But there can be no question that these readings were justifiable. It would be difficult to maintain the assumption that the greatest master of absolute music that ever lived put these melodic passages into the intermediate voice parts without knowing it. That would be to assert that Beethoven's was not a master mind. But if he put them there purposely he certainly intended that they should be treated as contrapuntal solo passages; he meant that they should be heard. When they were heard last Tuesday evening, their superb effect was recognized instantly.

In regard to certain novel nuances which were introduced, it would be difficult for any one to sustain objections to them on the ground of tradition. The most effective argument against these new ritardandi and accelerandi and unfamiliar accentuations is that they disturb the serenity of the classic atmosphere which is believed to surround Beethoven's works. But it is somewhat of an anomaly to hold that the tremendous emotional content of the great Ludwig's symphonics must be sacrificed to the symmetry of classic form. No one has advanced such a proposition; but it is practically offered by any one who objects to the development of romantic effects in passages where they obviously exist. It will not do for us to assume that Beethoven, in his third symphony, written as it was with deep dramatic feeling and purpose, desired to cling to the classic suavity of Mozart's style. The internal evidence is to the contrary, and it is possible to discern the hand that constructed the recitative of the basses in the ninth symphony. Mr. Nikisch's discovery of the possibilities of the passages emphasized by him is a credit to his musical feeling. We have no satisfactory record of Beethoven's intentions in regard to his readings. The best evidence in their favor is the heightened eloquence of the passages. In other words, we must fall back on the dictum of Hector Berlioz, that "whatever produces a good effect is good, as that whatever produces a bad one is bad; and that the authority of a hundred old men, even if they were each a hundred and twenty years of age, cannot make ugly that which is beautiful, nor beautiful that which is ugly."

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1890.

AMALIE NIKISCH.

The honor of having to bear a great name brings with it a no less great responsibility. It is bound to exert an influence all the more beneficial if the bearer of such a name seems called through the noblest qualities of mind and heart to show herself worthy of the latter in the fullest measure. It cannot be wondered at that the lady of whom we speak should excite uncommon interest a priori for her highly distinguished husband's sake. But it must also be remarked that we have here to do, not with an artist whose sun shines like a satellite with borrowed lustre, but much more with one to whom the tribute of unbounded admiration belongs on her own account.

Amalie Nikisch-Heussner comes of an esteemed patrician family of Cologne, and showed already in the tenderest age of childhood so pronounced a gift for music, that she overcame the usual aversion in noble families to an artistic career, so that finally they consented to her ardent wishes and allowed her to become a priestess of the beloved art. After she had completed her course with distinction in the Cologne Conservatory, then flourishing under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, the most brilliant engagements stood at her command at once. She made her first début in her dear Cologne, with a sensational success, as opera singer; and she resolved in the course of the following years to sing in three of the most eminent theatres of Germany—Leipsic, Berlin and Cassel. With such a combination of beauty, grace, sympathetic bloom and richest natural endowment, she soon became everywhere the pronounced favorite of the public. But only to such a nature could it be appointed to captivate a man, who, even in the spheres of deepest intellectual and social life, was accustomed to make no other demands upon womanhood than what he could see embodied in the countless "graces" fluttering about him. Arthur Nikisch became acquainted with her in Leipsic in the year 1882. He came, he saw, he loved! Seldom has a happier tie been joined.

If it be a loss to the stage, yet the talent of the excellent but unassuming artist does not lie altogether fallow; for not only is she to her husband a faithful and highly prized artistic adviser, but she has yielded to pressing invitations of the first concert societies to exercise her art as a singer, at least upon the platform of the concert hall occasionally. So it was in Europe and so it will be here.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 23, 1890.

SMETANA'S "VITAVA,"

With Another Novelty Heard at the Symphony Concerts Last Week.

Back from a triumphal tour Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony orchestra found an audience mildly demonstrative in its manner of reception, but undeniably appreciative for all that. Beethoven's first symphony headed the programme. The interpretation, particularly in the andante, minuet and allegro movements was artistic to a degree. But Mr. Nikisch is almost always exceptionally happy in his readings of the works of the great master. As a vivid bit of musical description the "Vitava" ranks easily among the most interesting works of the kind that have been presented to attention in the concert room. Here is nothing obscure or recondite; the veriest novice can readily follow this tone story, which sets forth with a wealth of orchestral effect the development of mighty river from mountain rill, and glories in its onward journey in ever increasing majesty.

Not a little of the charm of the work lies in the sweep of melody that is heard ever and again, with embellishments which brilliantly set it forth in varied, but always interesting ways. "Vitava" is only a part of a symphonic poem by this composer. If the other portions of Smetana's cyclus are at all worthy to be associated with this striking excerpt, let us hear Smetana's symphonic poem, "My Fatherland," in its completeness by all means.

This new work by the teacher of Dvorak, and one of the most famous of his country's composers, was played with admirable fervor and dash. It was a novelty here, and succeeded a novelty which was not altogether so welcome—a concerto for violincello and orchestra by Haydn, with a cadenza added by Reinecke.

Mr. Anton Hekking is known as one of the most finished artists in 'cello playing. The first movement of the concert certainly gave ample opportunities for the display of technical skill, as though Father Haydn himself did not provide variations enough, a long, intricate and tiresome cadenza has been added. As a memory test, Mr. Hekking's performance was undoubtedly remarkable; it would be difficult to better the way in which the almost endless succession of 'cello pyrotechnics was presented. But the Reinicke cadenza, nevertheless, might well have been omitted. It has no value as music, and the artist's abilities should have been taxed in a worthier way. The adagio and rondo movements are thoroughly characteristic of Haydn, and both came as a pleasant relief after the wearisome opening movement.

Perhaps the substitution of the "Oberon" overture in place of the Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens" may have had an unfavorable effect upon orchestra and conductor alike. At any rate, Weber's beautiful work was much less brilliant and striking in performance at the rehearsal than was expected. The opening seemed too slowly taken; the transition too abrupt; the effects presented too theatrically. From the Smetana novelty to Weber's familiar overture, there was a drop indeed—like one of the sudden collapses in the stock market, quite unaccountable, but equally undeniable.

Berlioz is represented on Mr. Nikisch's Thanksgiving-tide programme by his Fantastic symphony. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and Liszt's "Hungarian" rhapsody No. 2 are included in the eclectic offering.

——Mrs. Nikisch made an unqualified success at Providence Wednesday night, when her beautiful mezzo-soprano voice was heard for the first time in America, with the Symphony orchestra. She looked a picture of almost girlish freshness in a gown of rose-pink tulle, which color set off most becomingly her dark hair and eyes and fresh coloring. Her stage presence is very attractive, and altogether the wife of our accomplished leader has made a high place for herself among the vocalists of the season. Her first appearance before a home audience at Sanders Theatre, Dec. 4, is eagerly anticipated, and a very brilliant house, in which will be many of Mrs. Nikisch's personal friends, will accord her a very cordial greeting.

Lillian Russell in Concert Tonight.

That reigning favorite in opera, Lillian Russell, queen of "Poor Jonathan," at the New York Casino, is announced for her only appearance here in concert this season tonight. At the Music Hall popular she is to appear in conjunction with Knoll and Marie McNeil, the celebrated cornetists; Miss Edith Christie, violinist, and a grand orchestra. This will be the programme:

Overture, Beautiful Galatea.....Suppe
Orchestra.
Solo for cornet, Polka Brilliante.....Knoll
Miss McNeil.
Violin solo, Souvenir of Haydn.....Renard
Miss Christie.
Romanse from Mignon, Know'st Thou the Land?.....A. Thomas
Miss Lillian Russell.
Serenade for strings, Angels' Whisper.....Somerlatt
Orchestra.
Solo for cornet, Infianmatus.....Rossini
Mr. Knoll.
Waltz song from Poor Jonathan.....Millocker
Miss Lillian Russell.
Concert waltz, Autumn Roses.....Strauss
Orchestra.
Solos for violin { Cavatina.....Bohm / Mazurka.....Wieniawski
Miss Christie.
Duo for cornets, Air and variations.....Levy
Knoll and Marie McNeil.
Selection from Falka.....Chassaigne
Orchestra.

Mr. Carl Faelton will appear at the Kneisel quartet's concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening. The programme is: Quartet in C sharp minor, by Beethoven; fantasie in C major, for violin and piano, by Schubert, and quartet in G minor, for piano, violin, viola 'cello, by Brahms.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to sing Raff's "Dream King and His Love," and a group of German songs. The orchestra is to perform Schumann's first symphony, Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.

Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. CARL FAELTEN, Pianist.

II. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET, C sharp minor, op. 131.
Adagio ma non troppo, e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo, e molto cantabile.—
Presto.—Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

SCHUBERT. FANTASIE for PIANO and VIOLIN, in C minor.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET, in G minor, op. 25.
Allegro—G minor.
Intermezzo, allegro ma non troppo—C minor with Trio, animato—A flat major; and Coda, animato—C major.
Andante con moto—E flat major.
Rondo, Finale, alla Zingarese—G minor.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

The date of the Third Concert is December 29.

LILLIAN RUSSELL'S CONCERT.

The appearance of Lillian Russell at Music this evening will afford a much desired opportunity for hearing this favorite singer in a concert programme, this being her only appearance here this season. She is announced to sing the "Mignon" aria "Know'st the Land," and the waltz song from Millocker's "Poor Jonathan," called "Oh! Prima Donna," and will sing with orchestral accompaniment. The programme also introduces the cornet duet players Knoll and Miss McNeil; the violin soloist, Miss ... and will include among its orchestral numbers the overture "Beautiful Galatea," the serenade, "Angel's Whisper"; the ... waltz, "Autumn Roses," and other ... numbers.

... third of the season's concerts in ... Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston ... orchestra, the soloist will be Mrs. ..., and the programme will include Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Raff's song, "Loreley and Seal I. b"; Tschaikowsky's Andantino and scherzo from symphony ... F minor; songs with piano, and Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1.

The Kneisel quartet will be assisted by Mr. ..., pianist, at the concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening, the programme including the quartet in C sharp minor by ..., the fantasie in C major for violin and piano by Schubert, and the quartet in G minor for piano, violin, viola and 'cello by ...

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 23.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was somewhat dull. It opened with Beethoven's first symphony, the least interesting of his works of this class. Both reading and performance left nothing to be wished for, except perhaps a less startling energy in the drums in certain portions of the finale. A movement from a symphonic poem, "My Fatherland," by Smetana, and named after the river "Vltava" was given for the first time. It is melodious, flowing in effect, rich and brilliant in orchestration, and on the whole not uninteresting; but at best it is no more than respectable Kappelmeister-music. It afforded the strings an admirable opportunity for the display of their best qualities in respect to ... tone and clearness of technique, and was admirably played, making a pleasing if not an impressive effect. The whole ended with a brilliant interpretation and performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture. Nothing more finished and more perfect could be desired than was the rendering of the work from beginning to end. At the sudden fortissimo before the break into the allegro, the zealous vigor of the drum player was for once manifested with the best results. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, who played a violoncello concerto by Haydn, which was heard for the first time in Boston. It was worth the hearing as a novelty, a Haydn concerto of any description being seldom performed. Otherwise it would have been well to have left it in the obscurity from which it was taken. The opening movement has but few points of interest, and it was in nowise improved by the dreary, caterwauling and interminable cadenza provided for it by Carl Reinecke; a cadenza almost criminally out of keeping with the work into which it was so tastelessly obtruded, to say nothing of the fact that it was as long, if not longer, than the whole solo portion of the movement. The adagio has a lovely melody in the composer's most characteristic vein; the finale is a quaintly, old-fashioned rondo, pretty in its themes, graceful in effect, and naive in its simplicity. Mr. Hekking's performance, taken altogether, was not up to its best standard. His intonation was frequently painful in its inaccuracy, and he played in a heavy and labored style, quite out of sympathy with the music he was interpreting, which required lighter and more graceful treatment than he accorded it. He was at his best in the slow movement, which was given with exquisite delicacy and purity of tone. But on the whole the performance was not worthy of him. Nevertheless, he was rapturously applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be ... Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 2, and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." There will be no soloist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties at the Symphony concert Saturday evening—Haydn's concerto in D for 'cello, performed by Mr. Hekking, and a symphonic poem, "Vltava," by Smetana. They were interesting as such, the latter, however, proving pleasing and melodious. The finest thing of the evening was the reading of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, and the closing number, the familiar "Oberon" overture, was a rendition characteristic of the orchestra. The symphony was given first, and properly so, and, all in all, the programme was well arranged and proportionately agreeable. Mr. Hekking was the soloist, and, while he is a competent artist, and the work which he gave had never been heard in Boston, it served more as an illustration of his ability to conquer technical difficulties than a performance of artistic merit. This was especially the case in the cadenza which was not written by Haydn, and was entirely out of place and out of harmony with the rest of the work. It was long and dull, and it is hard to see why such exhibitions of pyrotechnics should be countenanced or encouraged in an instrumental performer any more than in the selections which are usually considered appropriate by a vocalist in the concerts with this orchestra. Something of a higher order than is given on the ordinary concert platform has been chosen, in nearly every case, by the vocal artists engaged in this course. It ought to be so in instrumental selections. There is to be no soloist at the next concert.

The attraction at Music Hall last evening was Miss Lillian Russell. There were other performers, but the audience appeared interested only in the fair prima donna, who looked and acted charmingly. Her singing was more appropriate to the operatic than the concert stage; in fact, she substituted a number from the "Grand Duchess" for the piece announced on the programme, and could not refrain from acting as well as singing her numbers. It pleased the audience, but it can hardly be commended in a Sunday evening concert. She was encored every time she sang, and there was present one of the largest audiences of the season.

At the Kneisel concert this evening the quartette is to be assisted by Carl Faelten, and a choice programme is assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, NOV. 24, 1890.

Fair Lillian at Music Hall.

The sixth in the series of Music Hall "Sunday populars" had for chief attraction Miss Lillian Russell. Her appearance was the signal for loud applause and the fair songstress was forced to bow her acknowledgments many times before the storm of hand-clapping subsided.

"Know'st thou the land," from "Mignon," was her first number. This she sang with all her old-time spirit and expression. An encore was of course demanded.

Miss Russell fairly captivated the audience and made many hearts throb by her exquisite interpretation of the natty song: "Oh! We Hapless Prima Donna," from "Poor Jonathan." The audience could not get half enough of her singing, and although she was in an extremely happy and obliging mood she was fairly tired out before they would allow her to withdraw.

But Miss Russell was not the only one who contributed pleasing numbers to the evening's entertainment. Mr. Knöll and Miss Marie McNeil, two popular cornetists, were welcomed again, and their solos and duets received cordial appreciation. Miss Edith Christie's violin playing proved very enjoyable, and the several selections by the orchestra were deserving of praise.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Lillian Russell's Concert a Success at Music Hall.

The concert announced at Music Hall last evening, with Lillian Russell as the star attraction, was a great success, and this gifted vocalist has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. She was in grand voice, and her charming stage presence added not a little to the enjoyment of her audience. She was heard in the brilliant waltz song from "Poor Jonathan," as well as the "Say to Him" from the "Grand Duchess," a ballad "Answer," by Robyne, and an Offenbach chanson.

It is difficult to recall a more satisfying concert singer of the day than Miss Russell, as she unites in her varied gifts a bright, true, fresh voice, skilfully trained in an admirable method, and her rare musical instincts show at all times in her artistic phrasing and delivery of anything she sings. She delighted the immense audience in attendance, and was given no cause for doubt as to the impression gained by her hearers of her abilities.

Miss Russell was supported by an orchestra under the direction of William Reitzel, and the programme was made interesting, aside from her numbers, by the excellent playing of its members in some well chosen selections, as well as by the violin solos contributed by Miss Edith Christie and the cornet solos and duets played by A. H. Knoll and Miss Marie McNeil. Next Sunday's concert will be by the Strauss orchestra, and two weeks from last evening the Campanini-Del Puente concert company appear.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello in D.....Haydn
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphonic Poem—"Vltava".....Smetana
(First time in Boston.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Certain writers upon music have been vexed by the simplicity of Beethoven's first symphony and have rejected it as unworthy of Beethoven and a concert audience; although they have spoken of "innovations," as the character of the Introduction, the Minuet, and the use of clarinets throughout the symphony. As far as the clarinets are concerned, Mozart had employed them in all the movements of the E flat major symphony of 1788, and had introduced them in two of the three movements of the symphony written for the "Concert spirituel" of Paris in 1778. And nearly thirty years before this latter date Rameau had used them in a "pastorale héroïque" composed in honor of the birth of the Duke of Bourgogne, where, by the way, cannon in the score appear to be fired upon the first beat of the measure.

So, too, directors of orchestras have not been contented with the symphony as it is written, and they have tried by forced readings to modernize it; for projects for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers are not confined to the grand academy of Lagado. And yet the symphony will always remain a charming work with trivial passages, not to be compared as a whole with the three great symphonies of Mozart or the latter symphonies of Haydn. It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Nikisch led it in a straightforward, honest manner, without caprice or affectation.

Friedrich Smetana wrote operas with texts in the Bohemian language for the National Theatre of Prague; symphonic poems, overtures and other orchestral pieces such as a "Solemn March" for the 300th anniversary of the birth of Shakspere; chamber music of which the string quartette in E minor is a favorable example, and music for the pianoforte. The extract from the Symphonic Poem, "My Fatherland," which was played Saturday evening, is called "Vltava" (the Moldau). Each section of the Symphonic Poem has a "dedication" written by the composer. The one prefixed to "Vltava" describes the rise and course of a river. It flows through forests filled with hunters, and, passing through meadows, encounters weddings and "sylvan and water nymphs who disport themselves by moonshine on its glistening waters, in which are mirrored towers and castles as witnesses of the departed glory of chivalry and martial fame." The stream "rolls majestically to Prague, and disappears in the distance from the composer's vision." Smetana's purpose, then, was to happily combine topography and music, to present the hearer with a "Musical Treatise Upon Bohemian Irrigation." To do this, and at the same time introduce at proper intervals hunters and sylvan nymphs, would have irked a genius. Smetana was only a man of talent who wrote respectable music and taught Dvorak. The Symphonic Poem opens in a charming manner, and the themes which are brought in seem to be Bohemian folk songs; but as the musical river rolls on it becomes turbid. Still, the "poem" is a pleasant work if not a great one, and it was a welcome relief to the concerto which preceded it.

For the violoncello concerto of Haydn is as a whole a composition of remarkable dulness, and this dulness is aggravated by the dreary, long-winded, unmusical cadenza written by Carl Reinecke. When Haydn was in the service of Prince Esterhazy, he met such 'cello players as Weigl, Marteau, and the celebrated Kraft. It is supposed that the concerto played by Mr. Hekking was composed for Kraft—yet it is hard to see how even the latter player could have made the concerto endurable. With the exception of the middle movement and a few passages in the finale, it has but little of the peculiar charm of Haydn. Mr. Hekking's performance was a disappointment and unworthy of his abilities. His intonation was often distressingly false, his tone, except in the second movement, was hard and dry, and he played as though he had set out to accomplish an uncongenial task. He was loudly applauded.

The "Oberon" overture is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch, and as played by the orchestra under his direction it is a never failing delight. Throughout the evening, although the programme itself was uninteresting, the playing of the orchestra was excellent. There were, it is true, occasional exhibitions of undue muscular exertion on the part of the kettledrum man, who has not by his playing given any adequate reason for his importation. Nor can the first clarinet be praised for his phrasing of the solo in the overture.

The programme for next Saturday is made up of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture: Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2"; and the "Symphonie Fantastique," by Hector Berlioz."

PHILIP HALE.

.....

Miss Lillian Russell of the New York Casino company sang at Music Hall last evening to an audience which packed the hall. She sang the Romance from "Mignon" and a delightful waltz song from Millocker's "Poor Jonathan." She was applauded to the echo, and not without reason, for each year Miss Russell shows a steady advance in her work. She is today a pleasing singer, and, what is more, a musical singer—a rarity upon stages devoted to operettas. The other numbers of the programme were performed by Miss Christie, the violinist; Miss McNeil and Mr. Knoll, who have evidently devoted many hours to that aggressive instrument, the cornet; and a selected orchestra which, by the way, played very well.

.....

The second of the series of concerts given this season by the Kneisel Quartette takes place this evening at Union Hall at 8 o'clock. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

[47]

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.

Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, 2d Violin.

Mr. [illegible] KNEISEL, Viola.

Mr. [illegible] ALWIN HEINDL, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. [illegible]

II. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24TH, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET, C sharp minor, op. 131.
Adagio ma non troppo, e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo, e molto cantabile.—
Presto.—Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

SCHUBERT. FANTASIE for PIANO and VIOLIN, in C minor.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET, in G minor, op. 25.
Allegro—G minor.
Intermezzo, allegro ma non troppo—C minor with Trio, animato—A flat major; and Coda, animato—C major.
Andante con moto—E flat major.
Rondo. Finale, alla Zingarese—G minor.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

The date of the Third Concert is December 29.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 23, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the sixth of the season's Symphony concerts in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, the programme consisted of Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, in C major, Haydn's concerto for violoncello, Smetana's Symphonic poem, "Vltava," and Weber's overture, "Oberon," the soloist being Mr. Anton Hekking. The choice of the evening's soloist was in keeping with the apparent policy of giving a hearing to the leading players of the several departments of the band each season, however much or little such appearances may add to the general interest of the scheme of programmes. Mr. Hekking is a most accomplished member of the orchestra, a thoroughly reliable musician, and eminently qualified for his usual duties as a solo player; but in comparison with 'cello soloists heard at these concerts in former years, he does not appear to the best advantage, his tone, though large, true and pure, being dry and unsympathetic. He would have saved the audience a hearing of a wearisome exhibition of the technical possibilities of the instrument and his own attainments in their mastery by the omission of the opening movement, during which he labored heroically and gained the applause of those who revel in such exhibitions. The adagio was less unsatisfactory, and in the rondo the player appeared to really good advantage, comparatively, the lovely theme and its variations being interpreted with much skill.

Mr. Nikisch gave a delightful interpretation of the first of the Beethoven symphonies, heightening its contrasts with fine artistic taste and reading the several movements with admirable results. The novelty presented in the Smetana poem made a most entertaining addition to the season's repertoire, the composition being an illustration in the line of programme music which made it possible for imaginative minds to see the two springs which take their course in a shady Bohemian forest, one warm and sparkling, the other cool and tranquil. Their waters, running gayly through stone and pebble, uniting together and glittering in the morning sun, to become the river Vltava, which pursues its course through the fields of Bohemia, and grows into a mighty river, flowing through thick rests wherein the joyous cries of a hunt and the clangling sound of the horn seem to approach the listener; and all the other tone pictures its composer intended it to contain. It is a gorgeous piece of orchestral scoring, whatever it means, and its hearing was a source of great pleasure. The "Oberon" overture had a fine performance to end the programme, which, as a whole, gained liberal applause from the evening's audience.

Mr. Nikisch has planned the following programme for next Saturday evening: Weber's overture, "Euryanthe"; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

LILLIAN RUSSELL'S CONCERT.

The appearance of Lillian Russell at Music Hall this evening will afford a much desired opportunity for hearing this favorite singer in a concert programme, this being her only appearance here this season. She is announced to sing the "Mignon" aria "Know'st Thou the Land," and the waltz song from Millocker's "Poor Jonathan," called "Oh! We Hapless Prime Donne," and will sing with orchestral accompaniment. The programme also introduces the cornet duet players Knoll and Marie McNeil; the violin soloist, Miss Christie, and will include among its orchestral numbers the overture "Beautiful Galatea," the serenade, "Angel's Whisper"; the Strauss waltz, "Autumn Roses," and other popular numbers.

At the third of the season's concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, and the programme will include Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Rauff's song, "Traumkonig und Sein Lieb"; Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano, and Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1.

The Kneisel quartet will be assisted by Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, at the concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening, the programme including the quartet in G sharp minor by Beethoven, the fantasie in C major for violin and piano by Schubert, and the quartet in G minor for piano, violin, viola and 'cello by Brahms.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 23.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was somewhat dull. It opened with Beethoven's first symphony, the least interesting of his works of this class. Both reading and performance left nothing to be wished for, except perhaps a less startling energy in the drums in certain portions of the finale. A movement from a symphonic poem, "My Fatherland," by Smetana, and named after the river "Vltava" was given for the first time. It is melodious, flowing in effect, rich and brilliant in orchestration, and on the whole not uninteresting; but at best it is no more than respectable Kappelmeister-music. It afforded the strings an admirable opportunity for the display of their best qualities in respect to volume of tone and clearness of technique, and was admirably played, making a pleasing if not an impressive effect. The whole ended with a brilliant interpretation and performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture. Nothing more finished and more perfect could be desired than was the rendering of the work from beginning to end. At the sudden fortissimo before the break into the allegro, the zealous vigor of the drum player was for once manifested with the best results. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, who played a violoncello concerto by Haydn, which was heard for the first time in Boston. It was worth the hearing as a novelty, a Haydn concerto of any description being seldom performed. Otherwise it would have been well to have left it in the obscurity from which it was taken. The opening movement has but few points of interest, and it was in nowise improved by the dreary, caterwauling and interminable cadenza provided for it by Carl Reinecke; a cadenza almost criminally out of keeping with the work into which it was so tastelessly obtruded, to say nothing of the fact that it was as long, if not longer, than the whole solo portion of the movement. The adagio has a lovely melody in the composer's most characteristic vein; the finale is a quaintly, old-fashioned rondo, pretty in its themes, graceful in effect, and naive in its simplicity. Mr. Hekking's performance, taken altogether, was not up to his best standard. His intonation was frequently painful in its inaccuracy, and he played in a heavy and labored style, quite out of sympathy with the music he was interpreting, which required lighter and more graceful treatment than he accorded it. He was at his best in the slow movement, which was given with exquisite delicacy and purity of taste. But on the whole the performance was not worthy of him. Nevertheless, he was rapturously applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be given Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 2, and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." There will be no soloist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties at the Symphony concert Saturday evening—Haydn's concerto in D for 'cello, performed by Mr. Hekking, and a symphonic poem, "Vltava," by Smetana. They were interesting as such, the latter, however, proving pleasing and melodious. The finest thing of the evening was the reading of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, and the closing number, the familiar "Oberon" overture, was a rendition characteristic of the orchestra. The symphony was given first, and properly so, and, all in all, the programme was well arranged and proportionately agreeable. Mr. Hekking was the soloist, and, while he is a competent artist, and the work which he gave had never been heard in Boston, it served more as an illustration of his ability to conquer technical difficulties than a performance of artistic merit. This was especially the case in the cadenza which was not written by Haydn, and was entirely out of place and out of harmony with the rest of the work. It was long and dull, and it is hard to see why such exhibitions of pyrotechnics should be countenanced or encouraged in an instrumental performer any more than in the selections which are usually considered appropriate by a vocalist in the concerts with this orchestra. Something of a higher order than is given on the ordinary concert platform has been chosen, in nearly every case, by the vocal artists engaged in this course. It ought to be so in instrumental selections. There is to be no soloist at the next concert.

The attraction at Music Hall last evening was Miss Lillian Russell. There were other performers, but the audience appeared interested only in the fair prima donna, who looked and acted charmingly. Her singing was more appropriate to the operatic than the concert stage; in fact, she substituted a number from the "Grand Duchess" for the piece announced on the programme, and could not refrain from acting as well as singing her numbers. It pleased the audience, but it can hardly be commended in a Sunday evening concert. She was encored every time she sang, and there was present one of the largest audiences of the season.

At the Kneisel concert this evening the quartette is to be assisted by Carl Faelten, and a choice programme is assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, NOV. 24, 1890.

Fair Lillian at Music Hall.

The sixth in the series of Music Hall "Sunday populars" had for chief attraction Miss Lillian Russell. Her appearance was the signal for loud applause and the fair songstress was forced to bow her acknowledgments many times before the storm of hand-clapping subsided.

"Know'st thou the land," from "Mignon," was her first number. This she sang with all her old-time spirit and expression. An encore was of course demanded.

Miss Russell fairly captivated the audience and made many hearts throb by her exquisite interpretation of the natty song: "Oh! We Hapless Prima Donna," from "Poor Jonathan." The audience could not get half enough of her singing, and although she was in an extremely happy and obliging mood she was fairly tired out before they would allow her to withdraw.

But Miss Russell was not the only one who contributed pleasing numbers to the evening's entertainment. Mr. Knöll and Miss Marie McNeil, two popular cornetists, were welcomed again, and their solos and duets received cordial appreciation. Miss Edith Christie's violin playing proved very enjoyable, and the several selections by the orchestra were deserving of praise.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Lillian Russell's Concert a Success at Music Hall.

The concert announced at Music Hall last evening, with Lillian Russell as the star attraction, was a great success, and this gifted vocalist has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. She was in grand voice, and her charming stage presence added not a little to the enjoyment of her audience. She was heard in the brilliant waltz song from "Poor Jonathan," as well as the "Say to Him" from the "Grand Duchess," a ballad "Answer," by Robyne, and an Offenbach chanson.

It is difficult to recall a more satisfying concert singer of the day than Miss Russell, as she unites in her varied gifts a bright, true, fresh voice, skilfully trained in an admirable method, and her rare musical instincts show at all times in her artistic phrasing and delivery of anything she sings. She delighted the immense audience in attendance, and was given no cause for doubt as to the impression gained by her hearers of her abilities.

Miss Russell was supported by an orchestra under the direction of William Reitzel, and the programme was made interesting, aside from her numbers, by the excellent playing of its members in some well chosen selections, as well as by the violin solos contributed by Miss Edith Christie and the cornet solos and duets played by A. H. Knoll and Miss Marie McNeil. Next Sunday's concert will be by the Strauss orchestra, and two weeks from last evening the Campanini-Del Puente concert company appear.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello in D.....Haydn
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphonic Poem—"Vltava".....Smetana
(First time in Boston.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Certain writers upon music have been vexed by the simplicity of Beethoven's first symphony and have rejected it as unworthy of Beethoven and a concert audience; although they have spoken of "innovations," as the character of the Introduction, the Minuet, and the use of clarinets throughout the symphony. As far as the clarinets are concerned, Mozart had employed them in all the movements of the E flat major symphony of 1788, and had introduced them in two of the three movements of the symphony written for the "Concert spirituel" of Paris in 1778. And nearly thirty years before this latter date Rameau had used them in a "pastorale héroïque" composed in honor of the birth of the Duke of Bourgogne, where, by the way, cannon in the score appear to be fired upon the first beat of the measure.

So, too, directors of orchestras have not been contented with the symphony as it is written, and they have tried by forced readings to modernize it; for projects for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers are not confined to the grand academy of Lagado. And yet the symphony will always remain a charming work with trivial passages, not to be compared as a whole with the three great symphonies of Mozart or the latter symphonies of Haydn. It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Nikisch led it in a straightforward, honest manner, without caprice or affectation.

Friedrich Smetana wrote operas with texts in the Bohemian language for the National Theatre of Prague; symphonic poems, overtures and other orchestral pieces such as a "Solemn March" for the 300th anniversary of the birth of Shakspere; chamber music of which the string quartette in E minor is a favorable example, and music for the pianoforte. The extract from the Symphonic Poem, "My Fatherland," which was played Saturday evening, is called "Vltava" (the Moldau). Each section of the Symphonic Poem has a "dedication" written by the composer. The one prefixed to "Vltava" describes the rise and course of a river. It flows through forests filled with hunters, and, passing through meadows, encounters weddings and "sylvan and water nymphs who disport themselves by moonshine on its glistening waters, in which are mirrored towers and castles as witnesses of the departed glory of chivalry and martial fame." The stream "rolls majestically to Prague, and disappears in the distance from the composer's vision." Smetana's purpose, then, was to happily combine topography and music, to present the hearer with a "Musical Treatise Upon Bohemian Irrigation." To do this, and at the same time introduce at proper intervals hunters and sylvan nymphs, would have irked a genius. Smetana was only a man of talent who wrote respectable music and taught Dvorak. The Symphonic Poem opens in a charming manner, and the themes which are brought in seem to be Bohemian folk songs; but as the musical river rolls on it becomes turbid. Still, the "poem" is a pleasant work if not a great one, and it was a welcome relief to the concerto which preceded it.

For the violoncello concerto of Haydn is as a whole a composition of remarkable dulness, and this dulness is aggravated by the dreary, long-winded, unmusical cadenza written by Carl Reinecke. When Haydn was in the service of Prince Esterhazy, he met such 'cello players as Weigl, Marteau, and the celebrated Kraft. It is supposed that the concerto played by Mr. Hekking was composed for Kraft—yet it is hard to see how even the latter player could have made the concerto endurable. With the exception of the middle movement and a few passages in the finale, it has but little of the peculiar charm of Haydn. Mr. Hekking's performance was a disappointment and unworthy of his abilities. His intonation was often distressingly false, his tone, except in the second movement, was hard and dry, and he played as though he had set out to accomplish an uncongenial task. He was loudly applauded.

The "Oberon" overture is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch, and as played by the orchestra under his direction it is a never failing delight. Throughout the evening, although the programme itself was uninteresting, the playing of the orchestra was excellent. There were, it is true, occasional exhibitions of undue muscular exertion on the part of the kettledrum man, who has not by his playing given any adequate reason for his importation. Nor can the first clarinet be praised for his phrasing of the solo in the overture.

The programme for next Saturday is made up of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture: Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2"; and the "Symphonie Fantastique," by Hector Berlioz."

PHILIP HALE.

.....

Miss Lillian Russell of the New York Casino company sang at Music Hall last evening to an audience which packed the hall. She sang the Romance from "Mignon" and a delightful waltz song from Millocker's "Poor Jonathan." She was applauded to the echo, and not without reason, for each year Miss Russell shows a steady advance in her work. She is today a pleasing singer, and, what is more, a musical singer—a rarity upon stages devoted to operettas. The other numbers of the programme were performed by Miss Christie, the violinist; Miss McNeil and Mr. Knoll, who have evidently devoted many hours to that aggressive instrument, the cornet; and a selected orchestra which, by the way, played very well.

.....

The second of the series of concerts given this season by the Kneisel Quartette takes place this evening at Union Hall at 8 o'clock. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

.....

[47]

The last quartets of Beethoven were written in 1825, less than two years before his death, when, as has been so reverently said, "A mighty seriousness overpowers him. The desolate honors that surround him endow him, with the power to understand more clearly the higher tasks of the mind in which his art had a living part." Comparing the four quartets, and explaining that through Beethoven's "inexhaustable fancy" the number of movements is increased, Nohl says, "these movements are in fact only transitions to and connecting links between two colossal movements. They increase the usual number, although frequently nothing more than short sentences, and at times only a few measures." Again we find in Nohl this reference to the C sharp minor quartet; " 'with a look beaming with light, dripping with sorrow and joy' young Dr. Rollett saw him in beautiful Baden, and indeed this work, which he himself called 'greatest' of his quartets, discloses to us in a manner different from the Ninth Symphony, the meaning of his own life, where he himself, as Richard Wagner has said, displayed to us a wild melody of pleasure and pain."

Nottebohm, a connoisseur in Bach and Beethoven literature, whose best remembered work is connected with the Beethoven sketch-books, in illustrating Beethoven's method and his enormous patience, says: "of the care and almost fastidious trouble which he took with the closing bars of a piece, we have a most extraordinary instance in the quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131; the last four bars of the variation movement were attempted in ever so many ways." and of these Nottebohm cites more than a dozen. "The Quartet in C sharp minor (No. 4 of the so-called "Posthumous") commences with a grave fugue in slow time (Adagio ma non troppo). When this is fully worked out we have an episode, in another key, with the theme given by "diminution." Further on, (not to refer to other details), the theme appears, in the lower voice, by "augmentation." The next movement (Allegro molto vivace) is chiefly made out of a melodious theme built upon a tonic pedal. The theme is followed by a brief Allegro moderato which leads to an andante, ma non troppo. This movement, the longest in the quartet, is an air with variations, developed in the recherché, ingenious, and elaborate style, of which several remarkable examples are to be found in Beethoven's later compositions. Now succeeds a kind of scherzo (presto) having a piquant and animated theme. The finale (allegro) which is preceded by a brief and mysterious adagio, is constructed upon a vigorous and characteristic subject.

(Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

The following rests on the authority of Carl Holz, whose reminiscences of Beethoven were made the subject of articles by Ludwig Nohl and others, a few years since. (Holtz, it should be added, was a young government employee in the Austrian capital, who endeared himself to Beethoven in the last year of his life by his personal attention and devotion, and by his skill as a violin player, and member of the Schuppanzigh party in which he was one of the exponents of the last quartets): Schubert was very desirous of hearing Beethoven's C sharp minor quartet (op. 131), which was composed a year before Beethoven's death. The three amateur members of the quartet party, Holz, Carl Gross, and Baron König, were willing to play it to him, but the fourth, Doleschalek, a professional musician, objected. When at length it was played, Schubert was thrown into such a state of enthusiasm and excitement that they were quite frightened about him. The C sharp minor quartet was the last music that he heard!

The G minor quartet, as well as its companion, the Piano Quartet in A, (op. 26), was written in 1863, the year after its composer's removal to Vienna. Dr. Deiter's biographical sketch of Brahms, contains some remarks upon the Quartet in G minor which will be read with interest. The author observes: "The first in G minor (op. 25) shows once more, in the first movement, what might be termed a redundance of melodic contents and a wonderful skill in thematic development, but the climax of melodic charm is reached in the Intermezzo and Trio. We frequently hear Brahms, with whom thought and fancy ever worked together in active unison, accused of being obscure; Such an accusation can only come from those who are ignorant of such works as this Quartet, above all of its middle movements. Who would not be captivated by the genial Rondo alla Zingarese, with its gay and daring three-bar rhythm? No commonplace mind would have invented that. Here we recognize the master, who, having drawn from the very fountain-head of national melody, gives it back to the world in all its original purity. In this, and the following works, the variation no longer serves as a slow movement but is exchanged for an adagio formed on a melody in the style of a Lied." (First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello in D.....Haydn
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphonic Poem—"Vltava".....Smetana
(First time in Boston.)
Overture—"Oberon".....Weber

Certain writers upon music have been vexed by the simplicity of Beethoven's first symphony and have rejected it as unworthy of Beethoven and a concert audience; although they have spoken of "innovations," as the character of the Introduction, the Minuet, and the use of clarinets throughout the symphony. As far as the clarinets are concerned, Mozart had employed them in all the movements of the E flat major symphony of 1788, and had introduced them in two of the three movements of the symphony written for the "Concert spirituel" of Paris in 1778. And nearly thirty years before this latter date Rameau had used them in a "pastorale héroïque" composed in honor of the birth of the Duke of Bourgogne, where, by the way, cannon in the score appear to be fired upon the first beat of the measure.

So, too, directors of orchestras have not been contented with the symphony as it is written, and they have tried by forced readings to modernize it; for projects for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers are not confined to the grand academy of Lagado. And yet the symphony will always remain a charming work with trivial passages, not to be compared as a whole with the three great symphonies of Mozart or the latter symphonies of Haydn. It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Nikisch led it in a straightforward, honest manner, without caprice or affectation.

Friedrich Smetana wrote operas with texts in the Bohemian language for the National Theatre of Prague; symphonic poems, overtures and other orchestral pieces such as a "Solemn March" for the 300th anniversary of the birth of Shakspere; chamber music of which the string quartette in E minor is a favorable example, and music for the pianoforte. The extract from the Symphonic Poem, "My Fatherland," which was played Saturday evening, is called "Vltava" (the Moldau). Each section of the Symphonic Poem has a "dedication" written by the composer. The one prefixed to "Vltava" describes the rise and course of a river. It flows through forests filled with hunters, and, passing through meadows, encounters weddings and "sylvan and water nymphs who disport themselves by moonshine on its glistening waters, in which are mirrored towers and castles as witnesses of the departed glory of chivalry and martial fame." The stream "rolls majestically to Prague, and disappears in the distance from the composer's vision." Smetana's purpose, then, was to happily combine topography and music to present the hearer with a "Musical Treatise Upon Bohemian Irrigation." To do this, and at the same time introduce at proper intervals hunters and sylvan nymphs, would have irked a genius. Smetana was only a man of talent who wrote respectable music and taught Dvorak. The Symphonic Poem opens in a charming manner, and the themes which are brought in seem to be Bohemian folk songs; but as the musical river rolls on it becomes turbid. Still, the "poem" is a pleasant work if not a great one, and it was a welcome relief to the concerto which preceded it.

For the violoncello concerto of Haydn is as a whole a composition of remarkable dulness, and this dulness is aggravated by the dreary, long-winded, unmusical cadenza written by Carl Reinecke. When Haydn was in the service of Prince Esterhazy, he met such 'cello players as Weigl, Marteau, and the celebrated Kraft. It is supposed that the concerto played by Mr. Hekking was composed for Kraft—yet it is hard to see how even the latter player could have made the concerto endurable. With the exception of the middle movement and a few passages in the finale, it has but little of the peculiar charm of Haydn. Mr. Hekking's performance was a disappointment and unworthy of his abilities. His intonation was often distressingly false, his tone, except in the second movement, was hard and dry, and he played as though he had set out to accomplish an uncongenial task. He was loudly applauded.

The "Oberon" overture is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch, and as played by the orchestra under his direction it is a never failing delight. Throughout the evening, although the programme itself was uninteresting, the playing of the orchestra was excellent. There were, it is true, occasional exhibitions of undue muscular exertion on the part of the kettledrum man, who has not by his playing given any adequate reason for his importation. Nor can the first clarinet be praised for his phrasing of the solo in the overture.

The programme for next Saturday is made up of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture: Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2"; and the "Symphonie Fantastique," by Hector Berlioz."

PHILIP HALE.

.....

Miss Lillian Russell of the New York Casino company sang at Music Hall last evening to an audience which packed the hall. She sang the Romance from "Mignon" and a delightful waltz song from Millocker's "Poor Jonathan." She was applauded to the echo, and not without reason, for each year Miss Russell shows a steady advance in her work. She is today a pleasing singer, and, what is more, a musical singer—a rarity upon stages devoted to operettas. The other numbers of the programme were performed by Miss Christie, the violinist; Miss McNeil and Mr. Knoll, who have evidently devoted many hours to that aggressive instrument, the cornet; and a selected orchestra which, by the way, played very well.

.....

The second of the series of concerts given this season by the Kneisel Quartette takes place this evening at Union Hall at 8 o'clock. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

...ssisted by Mrs. ... and the programme will include Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea ... Voyage"; ...aff's song, "Frühlingsnacht und Sein Lieb"; Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano, and Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1.

The Kneisel quartet will be assisted by Mr. ... pianist, at the concert in Union ... tomorrow evening, the programme including the quartet in G sharp minor by ... the fantaisie in C major for violin ... by Schubert, and the quartet in G ... for piano, violin, viola and 'cello by ...

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 23.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was somewhat dull. It opened with Beethoven's first symphony, the least interesting of his works of this class. Both reading and performance left nothing to be wished for, except perhaps a less startling energy in the drums in certain portions of the finale. A movement from a symphonic poem, "My Fatherland," by Smetana, and named after the river "Vltava" was given for the first time. It is melodious, flowing in effect, rich and brilliant in orchestration, and on the whole not uninteresting; but at best it is no more than respectable Kappelmeister-music. It afforded the strings an admirable opportunity for the display of their best qualities in respect to volume of tone and clearness of technique, and was admirably played, making a pleasing if not an impressive effect. The whole ended with a brilliant interpretation and performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture. Nothing more finished and more perfect could be desired than was the rendering of the work from beginning to end. At the sudden fortissimo before the break into the allegro, the zealous vigor of the drum player was for once manifested with the best results. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, who played a violoncello concerto by Haydn, which was heard for the first time in Boston. It was worth the hearing as a novelty, a Haydn concerto of any description being a seldom performed. Otherwise it would have been well to have left it in the obscurity from which it was taken. The opening movement has but few points of interest, and it was in nowise improved by the dreary, caterwauling and interminable cadenza provided for it by Carl Reinecke; a cadenza almost criminally out of keeping with the work into which it was so tastelessly obtruded, to say nothing of the fact that it was as long, if not longer, than the whole solo portion of the movement. The adagio has a lovely melody in the composer's most characteristic vein; the finale is a quaintly, old-fashioned rondo, pretty in its themes, graceful in effect, and naive in its simplicity. Mr. Hekking's performance, taken altogether, was not up to his best standard. His intonation was frequently painful in its inaccuracy, and he played in a heavy and labored style, quite out of sympathy with the music he was interpreting, which required lighter and more graceful treatment than he accorded it. He was at his best in the slow movement, which was given with exquisite delicacy and purity of tone. But on the whole the performance was not worthy of him. Nevertheless, he was rapturously applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be given Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 2, and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." There will be no soloist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties at the Symphony concert Saturday evening—Haydn's concerto in D for 'cello, performed by Mr. Hekking, and a symphonic poem, "Vltava," by Smetana. They were interesting as such, the latter, however, proving pleasing and melodious. The finest thing of the evening was the reading of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, and the closing number, the familiar "Oberon" overture, was a rendition characteristic of the orchestra. The symphony was given first, and properly so, and, all in all, the programme was well arranged and proportionately agreeable. Mr. Hekking was the soloist, and, while he is a competent artist, and the work which he gave had never been heard in Boston, it served more as an illustration of his ability to conquer technical difficulties than a performance of artistic merit. This was especially the case in the cadenza which was not written by Haydn, and was entirely out of place and out of harmony with the rest of the work. It was long and dull, and it is hard to see why such exhibitions of pyrotechnics should be countenanced or encouraged in an instrumental performer any more than in the selections which are usually considered appropriate by a vocalist in the concerts with this orchestra. Something of a higher order than is given on the ordinary concert platform has been chosen, in nearly every case, by the vocal artists engaged in this course. It ought to be so in instrumental selections. There is to be no soloist at the next concert.

The attraction at Music Hall last evening was Miss Lillian Russell. There were other performers, but the audience appeared interested only in the fair prima donna, who looked and acted charmingly. Her singing was more appropriate to the operatic than the concert stage; in fact, she substituted a number from the "Grand Duchess" for the piece announced on the programme, and could not refrain from acting as well as singing her numbers. It pleased the audience, but it can hardly be commended on a Sunday evening concert. She was encored every time she sang, and there was present one of the largest audiences of the season.

At the Kneisel concert this evening the quartette is to be assisted by Carl Faelten, and a choice programme is assured.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, NOV. 24, 1890.

Fair Lillian at Music Hall.

The sixth in the series of Music Hall "Sunday populars" had for chief attraction Miss Lillian Russell. Her appearance was the signal for loud applause and the fair songstress was forced to bow her acknowledgments many times before the storm of hand-clapping subsided.

"Know'st thou the land," from "Mignon," was her first number. This she sang with all her old-time spirit and expression. An encore was of course demanded.

Miss Russell fairly captivated the audience and made many hearts throb by her exquisite interpretation of the natty song: "Oh! We Hapless Prima Donna," from "Poor Jonathan." The audience could not get half enough of her singing, and although she was in an extremely happy and obliging mood she was fairly tired out before they would allow her to withdraw.

But Miss Russell was not the only one who contributed pleasing numbers to the evening's entertainment. Mr. Knöll and Miss Marie McNeil, two popular cornetists, were welcomed again, and their solos and duets received cordial appreciation. Miss Edith Christie's violin playing proved very enjoyable, and the several selections by the orchestra were deserving of praise.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Lillian Russell's Concert a Success at Music Hall.

The concert announced at Music Hall last evening, with Lillian Russell as the star attraction, was a great success, and this gifted vocalist has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. She was in grand voice, and her charming stage presence added not a little to the enjoyment of her audience. She was heard in the brilliant waltz song from "Poor Jonathan," as well as the "Say to Him" from the "Grand Duchess," a ballad "Answer," by Robyne, and an Offenbach chanson.

It is difficult to recall a more satisfying concert singer of the day than Miss Russell, as she unites in her varied gifts a bright, true, fresh voice, skillfully trained in an admirable method, and her rare musical instincts show at all times in her artistic phrasing and delivery of anything she sings. She delighted the immense audience in attendance, and was given no cause for doubt as to the impression gained by her hearers of her abilities.

Miss Russell was supported by an orchestra under the direction of William Reitzel, and the programme was made interesting, aside from her numbers, by the excellent playing of its members in some well chosen selections, as well as by the violin solos contributed by Miss Edith Christie and the cornet solos and duets played by A. H. Knoll and Miss Marie McNeil. Next Sunday's concert will be by the Strauss orchestra, and two weeks from last evening the Campanini Del Puente concert company appear.

[47]

THE [illegible]DICATOR.
CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 22, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had most remarkable success in the extensive series of concerts which is being given in Boston. It gives this season twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals in the Boston Music Hall. Every seat for both series was sold nearly three weeks before the first concert was given, which was on Oct. 11. It is said the proceeds of the seat sale for these two series was over $125,000. Under the skillful direction of its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, it has attained a height of efficiency it never before reached.

Among the important works selected by him for this season's concerts are: Beethoven, Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9; "Dervish Chorus" and "Priests' March" from "The Ruins of Athens." Schumann Symphonies D minor and C major; "Manfred" music. Schubert, Symphonies, C major, and "Unfinished." Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony; music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; overture, "Ruy Blas." Brahms, Symphonies, D major and E minor; Academic Overture; "Hungarian Dances." Raff, Symphony, "Im Walde." Berlioz, Symphony, "Fantastique"; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Volkmann, Symphony, D minor; overture, "Richard III." Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony. Haydn, Symphonies, D major and E flat major. Dvorak, Symphony, D minor; Scherzo capriccioso, D major. Liszt, "Dante" (with chorus), "Tasso"; "Mephisto Waltz"; "Rakockzy March." Wagner, "Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn"; Terzett, "The Rhine Daughters"; "Funeral March"; "Vorspiel and Good Friday Spell," "Parsifal"; Siegfried Idyll, "Faust Overture," "Kaiser Marsch," Paris version of "Tannhauser." Tschaikowsky, two movements of fourth symphony, F

Mrs. W. C. Wyman received great praise in New York, where she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The event of the week musically was the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season. The programme included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Von Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

Mlle. Clementina De Vere was the soloist and acquitted herself in a manner that charmed the large audience. Comment on the performance of this orchestra would be mere repetition, they having been heard here so often, and it is needless to say the opening was a great success.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 25, 1890.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Another Delightful Entertainment by Accomplished Musicians.

The second concert by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening to a larger audience if possible than the opening concert Oct. 20. In addition to the quartet Mr. Carl Faelton, pianist, assisted. The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in C sharp minor, Schubert's fantasia for piano and violin in C minor, and Brahm's piano quartet in G minor. In the Beethoven quartet, and especially the andante movement, the quartet did its best work. Schubert's fantasia for violin and piano was played by Messrs. Kneisel and Faelton, and it is doubtful if it has ever been heard to better advantage in this city. Were it not for an occasional lapse from tone on Mr. Kneisel's part he would have been equal in brilliancy of playing to Mr. Faelton. As it was they both richly deserved the repeated recalls given them. In the Brahm quartet the same high standard was attained, and in the rondo and finale the artists played in perfect style. The third concert is set for Dec. 29, and an equally fine programme is promised.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 23, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's first symphony was the opening number of the programme of the sixth symphony concert. Most musical people who are interested in musical literature of an analytical nature, are probably familiar with Teetgen's analyses of Beethoven's symphonies. For those who have not seen that little volume of keenly critical, imaginative, and, at times, gushing essays, the following thoughts concerning Beethoven's first attempt in the direction that led him to immortality are selected from the first.

"Opus 21. So, when Beethoven came of age, musically speaking, he wrote his first symphony. Ah! who can realize the feelings of a Beethoven, sitting down to write his first symphony. What flush of hope, what throbs of pleasure, what struggling consciousness, what waking sense of giant powers! I like to picture imaginary scenes where he sat down to the intoxicating enterprise. Was it in the country, of an early morning all dripping in the sunshine like the orange bowers here, or was it (probably it was, for reality is painfully prosaic) in some back attic—such as where Shakespeare perhaps wrote his symphonies? What sublime young Beethoven! There he sits for a moment, previous to penning the first chord, with his hands pressed on those concentrated brows of the lion-like head. Look at him well—the fullest incarnation of music—Ludwig von Beethoven, one of the most intensely interesting of the race of men."

But Mr. Teetgen is discriminating as well as enthusiastic. After referring to the true Beethoven spirit of the allegro, he speaks of the second theme as being incongruous, and says, "Why all at once this pastoral strain in the midst of a warlike defiance? Such unconsciousness is an error. A genius must be an artist as well, and a man has no right to fling the first idea that occurs to him into a work. Undoubtedly Beethoven sinned in this respect, and not seldom. It is notorious that he tacked on and foisted in pieces which had nothing to do with the work as a whole." There is something for the blind worshipper to cogitate over!

Mr. Teetgen does not like the plan that Beethoven follows, of making the second part of the first symphonic or sonata movement an elaboration or working out of the first part, and claims that Beethoven in this respect is not original but imitative. He says: "We are for making your first part long enough, and repeating it, if you will; but for giving us mostly new ideas, yet in character, in the second. We deny the dogma, that what you have got to do is to give one good idea thoroughly worked out. Wagner has carried this to a wearisome excess. We want no opera or symphony constructed out of four notes, or forty. We want not an idea, but ideas." Nevertheless, he admits that the progressions and culminations of the second part are "Beethovenially" grand. The andante seems to Mr. Teetgen in no way superior to Haydn and becomes to him veritably langweilig. The rondo, too, is comparatively mere trifling, but the minuet is splendid. This movement and the first only partake of the immortal.

There is certainly much food for reflection in these words. Why should the second part of the first movement of a symphony always be devoted to the seemingly inevitable working out, to a prolonged harping, in immitation and other contrapuntal devices, on fragments of the first part.

And why should the introduction of new ideas, yet in character, be tabooed, provided a return to the first idea be made at the close of the movement. Yet, this form largely obtains in modern works, frequently covering a poverty of invention, which weakness, however, cannot be laid at Beethoven's door. But Teetgen is too sweeping in his remarks concerning the andante and the rondo. The lion's paw is easily discernible in both movements, although it is laid upon them playfully rather than savagely; the atmosphere, so to say, about them is truly Beethovenish.

The whole symphony was played in a manner that corresponded admirably with the fresh, buoyant, melodious character of the music.

Mr. Nikisch took scarcely any liberties with the tempi; yet the care he evinced regarding the details showed the interest he felt in the work.

Mr. Hekking was the soloist, producing for a first hearing in Boston, a 'cello concerto in D by Haydn. The first movement is rather dull, and appears to have no reason for existence, except for the opportunity its innumerable scale figures affords the performer to display his skill in that direction. What feeble life it possesses was in this instance almost utterly quenched by the tremendously long and difficult cadenza by Reinecke, the few closing measures that followed it, seeming like the last gasps of an exhausted old man. The adagio, however, is a gem of pure and beautiful melody, and the slight and expressive cadenza was in charming keeping with its spirit. The rondo again, is short and insignificant. Mr. Hekking gave the work a highly finished interpretation, his rendering of the adagio being especially beautiful; while the breadth of his playing in the first cadenza, and his exquisite delicacy of touch in the secoud, revealed the quality of his virtuosity in a delightful manner.

"Vltava" (the Moldrn), a symphonic poem, by Smetana, was another novelty on the programme. Frederick Smetana was a Bohemian, who died in 1884 at the age of sixty. He was for a time a pupil of Liszt, under whose tuition he became a fine pianist; and it was probably due to Liszt's influence that he became a disciple of the school devoted to programme-music. But if the work presented last evening was a fair specimen of has writings, he evidently did not sacrifice his individuality in attempts to imitate the eccentricities of his master. "Vltava" is the second part of a symphonic poem bearing the general title of "My Fatherland." In it are to be found no extraordinary or unheard of progressions and orchestral combinations, nor any apparent straining for effect. The music is smooth and flowing for the most part, growing stronger and agitated only at the climax. The intention of the work is to suggest in tone the course of the river, from the time the trickling stream, starting from two springs in the forest, becomes a lively brook, then a river which grows broader and stronger, tearing its way through rapids and over rocky clefts, until, having as it were, asserted its right to live, it spreads out with the serenity and confidence that follow the successful outcome of a noble struggle. Two themes typify the river's source, one bright and florid, given out by the flutes, the other appearing as a charming singing melody, in the strings. This last theme predominates throughout, being interrupted occasionally by the horns of hunters, some pretty wedding music, and a wierd episode in the wind, which preludes some fascinating "water music." Then what may be called the "cataract climax" is approached, which is richly harmonized and orchestrated, and the principal theme is again uppermost, broadening out into a genial coda in the major. The work is a very pretty example of what may be accomplished in the line of tone description without bringing into use the innumerable inventions of the latest writers of programme music. The impression it left last evening was decidedly an agreeable one. Mr. Nikisch's conception was happily in accord with the idea presented by the composer, and the result was a performance full of charm and picturesqueness. The closing number was the overture to "Oberm."

T. P. CURRIER.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 23, 1890.

An Excellent Symphony Concert at Music Hall.

At the sixth Symphony concert last evening the composers and their works were: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn, concerto for violoncello, in D, (first time in Boston); Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava," (first time in Boston); Weber, overture, "Oberon."

A better symphony concert, or a more appropriately arranged programme, one seldom hears. The novelties were excellent. Smetana's "symphonic poem," with its highly imaginative themes and charming episodes, the refined masters shown in the orchestration, and general perspicuity with which the subject of the poem is reproduced, could but have delighted all who heard it.

The soloist for the concerto was Mr. Anton Hekking and he played the work in a wonderfully able manner, especially the Reinecke candenza to the first movement of the work. The candenza itself, however, is one of the most prolix, and unless a first hearing is deceptive, one of the most uninteresting effusions that ever a musical composer wrote, and the fact that its difficulties are simply herculean would seem the only reason for its having been written. The andante to the concerto is a charming movement, and the whole work, excepting the candenzes, may be described as delightfully Haydnesque.

Mr. Hekking's triumphant success was acknowledged by the audience in the heartiest manner, and the concert as a whole seemed to win the most appreciative recognition of the season thus far.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK.

The dominant impression conveyed by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concert last Wednesday evening was that of superior intellectuality, says the New York Home Journal. This made itself felt through the exquisite polish and refinement of technique which have come to be regarded as distinguishing characteristics of the orchestra. To what is due this impression remains an open question. It may be that the atmosphere of finer appreciation in Boston has stimulated Mr. Nikisch to a higher grasp of the meaning of certain compositions, or it may be due to the personnel of the orchestra. One may note in comparing the average expression of the members—the composite expression, so to speak—with that of the members of the Thomas and Seidl orchestras, that while there are remarkable musicians in all, men of culture outside their profession, the average appearance of intellect is more noticeable in the Boston orchestra. Boston does not equal New York in the amount of music performed, but the standard is purer, and the audiences, if colder, are nevertheless a trifle more discriminating. This naturally has effect upon the ambition of any musical society.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her American debut at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence Wednesday evening and won instant success.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette were assisted by Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, in the second concert of their series, given in Union Hall last evening. The following fine programme was played: Quartette in C sharp minor, op. 131, Beethoven; Fantasie for piano and violin in C minor, Schubert; Quartette in G minor, op. 25, for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, Brahms. It was a most enjoyable concert and the audience showed a hearty appreciation of the excellent work done. The Schubert fantasie was rendered in a thoroughly artistic manner by Mr. Faelten and Mr. Kneisel. The Beethoven quartette has been heard before at the Kneisel concerts, but it was their first performance of Brahms's G minor quartette. It received the warm approval of the audience, the rondo being particularly captivating. Mr. Faelten's playing was wonderfully clear and brilliant, and added much to the enjoyment of the programme.

Sixth Symphony Concert. Anton Hekking, Soloist.

The sixth Symphony programme was: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn, Concerto for Violoncello, in D—Allegro, Adagio, Rondo (first time in Boston); Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Vltava" (first time in Boston); Weber, Overture, "Oberon." Mr. Anton Hekking was the soloist. The symphony received a careful reading; Mr. Nikisch gave its detail, simple as it is, his best attention, and the result was a more interesting performance of the least interesting symphony of the immortal nine than we ever heard. The Scherzo of this work is epoch making, one of the first glimpses of Beethoven the originator and the innovator. The delicious overture to "Oberon" was beautifully played, the horn and all the wind players acquitting themselves faultlessly, while the regal manner in which the strings gave their inspiriting theme was something to remember. Smetana does not often appear upon Boston Symphony programmes; an opera overture of his was heard under Mr. Gericke, but until Saturday evening none of his strictly orchestral music, of which he wrote considerable. Smetana was a Bohemian gray-beard when he died a few years since, and his music was almost wholly due to national causes. "Vltava" is one of six pieces constituting a symphonic cyclus entitled "My Fatherland." The composer, in a dedication to the work, tells us that "Vltava" is a river of Bohemia that gathers courage and size as it flows along, ultimately joining forces with a bigger one. In his musical poem on the subject the composer pictures varied scenes along the river bank, the hunt, a wedding, etc., giving to each division characteristic instrumental color. A charming water motive opens the work; the separate sections as they pass in review are pretty, ingenius, and at the close, really brilliant with high colors. The performance was admirable.

Mr. Hekking brought out of the dusty depths a concerto by Haydn. Two or three violoncello concertos of the genial old kappelmaster exist, though mostly in a crude state. The work under notice had been subjected to revision, new parts for oboe and horns having been added to the original accompaniment. The work shows us some of the characteristic touches of Haydn, particularly in the Rondo; the slow movement, too, is undeniably his. Less like the old master is the first movement, which is full of awkward writing, and is almost uninteresting. To add to the surprise this peculiar movement awakened, Mr. Hekking added a cadenza by Carl Reinecke. The cadenza is of interminable length and is destitute of interest; we incline to the opinion that it is the result of a trial exercise of the three sons of said Reinecke; if by the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts he ought not to have owned it, for it is not only tiresome, but full of unrelated matter. Mr. Hekking was not heard at his best, his intonation was not always accurate. In the slow movement he played expressionly. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Rhapsody, No. 2 Liszt; "Symphonie Fantastique," Berlioz.

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

Lillian Russell Delights an Enthusiastic Audience.

The concert announced at Music Hall last evening, with Lillian Russell as the star attraction, was a great success, and this gifted vocalist has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. She was in grand voice, and her charming stage presence added not a little to the enjoyment of her audience. She was heard in the brilliant waltz song from "Poor Jonathan," as well as the "Say to Him" from the "Grand Duchess," a ballad, "Answer," by Robyne, and an Offenbach chanson.

Miss Russell was supported by an orchestra under the direction of William Reitzel, and the programme was made interesting, aside from her numbers, by the excellent playing of its members in some well-chosen selections, as well as by the violin solos contributed by Miss Edith Christie and the cornet solos and duets played by A. H. Knoll and Miss Marie McNeil. Next Sunday's concert will be by the Strauss orchestra, and two weeks from last evening the Campanini-Del Puente concert company appear.

The Kneisel Quartet programme is: Quartet in C sharp, minor, Beethoven; Fantasie for piano and violin in C, Schubert; piano quartet in G minor, op. 25, Brahms. Pianist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

At the third Boston Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, Dec. 4, the soloist will be Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and the programme will include Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Rubinstein's song, "The Dream King and His Love"; Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano, and Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1.

[48]

THE INDICATOR.
CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 22, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had most remarkable success in the extensive series of concerts which is being given in Boston. It gives this season twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals in the Boston Music Hall. Every seat for both series was sold nearly three weeks before the first concert was given, which was on Oct. 11. It is said the proceeds of the seat sale for these two series was over $125,000. Under the skillful direction of its conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, it has attained a height of efficiency it never before reached.

Among the important works selected by him for this season's concerts are: Beethoven, Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9; "Dervish Chorus" and "Priests' March" from "The Ruins of Athens." Schumann Symphonies D minor and C major; "Manfred" music. Schubert, Symphonies, C major, and "Unfinished." Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony; music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; overture, "Ruy Blas." Brahms, Symphonies, D major and E minor; Academic Overture; "Hungarian Dances." Raff, Symphony, "Im Walde." Berlioz, Symphony, "Fantastique"; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Volkmann, Symphony, D minor; overture, "Richard III." Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony. Haydn, Symphonies, D major and E flat major. Dvorak, Symphony, D minor; Scherzo capriccioso, D major. Liszt, "Dante" (with chorus), "Tasso"; "Mephisto Waltz"; "Rakockzy March." Wagner, "Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Morning Dawn"; Terzett, "The Rhine Daughters"; "Funeral March"; "Vorspiel and Good Friday Spell," "Parsifal"; Siegfried Idyll, "Faust Overture," "Kaiser Marsch," Paris version of "Tannhauser." Tschaikowsky, two movements of fourth symphony, F

Mrs. W. C. Wyman received great praise in New York, where she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The event of the week musically was the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season. The programme included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Von Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

Mlle. Clementina De Vere was the soloist and acquitted herself in a manner that charmed the large audience. Comment on the performance of this orchestra would be mere repetition, they having been heard here so often, and it is needless to say the opening was a great success.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 25, 1890.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Another Delightful Entertainment by Accomplished Musicians.

The second concert by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening to a larger audience if possible than the opening concert Oct. 20. In addition to the quartet Mr. Carl Faelton, pianist, assisted. The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in C sharp minor, Schubert's fantasia for piano and violin in C minor, and Brahm's piano quartet in G minor. In the Beethoven quartet, and especially the andante movement, the quartet did its best work. Schubert's fantasia for violin and piano was played by Messrs. Kneisel and Faelton, and it is doubtful if it has ever been heard to better advantage in this city. Were it not for an occasional lapse from tone on Mr. Kneisel's part he would have been equal in brilliancy of playing to Mr. Faelton. As it was they both richly deserved the repeated recalls given them. In the Brahm quartet the same high standard was attained, and in the rondo and finale the artists played in perfect style. The third concert is set for Dec. 29, and an equally fine programme is promised.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 23, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's first symphony was the opening number of the programme of the sixth symphony concert. Most musical people who are interested in musical literature of an analytical nature, are probably familiar with Teetgen's analyses of Beethoven's symphonies. For those who have not seen that little volume of keenly critical, imaginative, and, at times, gushing essays, the following thoughts concerning Beethoven's first attempt in the direction that led him to immortality are selected from the first.

"Opus 21. So, when Beethoven came of age, musically speaking, he wrote his first symphony. Ah! who can realize the feelings of a Beethoven, sitting down to write his first symphony. What flush of hope, what throbs of pleasure, what struggling consciousness, what waking sense of giant powers! I like to picture imaginary scenes where he sat down to the intoxicating enterprise. Was it in the country, of an early morning all dripping in the sunshine like the orange bowers here, or was it (probably it was, for reality is painfully prosaic) in some back attic—such as where Shakespeare perhaps wrote his symphonies? What sublime young Beethoven! There he sits for a moment, previous to penning the first chord, with his hands pressed on those concentrated brows of the lion-like head. Look at him well—the fullest incarnation of music—Ludwig von Beethoven, one of the most intensely interesting of the race of men."

But Mr. Teetgen is discriminating as well as enthusiastic. After referring to the true Beethoven spirit of the allegro, he speaks of the second theme as being incongruous, and says, "Why all at once this pastoral strain in the midst of a warlike defiance? Such unconsciousness is an error. A genius must be an artist as well, and a man has no right to fling the first idea that occurs to him into a work. Undoubtedly Beethoven sinned in this respect, and not seldom. It is notorious that he tacked on and foisted in pieces which had nothing to do with the work as a whole." There is something for the blind worshipper to cogitate over!

Mr. Teetgen does not like the plan that Beethoven follows, of making the second part of the first symphonic or sonata movement an elaboration or working out of the first part, and claims that Beethoven in this respect is not original but imitative. He says: "We are for making your first part long enough, and repeating it, if you will; but for giving us mostly new ideas, yet in character, in the second. We deny the dogma, that what you have got to do is to give one good idea thoroughly worked out. Wagner has carried this to a wearisome excess. We want no opera or symphony constructed out of four notes, or forty. We want not an idea, but ideas." Nevertheless, he admits that the progressions and culminations of the second part are "Beethovenially" grand. The andante seems to Mr. Teetgen in no way superior to Haydn and becomes to him veritably langweilig. The rondo, too, is comparatively mere trifling, but the minuet is splendid. This movement and the first only partake of the immortal.

There is certainly much food for reflection in these words. Why should the second part of the first movement of a symphony always be devoted to the seemingly inevitable working out, to a prolonged harping, in immitation and other contrapuntal devices, on fragments of the first part.

And why should the introduction of new ideas, yet in character, be tabooed, provided a return to the first idea be made at the close of the movement. Yet, this form largely obtains in modern works, frequently covering a poverty of invention, which weakness, however, cannot be laid at Beethoven's door. But Teetgen is too sweeping in his remarks concerning the andante and the rondo. The lion's paw is easily discernible in both movements, although it is laid upon them playfully rather than savagely; the atmosphere, so to say, about them is truly Beethovenish.

The whole symphony was played in a manner that corresponded admirably with the fresh, buoyant, melodious character of the music.

Mr. Nikisch took scarcely any liberties with the tempi; yet the care he evinced regarding the details showed the interest he felt in the work.

Mr. Hekking was the soloist, producing for a first hearing in Boston, a 'cello concerto in D by Haydn. The first movement is rather dull, and appears to have no reason for existence, except for the opportunity its innumerable scale figures affords the performer to display his skill in that direction. What feeble life it possesses was in this instance almost utterly quenched by the tremendously long and difficult cadenza by Reinecke, the few closing measures that followed it, seeming like the last gasps of an exhausted old man. The adagio, however, is a gem of pure and beautiful melody, and the slight and expressive cadenza was in charming keeping with its spirit. The rondo again, is short and insignificant. Mr. Hekking gave the work a highly finished interpretation, his rendering of the adagio being especially beautiful; while the breadth of his playing in the first cadenza, and his exquisite delicacy of touch in the secoud, revealed the quality of his virtuosity in a delightful manner.

"Vltava" (the Moldrn), a symphonic poem, by Smetana, was another novelty on the programme. Frederick Smetana was a Bohemian, who died in 1884 at the age of sixty. He was for a time a pupil of Liszt, under whose tuition he became a fine pianist; and it was probably due to Liszt's influence that he became a disciple of the school devoted to programme-music. But if the work presented last evening was a fair specimen of has writings, he evidently did not sacrifice his individuality in attempts to imitate the eccentricities of his master. "Vltava" is the second part of a symphonic poem bearing the general title of "My Fatherland." In it are to be found no extraordinary or unheard of progressions and orchestral combinations, nor any apparent straining for effect. The music is smooth and flowing for the most part, growing stronger and agitated only at the climax. The intention of the work is to suggest in tone the course of the river, from the time the trickling stream, starting from two springs in the forest, becomes a lively brook, then a river which grows broader and stronger, tearing its way through rapids and over rocky clefts, until, having as it were, asserted its right to live, it spreads out with the serenity and confidence that follow the successful outcome of a noble struggle. Two themes typify the river's source, one bright and florid, given out by the flutes, the other appearing as a charming singing melody, in the strings. This last theme predominates throughout, being interrupted occasionally by the horns of hunters, some pretty wedding music, and a wierd episode in the wind, which preludes some fascinating "water music." Then what may be called the "cataract climax" is approached, which is richly harmonized and orchestrated, and the principal theme is again uppermost, broadening out into a genial coda in the major. The work is a very pretty example of what may be accomplished in the line of tone description without bringing into use the innumerable inventions of the latest writers of programme music. The impression it left last evening was decidedly an agreeable one. Mr. Nikisch's conception was happily in accord with the idea presented by the composer, and the result was a performance full of charm and picturesqueness. The closing number was the overture to "Oberm."

T. P. CURRIER.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 23, 1890.

An Excellent Symphony Concert at Music Hall.

At the sixth Symphony concert last evening the composers and their works were: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn, concerto for violoncello, in D, (first time in Boston); Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava," (first time in Boston); Weber, overture, "Oberon."

A better symphony concert, or a more appropriately arranged programme, one seldom hears. The novelties were excellent. Smetana's "symphonic poem," with its highly imaginative themes and charming episodes, the refined masters shown in the orchestration, and general perspicuity with which the subject of the poem is reproduced, could but have delighted all who heard it.

The soloist for the concerto was Mr. Anton Hekking and he played the work in a wonderfully able manner, especially the Reinecke candenza to the first movement of the work. The candenza itself, however, is one of the most prolix, and unless a first hearing is deceptive, one of the most uninteresting effusions that ever a musical composer wrote, and the fact that its difficulties are simply herculean would seem the only reason for its having been written. The andante to the concerto is a charming movement, and the whole work, excepting the candenzes, may be described as delightfully Haydnesque.

Mr. Hekking's triumphant success was acknowledged by the audience in the heartiest manner, and the concert as a whole seemed to win the most appreciative recognition of the season thus far.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK.

The dominant impression conveyed by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concert last Wednesday evening was that of superior intellectuality, says the New York Home Journal. This made itself felt through the exquisite polish and refinement of technique which have come to be regarded as distinguishing characteristics of the orchestra. To what is due this impression remains an open question. It may be that the atmosphere of finer appreciation in Boston has stimulated Mr. Nikisch to a higher grasp of the meaning of certain compositions, or it may be due to the personnel of the orchestra. One may note in comparing the average expression of the members—the composite expression, so to speak—with that of the members of the Thomas and Seidl orchestras, that while there are remarkable musicians in all, men of culture outside their profession, the average appearance of intellect is more noticeable in the Boston orchestra. Boston does not equal New York in the amount of music performed, but the standard is purer, and the audiences, if colder, are nevertheless a trifle more discriminating. This naturally has effect upon the ambition of any musical society.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her American début at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence Wednesday evening and won instant success.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette were assisted by Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, in the second concert of their series, given in Union Hall last evening. The following fine programme was played: Quartette in C sharp minor, op. 131, Beethoven; Fantasie for piano and violin in C minor, Schubert; Quartette in G minor, op. 25, for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, Brahms. It was a most enjoyable concert and the audience showed a hearty appreciation of the excellent work done. The Schubert fantasie was rendered in a thoroughly artistic manner by Mr. Faelten and Mr. Kneisel. The Beethoven quartette has been heard before at the Kneisel concerts, but it was their first performance of Brahms's G minor quartette. It received the warm approval of the audience, the rondo being particularly captivating. Mr. Faelten's playing was wonderfully clear and brilliant, and added much to the enjoyment of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Sixth Symphony Concert. Anton Hekking, Soloist.

The sixth Symphony programme was: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn, Concerto for Violoncello, in D—Allegro, Adagio, Rondo (first time in Boston); Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Vltava" (first time in Boston); Weber, Overture, "Oberon." Mr. Anton Hekking was the soloist. The symphony received a careful reading; Mr. Nikisch gave its detail, simple as it is, his best attention, and the result was a more interesting performance of the least interesting symphony of the immortal nine than we ever heard. The Scherzo of this work is epoch making, one of the first glimpses of Beethoven the originator and the innovator. The delicious overture to "Oberon" was beautifully played, the horn and all the wind players acquitting themselves faultlessly, while the regal manner in which the strings gave their inspiriting theme was something to remember. Smetana does not often appear upon Boston Symphony programmes; an opera overture of his was heard under Mr. Gericke, but until Saturday evening none of his strictly orchestral music, of which he wrote considerable. Smetana was a Bohemian gray-beard when he died a few years since, and his music was almost wholly due to national causes. "Vltava" is one of six pieces constituting a symphonic cyclus entitled "My Fatherland." The composer, in a dedication to the work, tells us that "Vltava" is a river of Bohem a that gathers courage and size as it flows along, ultimately joining forces with a bigger one. In his musical poem on the subject the composer pictures varied scenes along the river bank, the hunt, a wedding, etc., giving to each division characteristic instrumental color. A charming water motive opens the work; the separate sections as they pass in review are pretty, ingenius, and at the close, really brilliant with high colors. The performance was admirable.

Mr. Hekking brought out of the dusty depths a concerto by Haydn. Two or three violoncello concertos of the genial old kappelmaster exist, though mostly in a crude state. The work under notice had been subjected to revision, new parts for oboe and horns having been added to the original accompaniment. The work shows us some of the characteristic touches of Haydn, particularly in the Rondo; the slow movement, too, is undeniably his. Less like the old master s the first movement, which is full of awkward writing, and is almost uninteresting. To add to the surprise this peculiar movement awakened, Mr. Hekking added a cadenza by Carl Reinecke. The cadenza is of interminable length and is destitute of interest; we incline to the opinion that it is the result of a trial exercise of the three sons of said Reinecke; if by the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts he ought not to have owned it, for it is not only tiresome, but full of unrelated matter. Mr, Hekking was not heard at his best, his intonation was not always accurate. In the slow movement he played expressionly. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Rhapsody, No. 2 Liszt; "Symphonie Fantastique," Berlioz.

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

Lillian Russell Delights an Enthusiastic Audience.

The concert announced at Music Hall last evening, with Lillian Russell as the star attraction, was a great success, and this gifted vocalist has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. She was in grand voice, and her charming stage presence added not a little to the enjoyment of her audience. She was heard in the brilliant waltz song from "Poor Jonathan," as well as the "Say to Him" from the "Grand Duchess," a ballad, "Answer," by Robyne, and an Offenbach chanson.

Miss Russell was supported by an orchestra under the direction of William Reitzel, and the programme was made interesting, aside from her numbers, by the excellent playing of its members in some well-chosen selections, as well as by the violin solos contributed by Miss Edith Christie and the cornet solos and duets played by A. H. Knoll and Miss Marie McNeil. Next Sunday's concert will be by the Strauss orchestra, and two weeks from last evening the Campanini-Del Puente concert company appear.

The Kneisel Quartet programme is: Quartet in C sharp, minor, Beethoven; Fantasie for piano and violin in C, Schubert; piano quartet in G minor, op. 25, Brahms. Pianist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

At the third Boston Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, Dec. 4, the soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, and the programme will include Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Raff's song, "The Dream King and His Love;" Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano, and Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1.

[48]

...ADVERTISER
...ished 1813.

...AY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

...Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Hekking ... Soloist.

It was scarcely the best taste to follow the first symphony of Beethoven with a Haydn concerto in Saturday's programme, for the symphony is but a reflection of Haydn's style and form, and the two together constituted rather an overdose of this school. The first symphony is, however, greater than even the "English symphonies" of Haydn, as Beethoven was greater in nature and aspiration than the master of instrumental form. There was an interval of some years between the production of this symphony and its successor, and had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did we should only know him as a talented imitator and pupil of Haydn. The only point approaching a musical reform in this work is the consistent use of clarinets throughout. Haydn used this instrument very sparingly, but Mozart had opened the road for the clarinet by employing it in his E flat symphony nearly a dozen years before. There is an especial interest in the minuet of this symphony; not yet had Beethoven evolved the idea of a symphonic scherzo. But for all that, the minuet of the first symphony has more boldness than the scherzo of the second. The use of the kettledrums in this work is something that had never been attempted before; in the last century these instruments, transposing in the most unskilful manner, were only used to accentuate some rhythmic effect, but here Beethoven gave an independence to the humble instrument which he afterward followed up in the drum trill of the fourth symphony (first movement), the chord on the drums in the slow movement of the ninth symphony, and the figures on the same instrument in the scherzo of this same work. The finale of the first Beethoven symphony, however, shows the influence of the old school, and is not so deep in thought or lofty in development as one finds the endings of the later symphonies of the composer to be. The influence of the gigue, which ended the old suite in a jovial and lively manner, was exerted on the finales of the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, which became merely pleasing, in most cases, and in this symphony also the rollicking vein is apparent.

The reading of the entire symphony was commendable, and the few measures of introduction to the finale were given in a manner that eliminated their triviality. In former days there were conductors, Zerk, for example, who cut out these measures as being "too ludicrous." The spirit with which the "Minuet" was given was admirable and the work was invested with just the proper portion of dash, without any radical changes from the precision which belongs to the first two symphonies of the great nine.

Upon this exceptional formalism of Beethoven followed the regular formalism of Haydn, and the old concerto shape seemed in vivid contrast with the rhapsodizing concertos we have recently had. The first movement was a cadenza by Reinecke, with a trifle of Haydn before it as prelude. It is seldom that one can hear a cadenza which is about as long as the movement it is intended to adorn, and it was most of all surprising to have such a disproportionate embellishment emanate from the conservative pen of Reinecke. The concerto was for violoncello and Mr. Hekking was the soloist. He played well, a trifle heavily for the dainty themes at times, but still with an artistic finish and a constant clearness that was worthy of high praise. The adagio was especially well done, and there was a good degree of breadth in the finale. The artist was recalled with effusion by an enthusiastic audience.

The programme now swerved from the formal vein of former days to the free and heavily scored style of the present. "Vltava" is a river in Bohemia, which is less mythical than Shakespeare's "seacoast in Bohemia," and has furnished Smetana with material for a symphonic poem. Turkish music is freely employed, as well as harp, and there is a lavish display of orchestral tone-color, and an equally careful concealment of ideas. The work begins with a wave-like figure that is as often repeated as the opening chord of Wagner's "Rheingold," and it is used for the same purpose, to picture the steady flow of a stream. There are dissonances ad libitum, and much of the work is "sound and fury, signifying nothing," but there are also dance themes and some very pretty phrases for muted violins in high positions, and brilliant embellishments for woodwind, and these served to display the technique of our orchestra and were excellently played.

The Oberon overture seemed a trifle exaggerated. I know that much is allowed when interpreting Weber which would be forbidden in the reading of less dramatic composers; there is something of the theatre in Weber, even in his instrumental works, but the kettle-drum gave a sforzando that suggested the "Surprise" symphony, and the accentuation was rather overdone. But the last part of the work was grandly given and deserved the enthusiasm it created. Weber was undoubtedly the best orchestral writer for the horn, and the equal of any composer in the use of the clarinet, in fact he was the discoverer of some of the chief points of tone color of the latter, and one may always be sure of finding both of these instruments prominent in any of his orchestral works. Both horns and clarinets were finely played, and added much to the effect of the work. The next programme will be as modern as possible, and Liszt and Berlioz will furnish the chief part of the programme, which will not only be an exciting one, but will prove as an admirable lesson to those who desire to study modern instrumentation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC HALL. ... SYMPHONY HALL.

...ian pianist, ... of the New York ... opera, ... Nevada, shot into town ... shooting ... Nevadas, and after enlivening the Music Hall popular concert audience by her dazzling pyrotechnics of melody vanished to be seen no more in Boston this season. It was her only appearance in town for the year, and a large audience took advantage of it. They were well repaid. Miss Russell sang with her usual fire and brilliancy, and the audience hung on her coruscating bravuras as delightedly as of yore. The minor soloists of the evening were Knoll and Marie McNiel, who did very well on the cornet, and Miss Edith Christie, whose violin solo was pleasing. The orchestra was good.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1890

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The programme of the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette, given at Union Hall last evening, was as follows:

Quartette, C sharp minor, op. 131..Beethoven
Fantasie for piano and violin, in C..Schubert
Piano quartette in G minor, op. 25...Brahms

The quartettes of the later period of Beethoven's life, the works which belong to his "third style," will ever be a stumbling block to many. Some will echo Schumann in calling them the extreme boundaries which human art and fantasy have yet reached. Others will think with Oulibicheff that they show the weakening of his faculties, and that they were written by him under the influence of hallucinations. They would, without doubt, be much more intelligible had they been often played, and less been written about them. The commentators have been too busy, they have had too much to say. Hearing the works themselves would have been more advantageous to the musical public. Truly are they stupendous compositions; perhaps not so much quartettes as chalk sketches of possible orchestral pieces. Lenz was not far out of the way when he described them as conversations between stringed instruments, which discussed all things knowable and certain other things.

Take this quartette in C sharp minor, for instance, the one dedicated to Baron Von Stutterheim, who had been kind to the nephew of Beethoven. It was admirably played by the Kneisel Quartette, and therefore its beauties stood even in stronger relief by the side of many passages which are almost grotesque. Thoughts are huddled together without apparent connection, as the sleep-chasings of a perturbed mind. And it would seem, after all, as though these last quartettes of Beethoven should not be played in a large hall and before a large audience. They should rather be performed in a room of moderate size, and the hearers, few in number, should be in close communion with the players, so that at any moment one could say, "Please play those measures over again; I do not quite understand them."

The beautiful fantasie by Schubert is supposed to have been written in 1827, and the theme of the andante is taken from a well-known song written by him six years before. It was charmingly played. It is unnecessary to speak of the performance of the violinist, for all the qualities which so characterize his work—richness and breadth of tone, sure technique, pure intonation and rare musical intelligence—were displayed upon this occasion. Mr. Faelten played the pianoforte part exceedingly well, and when it was his duty to accompany the violin, he did not forget the words of the great Couperin, who once said: "When I play with violin or flute or oboe, I am not a player of a solo, I am an accompanist."

But in the Brahms quartette he was often unruly; at times his touch became absolutely hard and wooden, and he occasionally pounded. Nor was the playing of the other gentlemen entirely free from the charge of coarseness, which perhaps was not at variance with the composer's idea, for much of the quartette is rude in theme and in development. The most interesting movement, the most musical, is the andante con moto. The themes of the other movements are dull, however ingenious their development may be; in fact, the development is too ingenious, and Brahms, like the hewer of idols, seems to bow down to the work of his own hands and will not cease from adoring it. As in many other works of this talented man, so it is in this quartette—he does not know when he has said enough.

The date of the third concert is Dec. 29.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sixth concert, on Saturday evening, Nov. 22, offered the following programme:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major.
Haydn: Concerto in D, for violoncello.
(First time in Boston.)
Smetana: Symphonic poem, "Vltava."
(First time in Boston.)
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Soloist, Mr. Anton Hekking.

Beethoven's earliest symphony, first performed in April, 1800, at Vienna, written therefore a little before he had reached the age of thirty, cannot be measured with his greater symphonies which followed it, yet it was worthy to usher in the immortal nine. It is a refreshing thing to hear after so many ambitious efforts of more recent or contemporary composers. It has throughout the charm of youth and freshness. It is thoroughly musical and has more that is characteristic of the man, more of his individuality, than it has commonly had credit for. It is full of life and verve, full of beauty; it is clear and bright and unmistakable in its intentions; its appeal is irresistible; it charms the listener onward. The very opening, the first chord of the Adagio which leads in the Allegro (con brio), being the chord of C with the flat seventh added and resolving into F, as if that were the key of the piece,—a bold innovation which must have startled the pedants—shows already the original and independent spirit of one who has something of his own to say and means to say it in his own way. A few more strong chords bring us firmly upon the ground of the real C-major key of the piece. Bright and brave and resolute the Allegro springs forth, and the second theme (oboe seconded by flute) is well contrasted by its gentler, sweeter charm; and all is worked out with consummate mastery and beauty to the end. The instrumentation, though not of the fullest, is all significant and telling; the ever-young Beethoven blitheness and thrilling vitality and healthiness of tone, which you feel in the opening of the eighth symphony, pervades the movement, overshadowed now and then by darker modulations, which creep in with low bassoon tones, with an effect at once mystical and clear. Yes, if it sounds now and then like Mozart, it is genuine Beethoven and none other, an earnest of what is to come from the same source later. The second movement, andante cantabile con moto, while it reminds of Mozart, is one of exquisite beauty both in spirit and in form. The Minuet, foreshadowing the Scherzo to which the force of his genius was already drawing him, is simple yet playfully inventive, and so is the trio, although it resembles some of Haydn's. The finale, with its quaint, tentative adagio introduction, feeling its way up to the Allegro vivace, which shoots forth with irrepressible elasticity, is again quite Beethovenish, for instance, in its frequent syncopated rhythms, always characteristic of the master. The whole work was admirably rendered, Mr. Nikisch handling it con amore, we may say.

The masterly violoncellist, Mr. Hekking, had unearthed from Haydn's multifarious store, including concertos for all sorts of instruments, among them five or six for the 'cello, a work that has long lain virtually buried. It is of course an artistic piece of work and not without beauty, particularly the middle movement, the Adagio, which is short and sweet. The first movement, Allegro, while it contains much that is interesting, and while it surprised us in offering so much room for virtuosity, was somewhat dull, conventional and long, even without the inordinate and seemingly interminable length of the strange and uncongenial cadenza composed into it by Reinecke. That seemed as if the performer were hopelessly lost in a wandering reverie of improvised virtuosity, so spellbound that he could not find an end and exit. There was little left for the orchestra when he did get home. Moreover, the beautiful Adagio suffered on account of that cadenza. The Rondo finale again was rather commonplace though short. Mr. Hekking's execution was that of an artist, while hardly up to his best.

Refreshing after this was the symphonic poem by Smetana. A German musical lexicon calls him "an enthusiastic follower of the Berlioz-Liszt-Wagner direction;" but we confess we found no offensive manifestations of that tendency in "Vltava," which we are told is another name for the river Moldau, which flows through the city of Prague. Smetana was born in Bohemia, spent much of his life in Prague, where he died at the age of sixty, in 1884. He was one of the masters of his countryman, Dvorák. He was for a time a pupil of Liszt, under whose instruction he became a remarkable pianist. He was a thoroughly national Czeck composer, and wrote a number of operas in the Czeck or Bohemian language. Probably it was under Liszt's influence that he turned his attention to the symphonic poem form of composition. "Vltava" is one of three parts embraced in a "cyclus" called "My Fatherland." We are indebted to Mr. Wilson's Bulletin for the composer's programme of this portion. Two springs take their course in a shady Bohemian forest; they unite and glitter in the morning sun. The brook grows to the mighty river Moldau, which flows into the Elbe. As it traverses the forests, hunting horns and cries are heard. It winds through meadows and farms. Then follows a wedding; wood and water nymphs, disporting themselves by moonlight in glistening waters; mirrored towers and castles; the Johannis cataract breaking through the rocky clefts in the broad river bed; until it rolls majestically to Prague. And so on. This thread is easily followed in the music. It opens charmingly with the "rippling waters" of two streams meeting, beautifully represented by the two flutes. Breadth and deeper color come with the oboe and clarinet. The current ardent with the bassoons, cellos, and whole orchestra. All fascinating, until the more violent fermentation and fury of the cataract portion, which is noisy and less interesting, and suggests the idea that the full-grown river Moldau was behaving badly, as it did a few months since, when the ancient and historic St. Nepomuc bridge, or Carlsbrücke, gave way before its turbulence and sank, stones and statues, into the stream. The music ends, however, in a self-possessed, triumphant tone, as if in praise of Wallenstein's historic city. The work employs the full modern orchestra, with harps and Janissary music. On the whole it proved very enjoyable, fascinating in the earlier portion. And it was wonderfully well played. So, too, was the concluding number of the programme, the never-failing overture to "Oberon," in which Weber's romantic fairy imagination

...music. The magic horn ... sounded; the mingled laughter of ... voices in the wood-wind was as witching and as delicate as one could wish; the strings were perfect; and the sudden burst of fortissimo, which startles even when you most expect it, came with absolute precision, giving the overzealous tympanist a rightful opportunity. We could wish, however, that as a rule throughout the concert he could be induced to drum with less irrepressible furor.

The next concert has a very different sort of programme except in the first piece: Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2; and the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz.

J. S. D.

Sunday Night Entertainments.

The largest audience of the series was present at Music Hall last evening at the sixth of the popular concerts, the great increase in attendance being due to the fact that Miss Lillian Russell was to make her only appearance in Boston for the passing season. Other performers were: Miss Edith Christie, violinist; A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil, cornet players, and an orchestra of twenty, under the direction of William Reitzel. The following was the programme:

Overture, "Beautiful Galatea"	Suppé
Cornet solo, "Polka Brilliante"	Knoll
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Haydn"	Leonard
Soprano solo, "Dites lui"	Offenbach
Serenade for strings, "Angels' Whisper"	Somerlatt
Cornet solo, "Inflammatus"	Rossini
Violin solos, Cavatina	Bohn
Mazurka	Wieniawski
Concert Waltz, "Autumn Roses"	Strauss
Waltz song, "Oh! we hapless Prima Donne"	Millöcker
Cornet duet, Air and variations	Levy
Selections, "Falka"	Chassaigne

As Miss Russell stepped upon the stage she was greeted with an enthusiasm that a Patti might have expected, and the large audience did not seem contented until she had responded to recalls after each selection and had reappeared to bow her acknowledgments. Her pure, true voice is richer in tone than when she was last heard here in opera, and is handled with much greater skill than formerly. The crudities that once marred her singing are all eliminated and her delivery of light music is thoroughly pleasing. The selection from "The Grand Duchess" was sung with excellent effect, and the new waltz-song from "Poor Jonathan" was given with great brilliancy. Miss Christie is a violinist of ability and plays with accuracy, but lacks the strength necessary for some of her selections. Miss McNeil gave her solo in a pleasing manner, but the mutilation of the "Inflammatus" by Mr. Knoll was ear-splitting. The orchestra played its selections in a satisfactory manner, but its accompaniment of Miss Russell was wretched and that she was able to finish "Dites lui" with the players around her all at sea is greatly to her credit.

Next Sunday the Strauss orchestra will give its farewell concert in this city and a week later the Campanini-Del Puente Concert Company will be heard.

Not in a score of years had Professor G. R. Cromwell given a lecture in this city until last

---

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH SINGS IN PROVIDENCE.—PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sang for the first time before an American audience in this city this evening. She was five times recalled.

NIKISCH.—At the sixth of the season's symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, last Saturday evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the program consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn's concerto for violoncello; Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava," and Weber's overture "Oberon." The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Hekking as Soloist.

It was scarcely the best taste to follow the first symphony of Beethoven with a Haydn concerto in Saturday's programme, for the symphony is but a reflection of Haydn's style and form, and the two together constituted rather an overdose of this school. The first symphony is, however, greater than even the "English symphonies" of Haydn, as Beethoven was greater in nature and aspiration than the father of instrumental form. There was an interval of some years between the production of this symphony and its successor, and had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did we should only know him as a talented imitator and pupil of Haydn. The only point approaching a musical reform in this work is the consistent use of clarinets throughout. Haydn used this instrument very sparingly, but Mozart had opened the road for the clarinet by employing it in his E flat symphony nearly a dozen years before. There is an especial interest in the minuet of this symphony; not yet had Beethoven evolved the idea of a symphonic scherzo. But for all that, the minuet of the first symphony has more boldness than the scherzo of the second. The use of the kettledrums in this work is something that had never been attempted before; in the last century these instruments, transposing in the most unearthly manner, were only used to accentuate some rythmic effect, but here Beethoven gave an independence to the humble instrument which he afterward followed up in the drum trill of the fourth symphony (first movement), the chord on the drums in the slow movement of the ninth symphony, and the figures on the same instrument in the scherzo of this same work. The finale of the first Beethoven symphony, however, shows the influence of the old school, and is not so deep in thought or lofty in development as one finds the endings of the later symphonies of the composer to be. The influence of the gigue, which ended the old suite in a jovial and lively manner, was exerted on the finales of the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, which became merely pleasing, in most cases, and in this symphony also the rollicking vein is apparent.

The reading of the entire symphony was commendable, and the few measures of introduction to the finale were given in a manner that eliminated their triviality. In former days there were conductors, Thark, for example, who cut out these measures as being "too indicrous." The spirit with which the "Minuet" was given was admirable and the work was invested with just the proper portion of dash, without any radical changes from the precision which belongs to the first two symphonies of the great nine.

Upon this exceptional formalism of Beethoven followed the regular formalism of Haydn, and the old concerto shape seemed in vivid contrast with the rhapsodizing concertos we have recently had. The first movement was a cadenza by Reinecke, with a trifle of Haydn before it as prelude. It is seldom that one can hear a cadenza which is about as long as the movement it is intended to adorn, and it was most of all surprising to have such a dispropertionate embellishment emanate from the conservative pen of Reinecke. The concerto was for violoncello and Mr. Hekking was the soloist. He played well, a trifle heavily for the dainty themes at times, but still with an artistic finish and a constant clearness that was worthy of high praise. The adagio was especially well done, and there was a good degree of breadth in the finale. The artist was recalled with effusion by an enthusiastic audience.

The programme now swerved from the formal vein of former days to the free and heavily scored style of the present. "Vltava" is a river in Bohemia, which is less mythical than Shakespeare's "seacoast in Bohemia," and has furnished Smetana with material for a symphonic poem. Turkish music is freely employed, as well as harp, and there is a lavish display of orchestral tone-color, and an equally careful concealment of ideas. The work begins with a wave-like figure that is as often repeated as the opening chord of Wagner's "Rheingold," and it is used for the same purpose, to picture the steady flow of a stream. There are dissonances ad libitum, and much of the work is "sound and fury, signifying nothing," but there are also dance themes and some very pretty phrases for muted violins in high positions, and brilliant embellishments for woodwind, and these served to display the technique of our orchestra and were excellently played.

The Oberon overture seemed a trifle exaggerated. I know that much is allowed when interpreting Weber which would be forbidden in the reading of less dramatic composers; there is something of the theatre in Weber, even in his instrumental works, but the kettle-drum gave a sforzando that suggested the "Surprise" symphony, and the accentuation was rather overdone. But the last part of the work was grandly given and deserved the enthusiasm it created. Weber was undoubtedly the best orchestral writer for the horn, and the equal of any composer in the use of the clarinet, in fact he was the discoverer of some of the chief points of tone color of the latter, and one may always be sure of finding both of these instruments prominent in any of his orchestral works. Both horns and clarinets were finely played, and added much to the effect of the work. The next programme will be as modern as possible, and Liszt and Berlioz will furnish the chief part of the programme, which will not only be an exciting one, but may serve as an admirable lesson to those who desire to study modern instrumentation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MISS LILLIAN RUSSELL IN MUSIC HALL.

Lillian Russell, the brilliant queen of the New York centre of light opera, the Casino, shot into town like a shooting star yesterday, and after enthralling the Music Hall popular concert audience by her dazzling pyrotechnics of melody vanished to be seen no more in Boston this season. It was her only appearance in town for the year, and a large audience took advantage of it. They were well repaid. Miss Russell sang with her usual fire and brilliancy, and the audience hung on her coruscating bravuras as delightedly as of yore. The minor soloists of the evening were Knoll and Marie McNiel, who did very well on the cornet, and Miss Edith Christie, whose violin solo was pleasing. The orchestra was good.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1890

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The programme of the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette, given at Union Hall last evening, was as follows:

Quartette, C sharp minor, op. 131..Beethoven
Fantasie for piano and violin, in C..Schubert
Piano quartette in G minor, op. 25...Brahms

The quartettes of the later period of Beethoven's life, the works which belong to his "third style," will ever be a stumbling block to many. Some will echo Schumann in calling them the extreme boundaries which human art and fantasy have yet reached. Others will think with Oulibicheff that they show the weakening of his faculties, and that they were written by him under the influence of hallucinations. They would, without doubt, be much more intelligible had they been often played, and less been written about them. The commentators have been too busy, they have had too much to say. Hearing the works themselves would have been more advantageous to the musical public. Truly are they stupendous compositions; perhaps not so much quartettes as chalk sketches of possible orchestral pieces. Lenz was not far out of the way when he described them as conversations between stringed instruments, which discussed all things knowable and certain other things.

Take this quartette in C sharp minor, for instance, the one dedicated to Baron Von Stutterheim, who had been kind to the nephew of Beethoven. It was admirably played by the Kneisel Quartette, and therefore its beauties stood even in stronger relief by the side of many passages which are almost grotesque. Thoughts are huddled together without apparent connection, as the sleep-chasings of a perturbed mind. And it would seem, after all, as though these last quartettes of Beethoven should not be played in a large hall and before a large audience. They should rather be performed in a room of moderate size, and the hearers, few in number, should be in close communion with the players, so that at any moment one could say, "Please play those measures over again; I do not quite understand them."

The beautiful fantasie by Schubert is supposed to have been written in 1827, and the theme of the andante is taken from a well-known song written by him six years before. It was charmingly played. It is unnecessary to speak of the performance of the violinist, for all the qualities which so characterize his work—richness and breadth of tone, sure technique, pure intonation and rare musical intelligence—were displayed upon this occasion. Mr. Faelten played the pianoforte part exceedingly well, and when it was his duty to accompany the violin, he did not forget the words of the great Couperin, who once said: "When I play with violin or flute or oboe, I am not a player of a solo, I am an accompanist."

But in the Brahms quartette he was often unruly; at times his touch became absolutely hard and wooden, and he occasionally pounded. Nor was the playing of the other gentlemen entirely free from the charge of coarseness, which perhaps was not at variance with the composer's idea, for much of the quartette is rude in theme and in development. The most interesting movement, the most musical, is the andante con moto. The themes of the other movements are dull, however ingenious their development may be; in fact, the development is too ingenious, and Brahms, like the hewer of idols, seems to bow down to the work of his own hands and will not cease from adoring it. As in many other works of this talented man, so it is in this quartette—he does not know when he has said enough.

The date of the third concert is Dec. 29.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sixth concert, on Saturday evening, Nov. 22, offered the following programme:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major.
Haydn: Concerto in D, for violoncello.
(First time in Boston.)
Smetana: Symphonic poem, "Vltava."
(First time in Boston.)
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Soloist, Mr. Anton Hekking.

Beethoven's earliest symphony, first performed in April, 1800, at Vienna, written therefore a little before he had reached the age of thirty, cannot be measured with his greater symphonies which followed it, yet it was worthy to usher in the immortal nine. It is a refreshing thing to hear after so many ambitious efforts of more recent or contemporary composers. It has throughout the charm of youth and freshness. It is thoroughly musical and has more that is characteristic of the man, more of his individuality, than it has commonly had credit for. It is full of life and verve, full of beauty; it is clear and bright and unmistakable in its intentions; its appeal is irresistible; it charms the listener onward. The very opening, the first chord of the Adagio which leads in the Allegro (con brio), being the chord of C with the flat seventh added and resolving into F, as if that were the key of the piece,—a bold innovation which must have startled the pedants—shows already the original and independent spirit of one who has something of his own to say and means to say it in his own way. A few more strong chords bring us firmly upon the ground of the real C-major key of the piece. Bright and brave and resolute the Allegro springs forth, and the second theme (oboe seconded by flute) is well contrasted by its gentler, sweeter charm; and all is worked out with consummate mastery and beauty to the end. The instrumentation, though not of the fullest, is all significant and telling; the ever-young Beethoven blitheness and thrilling vitality and healthiness of tone, which you feel in the opening of the eighth symphony, pervades the movement, overshadowed now and then by darker modulations, which creep in with low bassoon tones, with an effect at once mystical and clear. Yes, if it sounds now and then like Mozart, it is genuine Beethoven and none other, an earnest of what is to come from the same source later. The second movement, andante cantabile con moto, while it reminds of Mozart, is one of exquisite beauty both in spirit and in form. The Minuet, foreshadowing the Scherzo to which the force of his genius was already drawing him, is simple yet playfully inventive, and so is the trio, although it resembles some of Haydn's. The finale, with its quaint, tentative adagio introduction, feeling its way up to the Allegro vivace, which shoots forth with irrepressible elasticity, is again quite Beethovenish, for instance, in its frequent syncopated rhythms, always characteristic of the master. The whole work was admirably rendered, Mr. Nikisch handling it con amore, we may say.

The masterly violoncellist, Mr. Hekking, had unearthed from Haydn's multifarious store, including concertos for all sorts of instruments, among them five or six for the 'cello, a work that has long lain virtually buried. It is of course an artistic piece of work and not without beauty, particularly the middle movement, the Adagio, which is short and sweet. The first movement, Allegro, while it contains much that is interesting, and while it surprised us in offering so much room for virtuosity, was somewhat dull, conventional and long, even without the inordinate and seemingly interminable length of the str ange and uncongenial cadenza composed into it by Reinecke. That seemed as if the performer were hopelessly lost in a wandering reverie of improvised virtuosity, so spellbound that he could not find an end and exit. There was little left for the orchestra when he did get home. Moreover, the beautiful Adagio suffered on account of that cadenza. The Rondo finale again was rather commonplace though short. Mr. Hekking's execution was that of an artist, while hardly up to his best.

Refreshing after this was the symphonic poem by Smetana. A German musical lexicon calls him "an enthusiastic follower of the Berliz-Liszt-Wagner direction;" but we confess we found no offensive manifestations of that tendency in "Vitava," which we are told is another name for the river Moldau, which flows through the city of Prague. Smetana was born in Bohemia, spent much of his life in Prague, where he died at the age of sixty, in 1884. He was one of the masters of his countryman, Dvorak. He was for a time a pupil of Liszt, under whose instruction he became a remarkable pianist. He was a thoroughly national Czeck composer, and wrote a number of operas in the Czeck or Bohemian language. Probably it was under Liszt's influence that he turned his attention to the symphonic poem form of composition. "Vitava" is one of three parts embraced in a "cyclus" called "My Fatherland." We are indebted to Mr. Wilson's Bulletin for the composer's programme of this portion. Two springs take their course in a shady Bohemian forest; they unite and glitter in the morning sun. The brook grows to the mighty river Moldau, which flows into the Elbe. As it traverses the forests, hunting horns and cries are heard. It winds through meadows and farms. Then follows a wedding; wood and water nymphs, disporting themselves by moonlight in glistening waters; mirrored towers and castles; the Johannis cataract breaking through the rocky clefts in the broad river bed; until it rolls majestically to Prague. And so on. This thread is easily followed in the music. It opens charmingly with the "rippling waters" of two streams meeting, beautifully represented by the two flutes. Breadth and deeper color come with the oboe and clarinet. The current ardent with the bassoons, cellos, and whole orchestra. All fascinating, until the more violent fermentation and fury of the cataract portion, which is noisy and less interesting, and suggests the idea that the full-grown river Moldau was behaving badly, as it did a few months since, when the ancient and historic St. Nepomuc bridge, or Carlsbrücke, gave way before its turbulence and sank, stones and statues, into the stream. The music ends, however, in a self-possessed, triumphant tone, as if in praise of Wallenstein's historic city. The work employs the full modern orchestra, with harps and Janissary music. On the whole it proved very enjoyable, fascinating in the earlier portion. And it was wonderfully well played. So, too, was the concluding number of the programme, the never-failing overture to "Oberon," in which Weber's romantic fairy imagination and invention reaches the very [illegible] as well as music. The magic horn was exquisitely sounded; the mingled laughter of fine fairy voices in the wood-wind was as witching and as delicate as one could wish; the strings were perfect; and the sudden burst of fortissimo, which startles even when you most expect it, came with absolute precision, giving the over-zealous tympanist a rightful opportunity. We could wish, however, that as a rule throughout the concert he could be induced to drum with less irrepressible furor.

The next concert has a very different sort of programme except in the first piece: Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2; and the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz.

J. S. D.

Sunday Night Entertainments.

The largest audience of the series was present at Music Hall last evening at the sixth of the popular concerts, the great increase in attendance being due to the fact that Miss Lillian Russell was to make her only appearance in Boston for the passing season. Other performers were: Miss Edith Christie, violinist; A. H. Knoll and Marie McNeil, cornet players, and an orchestra of twenty, under the direction of William Reitzel. The following was the programme:

Overture, "Beautiful Galatea".....Suppé
Cornet solo, "Polka Brilliante".....Knoll
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Haydn".....Leonard
Soprano solo, "Dites lui".....Offenbach
Serenade for strings, "Angels' Whisper".....Somerlatt
Cornet solo, "Inflammatus".....Rossini
Violin solos, Cavatina.....Bohn
Mazurka.....Wieniawski
Concert Waltz, "Autumn Roses".....Strauss
Waltz song, "Oh! we hapless Prime Donne"..Millöcker
Cornet duet, Air and variations.....Levy
Selections, "Falka".....Chassaigne

As Miss Russell stepped upon the stage she was greeted with an enthusiasm that a Patti might have exi ected, and the large audience did not seem contented until she had responded to recalls after each selection and had reappeared to bow her acknowledgments. Her pure, true voice is richer in tone than when she was last heard here in opera, and is handled with much greater skill than formerly. The crudities that once marred her singing are all elimi. nated and her delivery of light music is thoroughly pleasing. The selection from "The Grand Duchess" was sung with excellent effect, and the new waltz-song from "Poor Jonathan" was given with great brilliancy. Miss Christie is a violinist of ability and plays with accuracy, but lacks the strength necessary for some of her selections. Miss McNeil gave her solo in a pleasing manner, but the mutilation of the "Inflammatus" by Mr. Knoll was ear-splitting. The orchestra played its selections in a satisfactory manner, but its accompaniment of Miss Russell was wretched and that she was able to finish "Dites lui" with the players around her all at sea is greatly to her credit.

Next Sunday the Strauss orchestra will give its farewell concert in this city and a week later the Campanini-Del Puente Concert Company will be heard.

Not in a score of years had Professor G. R. Cromwell given a lecture in this city until last

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH SINGS IN PROVIDENCE.—PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sang for the first time before an American audience in this city this evening. She was five times recalled.

NIKISCH.—At the sixth of the season's symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, last Saturday evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the program consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn's concerto for violoncello; Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava," and Weber's overture "Oberon." The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 30, 1890.

Sensational Works on the Symphony Programme.

There is no doubt about it—Mr. Nikisch is not in sympathy with Berlioz music or with Berlioz morbidity. The famous "Fantastic Symphony" (and well named, too,) failed to make as vivid an impression as when the Harvard Musical Association offered it to Boston's attention 10 years ago. With an orchestra so responsive to the leader's thought as the Boston Symphony players it is quite impossible for the artists to express what the conductor himself does not feel. There was, of course, no shortcoming in skill—the wild measures of the witch scene were given as faultlessly as the lovely adagio. But the Berlioz score, which often seems like the setting of some of De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium Eater" to eccentric music, is obviously not in Mr. Nikisch's line. Perhaps only a Frenchman could give this strange symphony a really effective reading, but both the Harvards and the famous Boston corps of musicians, under another director, were much more successful than the present conductor. However, no man excels in all things, and to interpret the poetic thought of Beethoven and Schumann and Schubert as Mr. Nikisch is privileged to do is surely a glorious endowment.

The "Euryanthe" overture, given with delightful smoothness, began the seventh Symphony programme of the season. An arrangement of Liszt's brilliant Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F, was the closing selection. One who has heard this striking work performed by a pianist is apt to feel that no adroit use of orchestra can suffice to attain the precise effect of the composition as Liszt originally gave it to the concert stage. But the adaptation was performed with a great deal of appreciation, as well as with much spirit and fire, and there was hearty applause for the orchestra's good work.

Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist at this week's concert. He will perform a concerto by Goldmark, which has not been given as yet in Boston. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and Schumanny's great symphony in C major are also to be performed on this occasion.

Handel and Haydn Society.

SEVENTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1890-91.

MUSIC HALL.

FOUR CONCERTS.

Sunday Evening, Dec. Dec. 21,
THE MESSIAH—Handel.

Sunday Evening, Feb. 1,
STABAT MATER—Dvorak.

Good Friday Evening, March 27,
ST. MATTHEW PASSION MUSIC—Bach.

Easter Sunday Ev'g, March 29,
ST. JOHN—Parker.
HYMN OF PRAISE—Mendelssohn.

The Great Chorus of the Society.
A FULL ORCHESTRA.
An Attractive List of Solo Singers.
Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor.
Mr. B. J. LANG, Organist.

Season tickets for present subscribers ready for delivery on Monday, Dec. 8.
The sale of season tickets to the general public opens on Tuesday, Dec. 9. Prices $4 and $6, according to location.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The patrons of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had a programme to listen to last evening which was well calculated to test their patience, the compositions being the "Euryanthe" overture, Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," and Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody." It appears a hopeless task to convince Mr. Nikisch of the injustice he is showing in his conduct of the present season's concerts, or to hope for any change in his course of action. Such programmes as that of last evening would not attract a hundred patrons if presented merely upon its merits, and no sane amusement manager would ever contemplate announcing such a list of works with any hope of calling out the support of the Boston public.

The fact that Director Nikisch is absolute dictator in the conduct of these concerts puts the entire responsibility for such programmes as are given upon his shoulders, and, as he has ample financial means placed at his command, there is no excuse he can offer for so persistently denying the Symphony concert patrons the class of attractions they are entitled to expect. The result of this injudicious action may be delayed, for the Boston public is notably a long suffering community, but the dire calamity that befell the Humpty Dumpty of childhood's time will not be a circumstance to that which will, eventually, follow an adherence to the present policy of Director Nikisch in these concerts.

The familiar overture was played with many changes from the accepted readings in former seasons, and the stronger contrasts brought out by Mr. Nikisch had the effect of giving a new interest to the grand composition. The playing of the Berlioz symphonie displayed the resources of the organization in all their completeness, and, if the director failed to realize all the possibilities of the remarkable composition, he succeeded in giving it a performance that was vastly interesting. The scenes of the ball, depicted in the second movement, were given with fascinating grace, and the duet, which introduces the scenes in the fields, has never had such a perfect interpretation. The "reverie," in which the composer is said to have had the idea of realizing for a while a young musician whose soul is consumed by that indefinite yearning, that soul sickness, which has been called the "vague passion," comes near to being artistic noise, and Mr. Nikisch failed to show any better reason for its performance than his predecessors in this duty have done in former years. The weird and unearthly sounds of the last movement were given with realistic effect, and the fantastic scenes depicted by the composer in this portion of the work were splendidly brought out. The second Hungarian rhapsody is not a novelty, and it has had much better performances in former seasons than that of last evening.

Next Saturday evening the programme will be: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolan"; Goldmark's concerto for violin, and Schumann's symphony in C major No. 2, the soloist being Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be heard for the first time in this vicinity at the Sanders Theatre concert next Thursday evening, when she will sing Ratti's song, "Traumkonig und sein Lieb," with orchestra, as well as songs with piano accompaniment.

THE NORTHWESTERN CONGREGATIONALIST.
Nov. 28, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was the writer's good fortune recently totat end four concerts given by this noted organization, successively in Boston, Cambridge, New York and Washington. Residents of St. Paul and Minneapolis will not soon forget the visit of this orchestra to the twin cities last spring and the impression then made. It is a much greater pleasure, however, to hear the orchestra in its Music Hall environment, or in the midst of the culture of Eastern cities. Here is its home; here its most earnest efforts are put forth, and here there gather audiences whose musical appreciation is of the very highest.

To speak in praise of the orchestra is superfluous. A prophet may be without honor in his own country, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the pride of New England's capital. To witness the packed audiences which gather twice a week in Music Hall ("gather" is a tame word; "rush together" would be more literally correct) is enough to demonstrate the high degree of popularity which this organization has attained. And its popularity is due to no "craze;" it is based upon recognized merit. Nowhere in the world has this orchestra a superior, probably not even an equal. Its interpretation of the greatest musical masterpieces is beyond criticism—although here and there a barking dog is occasionally heard. Under the successive leadership of Mr. Henschel, Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch, it has attained a proficiency as nearly perfect as any rational man could ask. The last named, particularly, is an ideal conductor,—one who secures from his men the most complete and minute obedience and at the same time wins their respect and love.

If, as many wise men insist, listening to pure and elevated music has a much higher end than that of simple enjoyment,—if, indeed, it may be accounted a spiritual exercise of no slight value, Mr. Nikisch and his band are accomplishing a most worthy moral mission. Certainly it is difficult to see how anyone can go forth from one of their concerts without a new impulse toward better things. G.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1890

MUSIC.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.....Liszt

Hector Berlioz is even now a demi-legendary character. His personality is greater than his music; this personality would have raised him above his fellows, had he been physician, as his father wished, or advocate or merchant; his life would have still been tempest-tossed, for had not the passions met him even in peaceful paths, he would have left those paths to encounter them. Around such characters myths gather.

It is the man Berlioz who creates enthusiasm and hero-worship, and this in spite of much of his music. It is the haughty soul which despised popular applause that interests us: the mad lover of Estelle, Camille and Henrietta Smithson; the worshipper of Shakspere, who cries out, "O, Hamlet, profound creation of the poet, what injury have you done me!"; the man of imagination who heard in the notes of clarinets the voices of beloved women; the critic, who, with biting sarcasm, fought single-handed the press of Paris; the victim of cruel fate, who, crushed by repeated blows, dragged out his closing days, solitary, silent, morose. His memoirs are an Iliad of woes. His letters are the shrieks of a tortured soul. His face was such as Hoffmann would have drawn when at night surrounded by evil spirits seen by him alone he wrote his wild, fantastic tales.

Berlioz, the musician, was great rather in influence and in suggestion than in actual works. For he was comparatively poor in melody, and he rebelled against the routine and drudgery of the school. Gifted to an extraordinary degree in the art of expressing ideas, his ideas themselves are too often not worthy of utterance. Master of instrumentation, playing upon a gigantic orchestra as easily as a harp player who sweeps carelessly the wires of the harp, his melodies were born with pangs; they came into the world by means of the Cæsarean operation. He dreamed of music which, only heard in dreams, could never be expressed, for his imagination was warmer than his hand was skilled. He was a colorist who revelled in gorgeous hues; but he could not draw. And so, as Heine put it, his music suggests visions of extinct enormous beasts, the hanging gardens of Semiramis, the marvels of Nineveh, the daring buildings of Mizrain; and at times his music became "the music of the Sphinx."

So that although his influence was great, although he led the way to Liszt and Wagner, as musician, as writer of music, he was not the equal of Camille Saint-Saëns or younger men of the modern French school, who nevertheless hail him master. For he was a composer of magnificent, overwhelming fragments; but he never could have written such artistic masterpieces as the "Danse Macabre" or the music to "L'Arlésienne."

Take, for example, the symphony played last Saturday. Compare with the work itself the letters written by Berlioz in February and April, 1830, to Humbert Ferrand, in which he tells of his purpose in writing the symphony. He first reproaches the woman he loves; "She is in London, and yet I feel her near me; all my memories awake and join in lacerating me; I hear my heart beat, and its pulsations shake me as the strokes of the piston of a steam engine; in my symphony will the development of my infernal passion be painted." For its proper performance he wished an orchestra of two hundred and twenty players.

Berlioz, in writing this symphony, forgot two things, the difficulty, if not impossibility, of expressing in symphonic music the sufferings and nightmares which were episodes in the life of his artist, and the great danger that the hearer, not being in sympathy, not being a man of like imagination, would be unable "to dilate with the right emotion," and that which was a matter of life or death to the composer would then be of little interest, or would seem grotesque to the hearer. For it is hard to receive in the spirit of the one who gives, as is the case with many a letter which, opened after the delay of passage, often offends, or suggests what was foreign to the writer's mind. It is in vain for the composer of programme music to say, "I mean this, I mean that"; the hearer will reply, "To me, it means something else." The hearer hears the music as music, and judges it accordingly; the great question is not whether the music means this or that, the great question is this: Is the music good or bad?

This symphony is certainly a remarkable work, and, when the age and studies of Berlioz are taken into account, it is a gigantic work. It is uneven throughout; parts are of surpassing beauty, parts are of inimitable dulness; and as often happens when Berlioz strains himself and calls upon unheard-of combinations to enforce his meaning, his failure is complete. The last movement, with its spasms, its frantic convulsions, its grewsome introduction of the plain song for the burial of the dead—this sabbatic revel, this mockery of the Dies Iræ with its infernal din of rasped strings and brass and gong does not awake the chill horror aroused by Charon's horn in the opera of Gluck or by the simple chords which lead the Commendatore to his vengeance upon rakehelly Don Giovanni. Nor is the first movement so descriptive of the flames and doubts of passion as many an unnamed movement of Mozart written for a small orchestra or many an allegro confided by Beethoven to the cold keys of a pianoforte. On the other hand, what can be more expressive than the other movements; the sparkle and grace of the ball scene, the loneliness of the fields, the march to the scaffold with the footsteps, the murmurs of the curious, shuddering crowd. The symphony is a treatise upon instrumentation, and like all theoretical books is sometimes tiresome. The fever of the first and last movements often breaks out in delirium, in insane cries; its repose often sinks into somnolence. But the individuality of Hector Berlioz is seen in every page; the good and the bad are characteristic of the man.

When one considers the difficulties of the work, the performance of Saturday is worthy of praise. It was perhaps impossible to answer the requirements of Berlioz's score, and Mr. Nikisch certainly gave the work most careful, respectful attention. But he who wishes to hear this symphony played as Berlioz would have wished it must hear it in Paris, played by Colonne's men. For the ravings of despair, the satanic glee which welcomes the arrival of the lost soul, under Mr. Nikisch's direction became the temporary aberration of a respectable man who, awaking from unpleasant dreams and refreshed by the bath, pursues undisturbed the business of the day. The drunken frenzy of an absinthe-heated lover and the glitter of a [illegible] of passion, Colonne does not forget the niceties of detail so insisted upon by Berlioz. Now, Mr. Nikisch does not love detail.

The other numbers of the programme were more or less familiar. Mr. Nikisch gave us the Weber overtures last year. This year he gives them again, but in a different order. The "Euryanthe" overture has been better played by this same orchestra, and under Mr. Nikisch, than it was at this last concert.

The Liszt rhapsody was given with all the requisite fire and swing, and the musical embroideries were delicately worked. Unlike many of the compositions of Liszt, which are pompous and unmeaning, or brutal and vulgar, these rhapsodies, whether for orchesta or pianoforte, do not tire. In them appears the truer, better side of Liszt's nature: for here he is natural, he is the Hungarian, "who cares only for love, song, the dance and drink." In these rhapsodies live the Hungarian's violent passions, passions without constraint, "without the necessity of hypocrisy." And it is as though the orchestra became a band where violins are tuned a semitone above our diapason and a gypsy beats capriciously the czymbalum.

The programme of the concert for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Goldmark's concerto for the violin, and Schumann's symphony in C major. Mr. Kneisel will play the solo violin part of the concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1890.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The seventh Symphony programme was:

Weber...Overture, "Euryanthe."
Berlioz..."Symphonie Fantastique," op. 14, A.
Reverie: Passion.
A Ball
In the Fields.
March to the Gallows.
The Witches' Revel.
Liszt....Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F.

Mr. Nikisch put more devil into his performance of Berlioz's youthful nightmare than his immediate predecessor was wont to do; the "March to the Gallows" was grimly effective, and the Sabbatical Rondo, as the last movement is sometimes known, was a feast of horrors. Perhaps this Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz pictures his intense and original nature and pictorial style quite as well as any of the greater and finer works which he wrote later on. Where is there in all modern music another such movement as the "March to the Gallows"? But in giving rein to his imagination there is in the first movement a vagueness of expression which is the result of youthful fitfulness and indecision. The Ball scene is exquisite. The "Scene in the Fields," though not the pastoral which Beethoven wrote, is an idyl of another school; its tranquillity and darkness are alike eloquent. In the March, and the "Witches Revel," with its mocking "Dies Irae," is shown the climax of invention and execution. Berlioz defies analysis in these moods; they carry all before them; the listener droops with fatigue in the excitement. In the performance, as formerly here, one harp did the work of four, and two tympani with two players, instead of four with four players, were employed; but there was a better substitute for the bells than usual. Mr. Nikisch read the work with exceeding skilfulness, not only minding the stereotyped expression marks, but going under the surface in every movement for the composer's primal meaning; he certainly got it in the last two movements. While the playing of the orchestra calls for great praise in respect to precision of movement, observance of contrasting rhythmic values, which are such an important feature in the dramatic scheme, and for the high quality of expression of individual groups of players; for example, how exquisitely was the oboe played in the leading phrases of the slow movement, and Mr. Sautet's phrasing too, 'twas most artistic. The entire string band was admirable in its incisiveness, and in the Ball scene obedient to the slightest indication of the conductor. One drummer took unto himself a mate, and the pair beat wisely if not too well; their mimic thunder in the slow movement was a very artistic subterfuge. The "Fantastic" symphony had a sequel in "Lelio," a lyrical melodrama, with orchestra, choruses, and solos. It consists of six numbers, which show Berlioz in all his moods, at his best and at his worst, the orchestral portions, particularly the "Hymn to Happiness," being most typical. "Lelio" was completed in Italy in 1832. The story is that of Berlioz's own love for Miss Smithson. As "Lelio" has never been performed in this country, and the score and parts are published, and an English version of the choruses and of the lines to be read, was made by Mr. W. Grist of London, for the performance there of the entire work (Crystal Palace, Nov. 12, 1887), why, here is a good chance for some enterprising conductor to attract the right kind of attention to himself and his organization, by performing the "Symphonie Fantastique" and "Lelio" in one programme.

The "Euryanthe" overture Mr. Nikisch conducted last year. Is even the Weberian list as narrow as this? Liszt's Hungarian music was finely played. There was a large audience and frequent applause. The next programme presents Mr. Kneisel as solist. He will play Goldmark's violin concerto, a new work here. The orchestral selections will be Schumann's C major symphony, and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

[50]

Boston Sunday Globe

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 30, 1890.

Sensational Works on the Symphony Programme.

There is no doubt about it—Mr. Nikisch is not in sympathy with Berlioz music or with Berlioz morbidity. The famous "Fantastic Symphony" (and well named, too,) failed to make as vivid an impression as when the Harvard Musical Association offered it to Boston's attention 10 years ago. With an orchestra so responsive to the leader's thought as the Boston Symphony players it is quite impossible for the artists to express what the conductor himself does not feel. There was, of course, no shortcoming in skill—the wild measures of the witch scene were given as faultlessly as the lovely adagio. But the Berlioz score, which often seems like the setting of some of De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium Eater" to eccentric music, is obviously not in Mr. Nikisch's line. Perhaps only a Frenchman could give this strange symphony a really effective reading, but both the Harvards and the famous Boston corps of musicians, under another director, were much more successful than the present conductor. However, no man excels in all things, and to interpret the poetic thought of Beethoven and Schumann and Schubert as Mr. Nikisch is privileged to do is surely a glorious endowment.

The "Euryanthe" overture, given with delightful smoothness, began the seventh Symphony programme of the season. An arrangement of Liszt's brilliant Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F, was the closing selection. One who has heard this striking work performed by a pianist is apt to feel that no adroit use of orchestra can suffice to attain the precise effect of the composition as Liszt originally gave it to the concert stage. But the adaptation was performed with a great deal of appreciation, as well as with much spirit and fire, and there was hearty applause for the orchestra's good work.

Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist at this week's concert. He will perform a concerto by Goldmark, which has not been given as yet in Boston. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and Schumanny's great symphony in C major are also to be performed on this occasion.

Handel and Haydn Society.

SEVENTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1890-91.

MUSIC HALL.

FOUR CONCERTS.

Sunday Evening, Dec. Dec. 21,
THE MESSIAH—Handel.

Sunday Evening, Feb. 1,
STABAT MATER—Dvorak.

Good Friday Evening, March 27,
ST. MATTHEW PASSION MUSIC—Bach.

Easter Sunday Ev'g, March 29,
ST. JOHN—Parker.
HYMN OF PRAISE—Mendelssohn.

The Great Chorus of the Society.
A FULL ORCHESTRA.
An Attractive List of Solo Singers.
Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor.
Mr. B. J. LANG, Organist.

Season tickets for present subscribers ready for delivery on Monday, Dec. 8.
The sale of season tickets to the general public opens on Tuesday, Dec. 9. Prices $4 and $6, according to location.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 30, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The patrons of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had a programme to listen to last evening which was well calculated to test their patience, the compositions being the "Euryanthe" overture, Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," and Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody." It appears a hopeless task to convince Mr. Nikisch of the injustice he is showing in his conduct of the present season's concerts, or to hope for any change in his course of action. Such programmes as that of last evening would not attract a hundred patrons if presented merely upon its merits, and no sane amusement manager would ever contemplate announcing such a list of works with any hope of calling out the support of the Boston public.

The fact that Director Nikisch is absolute dictator in the conduct of these concerts puts the entire responsibility for such programmes as are given upon his shoulders, and, as he has ample financial means placed at his command, there is no excuse he can offer for so persistently denying the Symphony concert patrons the class of attractions they are entitled to expect. The result of this injudicious action may be delayed, for the Boston public is notably a long suffering community, but the dire calamity that befell the Humpty Dumpty of childhood's time will not be a circumstance to that which will, event ually, follow an adherence to the present policy of Director Nikisch in these concerts.

The familiar overture was played with many changes from the accepted readings in former seasons, and the stronger contrasts brought out by Mr. Nikisch had the effect of giving a new interest to the grand composition. The playing of the Berlioz symphonie displayed the resources of the organization in all their completeness, and, if the director failed to realize all the possibilities of the remarkable composition, he succeeded in giving it a performance that was vastly interesting. The scenes of the ball, depicted in the second movement, were given with fascinating grace, and the duet, which introduces the scenes in the fields, has never had such a perfect interpretation. The "reverie," in which the composer is said to have had the idea of realizing for a while a young musician whose soul is consumed by that indefinite yearning, that soul sickness, which has been called the "vague passion," comes near to being artistic noise, and Mr. Nikisch failed to show any better reason for its performance than his predecessors in this duty have done in former years. The weird and unearthly sounds of the last movement were given with realistic effect, and the fantastic scenes depicted by the composer in this portion of the work were splendidly brought out. The second Hungarian rhapsody is not a novelty, and it has had much better performances in former seasons than that of last evening.

Next Saturday evening the programme will be: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolan"; Goldmark's concerto for violin, and Schumann's symphony in C major No. 2, the soloist being Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be heard for the first time in this vicinity at the Sanders Theatre concert next Thursday evening, when she will sing Rafi's song, "Traumkonig und sein Lieb," with orchestra, as well as songs with piano accompaniment.

THE NORTHWESTERN CONGREGATIONALIST.

Nov. 28, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was the writer's good fortune recently totat end four concerts given by this noted organization, successively in Boston, Cambridge, New York and Washington. Residents of St. Paul and Minneapolis will not soon forget the visit of this orchestra to the twin cities last spring and the impression then made. It is a much greater pleasure, however, to hear the orchestra in its Music Hall environment, or in the midst of the culture of Eastern cities. Here is its home; here its most earnest efforts are put forth, and here there gather audiences whose musical appreciation is of the very highest.

To speak in praise of the orchestra is superfluous. A prophet may be without honor in his own country, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the pride of New England's capital. To witness the packed audiences which gather twice a week in Music Hall ("gather" is a tame word; "rush together" would be more literally correct) is enough to demonstrate the high degree of popularity which this organization has attained. And its popularity is due to no "craze;" it is based upon recognized merit. Nowhere in the world has this orchestra a superior, probably not even an equal. Its interpretation of the greatest musical masterpieces is beyond criticism—although here and there a barking dog is occasionally heard. Under the successive leadership of Mr. Henschel, Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch, it has attained a proficiency as nearly perfect as any rational man could ask. The last named, particularly, is an ideal conductor,—one who secures from his men the most complete and minute obedience and at the same time wins their respect and love.

If, as many wise men insist, listening to pure and elevated music has a much higher end than that of simple enjoyment,—if, indeed, it may be accounted a spiritual exercise of no slight value, Mr. Nikisch and his band are accomplishing a most worthy moral mission. Certainly it is difficult to see how anyone can go forth from one of their concerts, without a new impulse toward better things. G.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1890

MUSIC.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.....Liszt

Hector Berlioz is even now a demi-legendary character. His personality is greater than his music; this personality would have raised him above his fellows, had he been physician, as his father wished, or advocate or merchant; his life would have still been tempest-tossed, for had not the passions met him even in peaceful paths, he would have left those paths to encounter them. Around such characters myths gather.

It is the man Berlioz who creates enthusiasm and hero-worship, and this in spite of much of his music. It is the haughty soul which despised popular applause that interests us: the mad lover of Estelle, Camille and Henrietta Smithson; the worshipper of Shakspere, who cries out, "O, Hamlet, profound creation of the poet, what injury have you done me!"; the man of imagination who heard in the notes of clarinets the voices of beloved women; the critic, who, with biting sarcasm, fought single-handed the press of Paris; the victim of cruel fate, who, crushed by repeated blows, dragged out his closing days, solitary, silent, morose. His memoirs are an Iliad of woes. His letters are the shrieks of a tortured soul. His face was such as Hoffmann would have drawn when at night surrounded by evil spirits seen by him alone he wrote his wild, fantastic tales.

Berlioz, the musician, was great rather in influence and in suggestion than in actual works. For he was comparatively poor in melody, and he rebelled against the routine and drudgery of the school. Gifted to an extraordinary degree in the art of expressing ideas, his ideas themselves are too often not worthy of utterance. Master of instrumentation, playing upon a gigantic orchestra as easily as a harp player who sweeps carelessly the wires of the harp, his melodies were born with pangs; they came into the world by means of the Cæsarean operation. He dreamed of music which, only heard in dreams, could never be expressed, for his imagination was warmer than his hand was skilled. He was a colorist who revelled in gorgeous hues; but he could not draw. And so, as Heine put it, his music suggests visions of extinct enormous beasts, the hanging gardens of Semiramis, the marvels of Nineveh, the daring buildings of Mizrain; and at times his music became "the music of the Sphinx."

So that although his influence was great, although he led the way to Liszt and Wagner, as musician, as writer of music, he was not the equal of Camille Saint-Saëns or younger men of the modern French school, who nevertheless hail him master. For he was a composer of magnificent, overwhelming fragments; but he never could have written such artistic masterpieces as the "Danse Macabre" or the music to "L'Arlésienne."

Take, for example, the symphony played last Saturday. Compare with the work itself the letters written by Berlioz in February and April, 1830, to Humbert Ferrand, in which he tells of his purpose in writing the symphony. He first reproaches the woman he loves; "She is in London, and yet I feel her near me; all my memories awake and join in lacerating me; I hear my heart beat, and its pulsations shake me as the strokes of the piston of a steam engine; in my symphony will the development of my infernal passion be painted." For its proper performance he wished an orchestra of two hundred and twenty players.

Berlioz, in writing this symphony, forgot two things, the difficulty, if not impossibility, of expressing in symphonic music the sufferings and nightmares which were episodes in the life of his artist, and the great danger that the hearer, not being in sympathy, not being a man of like imagination, would be unable "to dilate with the right emotion," and that which was a matter of life or death to the composer would then be of little interest, or would seem grotesque to the hearer. For it is hard to receive in the spirit of the one who gives, as is the case with many a letter which, opened after the delay of passage, often offends, or suggests what was foreign to the writer's mind. It is in vain for the composer of programme music to say, "I mean this, I mean that"; the hearer will reply, "To me, it means something else." The hearer hears the music as music, and judges it accordingly; the great question is not whether the music means this or that, the great question is this: Is the music good or bad?

This symphony is certainly a remarkable work, and, when the age and studies of Berlioz are taken into account, it is a gigantic work. It is uneven throughout; parts are of surpassing beauty, parts are of inimitable dulness; and as often happens, when Berlioz strains himself and calls upon unheard-of combinations to enforce his meaning, his failure is complete. The last movement, with its spasms, its frantic convulsions, its grewsome introduction of the plain song for the burial of the dead—this sabbatic revel, this mockery of the Dies Iræ with its infernal din of rasped strings and brass and gong does not awake the chill horror aroused by Charon's horn in the opera of Gluck or by the simple chords which lead the Commendatore to his vengeance upon rakehelly Don Giovanni. Nor is the first movement so descriptive of the flames and doubts of passion as many an unnamed movement of Mozart written for a small orchestra or many an allegro confided by Beethoven to the cold keys of a pianoforte. On the other hand, what can be more expressive than the other movements; the sparkle and grace of the ball scene, the loneliness of the fields, the march to the scaffold with the footsteps, the murmurs of the curious, shuddering crowd. The symphony is a treatise upon instrumentation, and like all theoretical books is sometimes tiresome. The fever of the first and last movements often breaks out in delirium, in insane cries; its repose often sinks into somnolence. But the individuality of Hector Berlioz is seen in every page; the good and the bad are characteristic of the man.

When one considers the difficulties of the work, the performance of Saturday is worthy of praise. It was perhaps impossible to answer the requirements of Berlioz's score, and Mr. Nikisch certainly gave the work most careful, respectful attention. But he who wishes to hear this symphony played as Berlioz would have wished it must hear it in Paris, played by Colonne's men. For the ravings of despair, the satanic glee which welcomes the arrival of the lost soul, under Mr. Nikisch's direction became the temporary aberration of a respectable man who, awaking from unpleasant dreams and refreshed by the bath, pursues undisturbed the business of the day. The drunken frenzy of [illegible] and the glitter of a ball with its [illegible] of fair women [illegible] the imagination of a French leader devoutly worshipping the composer, and with hot blood in his own veins. Even in the very rage of passion, Colonne does not forget the niceties of detail so insisted upon by Berlioz. Now, Mr. Nikisch does not love detail.

The other numbers of the programme were more or less familiar. Mr. Nikisch gave us the Weber overtures last year. This year he gives them again, but in a different order. The "Euryanthe" overture has been better played by this same orchestra, and under Mr. Nikisch, than it was at this last concert.

The Liszt rhapsody was given with all the requisite fire and swing, and the musical embroideries were delicately worked. Unlike many of the compositions of Liszt, which are pompous and unmeaning, or brutal and vulgar, these rhapsodies, whether for orchesta or pianoforte, do not tire. In them appears the truer, better side of Liszt's nature: for here he is natural, he is the Hungarian, "who cares only for love, song, the dance and drink." In these rhapsodies live the Hungarian's violent passions, passions without constraint, "without the necessity of hypocrisy." And it is as though the orchestra became a band where violins are tuned a semitone above our diapason and a gypsy beats capriciously the czymbalum.

The programme of the concert for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Goldmark's concerto for the violin, and Schumann's symphony in C major. Mr. Kneisel will play the solo violin part of the concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1890.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The seventh Symphony programme was:

Weber...Overture, "Euryanthe."
Berlioz..."Symphonie Fantastique," op. 14, A.
Reverie: Passion.
A Ball
In the Fields.
March to the Gallows.
The Witches' Revel.
Liszt....Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F.

Mr. Nikisch put more devil into his performance of Berlioz's youthful nightmare than his immediate predecessor was wont to do; the "March to the Gallows" was grimly effective, and the Sabbatical Rondo, as the last movement is sometimes known, was a feast of horrors. Perhaps this Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz pictures his intense and original nature and pictorial style quite as well as any of the greater and finer works which he wrote later on. Where is there in all modern music another such movement as the "March to the Gallows"? But in giving rein to his imagination there is in the first movement a vagueness of expression which is the result of youthful fitfulness and indecision. The Ball scene is exquisite. The "Scene in the Fields," though not the pastoral which Beethoven wrote, is an idyl of another school; its tranquillity and darkness are alike eloquent. In the March, and the "Witches Revel," with its mocking "Dies Irae," is shown the climax of invention and execution. Berlioz defies analysis in these moods; they carry all before them; the listener droops with fatigue in the excitement. In the performance, as formerly here, one harp did the work of four, and two tympani with two players, instead of four with four players, were employed; but there was a better substitute for the bells than usual. Mr. Nikisch read the work with exceeding skilfulness, not only minding the stereotyped expression marks, but going under the surface in every movement for the composer's primal meaning; he certainly got it in the last two movements. While the playing of the orchestra calls for great praise in respect to precision of movement, observance of contrasting rhythmic values, which are such an important feature in the dramatic scheme, and for the high quality of expression of individual groups of players; for example, how exquisitely was the oboe played in the leading phrases of the slow movement, and Mr. Sautet's phrasing too, 'twas most artistic. The entire string band was admirable in its incisiveness, and in the Ball scene obedient to the slightest indication of the conductor. One drummer took unto himself a mate, and the pair beat wisely if not too well; their mimic thunder in the slow movement was a very artistic subterfuge. The "Fantastic" symphony had a sequel in "Lelio," a lyrical melodrama, with orchestra, choruses, and solos. It consists of six numbers, which show Berlioz in all his moods, at his best and at his worst, the orchestral portions, particularly the "Hymn to Happiness," being most typical. "Lelio" was completed in Italy in 1832. The story is that of Berlioz's own love for Miss Smithson. As "Lelio" has never been performed in this country, and the score and parts are published, and an English version of the choruses and of the lines to be read, was made by Mr. W. Grist of London, for the performance there of the entire work (Crystal Palace, Nov. 12, 1887), why, here is a good chance for some enterprising conductor to attract the right kind of attention to himself and his organization, by performing the "Symphonie Fantastique" and "Lelio" in one programme.

The "Euryanthe" overture Mr. Nikisch conducted last year. Is even the Weberian list as narrow as this? Liszt's Hungarian music was finely played. There was a large audience and frequent applause. The next programme presents Mr. Kneisel as solist. He will play Goldmark's violin concerto, a new work here. The orchestral selections will be Schumann's C major symphony, and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

[50]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

:: THIRD SEASON. :::

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL.

THE THIRD CONCERT OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENING,

JANUARY 5TH, 1891.

...Grand programme! Consisting of three ...musical compositions: one overture, truly ...clear and beautiful and full of spirit, an ...which sounds always new; one opium ...symphony (or quasi symphony); ...rather hackneyed Lisztian showpiece. ...opium dream, a morbid extravagan... indeed remarkable power for a pupil ...Conservatoire, and wonderful skill in in... with very little of thematic musi... development, indeed very little musical ...at all to work upon—for "programme" ...do not count in music—occupied the ...of the concert. It was not our first taste ...bottom of the unwholesome witch brew, ...by the cry for novelty, by young sensa... appetites, the Harvard Musical Associa... first gave it here in February and again in ...1880. Then we could imagine much of its ...and uncanny impression chargeable to ...conception and performance; now we are ...to doubt if the best of orchestras can ...it sound any fitter for survival. Of ...properly speaking, the whole work con... one theme, the love theme, or "fixed idea" ...the love-sick artist couples like a Leit... with each recurrence to his thought of ...object of his hopeless passion, and which ...enters in the second or Allgro part of No. ...after the vague reverie or Largo. Then it ...in all five movements; but never ...wrought into the thematic fibre of ...music; it only haunts us at intervals ...all sickly sentimental tunes are apt ...haunt, from which we pray to be delivered ...walks or on our pillows. The two parts ...have most music in them are "The Ball," ...has luscious instrumentation with a ...waltz tune softening into sadness ...as the fixed idea again besets the ..., and which of course won most ap...; and the Adagio, "In the Fields." In ...last the echoed melodious phrases of the ...'s pipe (English horn) with the "whis... leaves" and warm sunset coloring have ...poetic charm; and when the sky is ...and the distant thunder rolls, (a fine ...for our valiant drummer to show ...could for once rein in his noble ardor) ...silence followed quite impressively.

Then the real poison of the opium begins to work in dreams too terrible for music, in noise ugly and outrageous enough to be put under the ban of civil law. There is a grim solemnity and grandeur, to be sure, in the March to Execution; the measured march of the procession, the "pattering footsteps" of the murmuring crowd, the awful chant of the Dies Iræ, the tuba funèbre or passing bell, the startling apparition (so to say) of the lover's "fixed idea," once more the melancholy melody rudely cut short by the swift fall of the axe,—all this is sensationally terrible and worthy of the French-list of tragedies in novels or upon the stage. To real music lovers it could not have been edifying. Worse yet, insulting to true sensibilities and to honest music, insulting to the soul of poetry and art, is the last scene, "The Witches' Revel." Goethe's Mephisto could not conjure up so hideous a "Sabbath." Imps, witches, fiends and all unclean things make the orchestra resound with "yells, howls, cries of despair, and mocking and cruel laughter, the rejoicing over a fallen soul." And even in this pandemonium once more we hear that haunting melody, the fixed idea, but in a hellish way degraded and transformed into a vulgar caricature, a low dance tune, which has forfeited all its native charm, all its simplicity and purity. As we have said before now, he turns his heart's most sacred melody (this young artist lover) into a cheap dance-hall jig, and tricks it out with twirls and curls and meretricious ornaments, making a wanton of the maid he loved. Is it not monstrous? Can the opium theory excuse it? Possibly it might in actual ..., but what business has opium in the free, clear heavenly realm of art? When beauty, ideality, all poetry and purity are lost, art, too, is gone. Give us the most familiar symphony, sonata, overture or quartet of any of the classical composers rather than the most brilliant or dramatic "programme music" of the new, the over-ingenious, audacious, unideal, realistic masters of the latest fashions in the so-called art of music. How refreshing, what a God-send, what a precious bit of heaven's own sunshine would the most unpretentious symphony of Haydn have been after that harrowing "fantastique" and unwholesome dream of opium!

The heartless travesty of the love melody in this last scene leads us to call it up to mind again in its unsophisticated shape, and to ask ourselves how good a melody really is, after all? Is it free from sophistication at its best? We cannot help feeling that Robert Schumann was about right when he said that ... has something flat about it." We find the ...sion of its beauty does not stay with us ...those earlier hearings. "Somewhat impas... it is, and somewhat "timid," but we ...grant it "noble," as Berlioz would make ...his programme. On the contrary, it is mor..., sickly, cloying, and we soon weary of its ...petition. If it were more noble it would not ...corruptible, and would not suffer the witch ...of that worse than "Walpurgis Night." ...was there ever such a fiendish orgy, repre... by all the noisiest enginery of the ...orchestral art? How uncanny those occasional ...stuffed horn tones sounded! What an ..., stunning, coarse and vulgar ...of the brass basses in the caricature of the ...Dies Irae"! Smaller outrages upon human ...have been prohibited by law. And is ...music? Has it any rightful fellowship with ...symphonic art? Should it be admitted ...good musical society? Let us trust that ...is now satisfied about it, and let us ...musical enjoyment, artistic aliment and ...of other sources. But some there be ...have to suffer full of horrors better than they ...And such make up a certain quan... in large concert audiences. Some, too—a ...younger number—who are critical ...with the best, fancying ... all the marrow out of ..., Schubert, Mendelssohn ... Give us

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Adamowski Quartette Concert—The N. E. C. Club.

Again the exigency of two excellent chamber concerts on the same evening have forced the reviewer to attempt ubiquity, and once more the attempt to be in two places at once has been only partially successful. The audience in Steinert Hall last night was good sized as to quantity, and most representative as to quality, many of the leading musicians of Boston, being present. It is upon hearsay only that I can state that the Beethoven quartette was excellently given, but there was a trifle of roughness in the first movement of the Volkmann Quartette in G minor, which I came in season to listen to. The number, which probably created the most interest of the concert was Arthur Foote's Romanse in E major, which was performed by Mr. T. Adamowski and the author. It is a musicianly work, possessing interesting treatment even from the beginning. The imitations of the short, violin phrases by the piano were very piquant, and although the chief theme had a flavor reminiscent of "Hear ye Israel" in "Elijah," it was by no means such as suggested plagiarism.

Mr. Adamowski played this work like the great artist that he is, when he is at his best; the intonation was generally perfect, even in the highest positions, and the expressive quality with which he invested the violin part can scarcely be given too much commendation. Naturally the piano part was perfect in the hands of the composer. Both artists were cordially recalled. It is of necessity that I judge the whole edifice by these specimen bricks, but the programme so far as I was able to follow its numbers, was of great interest and worth.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

At Steinert Hall last evening the Adamowski Quartette gave the second concert of their third season. Despite the fact that Monday evenings are usually bespoken by the theatres with "first nights," the hall was well filled with a brilliant audience. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Quartette in G major, op. 18, No. 2.....Beethoven
Romance for violin and piano in E major, op. 9, No. 3.....Arthur Foote
Quartette in G minor, op. 14.....Volkmann

If the playing of the quartette was not altogether faultless, especially in the matter of intonation, there was some excellent work in the Beethoven G major. Aside from his uncertain tone at times, Mr. T. Adamowski's phrasing was not always pleasing and the opening bars of the slow movement were taken rather more slowly than even ad lib. required. But in the romance he played with verve, and gave good reason for the justly earned recall. Mr. Foote's composition has been given here before, and a rehearing only adds to the charming impression given then. The Volkmann number was interesting, but in lesser degree than the rendition.

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 2, 1890

The Adamowski Concerts.

The second of the subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall before an audience which made up in understanding and appreciation what it lacked in size. The numbers for the quartette were Beethoven's G major, Op. 18, No. 2, and Volkmann's G minor, Op. 14. These were given with the precision and finish to be expected of such artists as compose the organization. The second number of the evening was Mr. Arthur Foote's romance in E major, Op. 9, No. 3, for violin and piano, rendered by the composer himself and Mr. T. Adamowski. The last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DEC. 2, 1890.

The patrons of the Adamowski quartet concerts enjoyed the second concert of this organization at Steinert Hall last evening, when, with Mr. Arthur Foote's assistance, the following works were played: Quartet in G major, No. 2, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza for violin and piano in E major, Foote; quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-musicians acquitted themselves with great credit on this occasion, and Mr. Foote gave his usual excellent ... [illegible] enjoyable romance.

NEW HAVEN REGISTER, SUNDAY NOVEMBER 30.

Hyperion Theater. - NIKISCH.

As fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage.—N. Y. World.

Boston SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
(SECOND CONCERT.)

Monday Eve., Dec. 8, at 8.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The program includes Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso;" the Schumann Symphony in B flat No. 1; Dvorak's Scherzo Cappriccioso, etc.

MR. KNEISEL will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark.

The sale of seats opens to-morrow (Monday) at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chapel st.
n30 18u C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The second concert in the course given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at the Hyperion on Monday evening, December 8. The soloist for this occasion will be Franz Kneisel, who will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark. The program includes Listz's symphonic poem "Tasso," the Schumann symphony in B flat No. 1, and several other noted compositions. The concert promises to be one of the best of the series. The sale of seats will open to-morrow at Steinert's music store.

NEW HAVEN EVENING REGISTER, MONDAY, DECEMBER 1,

A week from to-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give another of its delightful concerts at the Hyperion theater. The sale of tickets assures a large house, and, as in former times, an appreciative and enthusiastic one.

The first three nights of this week "In-shavogue" will occupy the boards of the Grand Opera house. The play contains lots of [illegible] wit and wholesome

---

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Eng.
Date 12/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lovers of [illegible] music will welcome the announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, to be given in the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. The history and superb playing of this organization are alike familiar to the public of this city. In all essentials the membership is the same as last year, and the opening concerts of the season already given in Boston show that it has lost nothing of its superiority during the summer vacation. At the concerts in Concordia Hall it will appear in full ranks, and programmes of great attractiveness are promised. The sale of season tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open next Friday morning at Talbott's, 13 North Charles street.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa

Date 12-2

GENERAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert, at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, December 10. The programme will comprise works representative of the modern romantic school, from the compositions of Liszt, Dvorak, Goldmark and Schumann. The symphony will be that by the latter composer in B flat. Franz Kneisel will be the violin soloist.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1890.

The corrected Boston Symphony programme for this week is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for Violin, in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark (Mr. Franz Kneisel); Two Melodies for Strings, Grieg; Symphony, No. 2, in C, Schumann.

Tonight Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre Symphony concert. Her selections include Raff's "Dream King and His Love," and a group of songs. The orchestra will play Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosprous Voyage"; overture, two movements from Tscharkousky's fourth symphony, and Schumann's B flat symphony.

An interesting programme is announced for the eighth Sunday Popular at Music Hall, next Sunday evening, when Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Sig. Campanini, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone, and Mr. [illegible], 'cello, as soloists, will be assisted by the newly organized Boston [illegible]

[51]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh concert, Saturday evening, Nov. 29, offered a strange programme:

Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Berlioz—"Symphonie Fantastique," op. 14. A.
I. Reverie: Passion. (Largo; Allegro.)
II. A Ball. (Allegro non troppo.)
III. In the Fields. (Adagio.)
IV. March to the Gallows. (Allegro non troppo.)
V. The Witches' Revel. (Larghetto; Allegro assai.)
Liszt—Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F.

A strange programme! Consisting of three orchestral compositions: one overture, truly musical and beautiful and full of spirit, an overture which sounds always new; one opium (programme) symphony (or quasi symphony); and one rather hackneyed Lisztian showpiece. The Berlioz opium dream, a morbid extravaganza showing indeed remarkable power for a pupil of the Conservatoire, and wonderful skill in instrumentation, with very little of thematic musical development, indeed very little musical theme at all to work upon—for "programme" themes do not count in music—occupied the body of the concert. It was not our first taste in Boston of the unwholesome witch brew. Pushed by the cry for novelty, by young sensational appetites, the Harvard Musical Association first gave it here in February and again in Dec. 1880. Then we could imagine much of its sickly and uncanny impression chargeable to crude conception and performance; now we are forced to doubt if the best of orchestras can make it sound any fitter for survival. Of themes, properly speaking, the whole work contains but one, the love theme, or "fixed idea" with which the love-sick artist couples like a Leit-motif with each recurrence to his thought of the object of his hopeless passion, and which first enters in the second or Allgro part of No. 1, after the vague reverie or Largo. Then it haunts him in all five movements; but never is it wrought into the thematic fibre of the music; it only haunts us at intervals as all sickly sentimental tunes are apt to haunt, from which we pray to be delivered in our walks or on our pillows. The two parts which have most music in them are "The Ball," which has luscious instrumentation with a buoyant waltz tune softening into sadness (morbidezza) as the fixed idea again besets the dreamer, and which of course won most applause; and the Adagio, "In the Fields." In this last the echoed melodious phrases of the shepherd's pipe (English horn) with the "whispering leaves" and warm sunset coloring have a certain poetic charm; and when the sky is blackened and the distant thunder rolls (a fine opportunity for our valiant drummer to show that he could for once rein in his noble ardor) deep silence followed quite impressively.

Then the real poison of the opium begins to work in dreams too terrible for music, in noise ugly and outrageous enough to be put under the ban of civil law. There is a grim solemnity and grandeur, to be sure, in the March to Execution; the measured march of the procession, the "pattering footsteps" of the murmuring crowd, the awful chant of the Dies Iræ, the glas funèbre or passing bell, the startling apparition (so to say) of the lover's "fixed idea," once more the melancholy melody rudely cut short by the swift fall of the axe,—all this is sensationally terrible and worthy of the Frenchiest of tragedies in novels or upon the stage. To real music lovers it could not have been edifying. Worse yet, insulting to true sensibilities and to honest music, insulting to the soul of poetry and art, is the last scene, "The Witches' Revel." Goethe's Mephisto could not conjure up so hideous a "Sabbath." Imps, witches, fiends and all unclean things make the orchestra resound with "yells, howls, cries of despair, and mocking and cruel laughter, the rejoicing over a fallen soul." And even in this pandemonium once more we hear that haunting melody, the fixed idea, but in a hellish way degraded and transformed into a vulgar caricature, a low dance tune, which has forfeited all its native charm, all its simplicity and purity. As we have said before now, he turns his heart's most sacred melody (this young artist lover) into a cheap dance-hall jig, and tricks it out with twirls and curls and meretricious ornaments, making a wanton of the maid he loved. Is it not monstrous? Can the opium theory excuse it? Possibly it might in actual life; but what business has opium in the free, ideal heavenly realm of art? When beauty ideality, all poetry and purity are lost, art, too, is gone. Give us the most familiar symphony, sonata, overture or quartet of any of the classical composers rather than the most brilliant or dramatic "programme music" of the new, the over-ingenious, audacious, unideal, realistic masters of the latest fashions in the so-called art of music. How refreshing, what a God-send, what a precious bit of heaven's own sunshine would the most unpretentious symphony of Haydn have been after that harrowing "fantastique" and unwholesome dream of opium!

The heartless travesty of the love melody in this last scene leads us to call it up to mind again in its unsophisticated shape, and to ask ourselves how good a melody really is it, after all? Is it free from sophistication at its best? We cannot help feeling that Robert Schumann was about right when he said that "it has something flat about it." We find the impression of its beauty does not stay with us after those earlier hearings. "Somewhat impassioned" it is, and somewhat "timid," but we cannot grant it "noble," as Berlioz would make it in his programme. On the contrary, it is morbid, sickly, cloying, and we soon weary of its repetition. If it were more noble it would not be corruptible, and would not suffer the witch change of that worse than "Walpurgis Night." For was there ever such a fiendish orgy, represented by all the noisiest enginery of the orchestral art? How uncanny those occasional muted or stuffed horn tones sounded! What an overpowering, stunning, coarse and vulgar blare of big brass basses in the caricature of the hymn "Dies Iræ"! Smaller outrages upon human nerves have been prohibited by law. And is that music? Has it any rightful fellowship with true symphonic art? Should it be admitted into good musical society? Let us trust that curiosity is now satisfied about it, and let us seek musical enjoyment, artistic aliment and culture at purer sources. But some there be who love to sup full of horrors better than they love music! And such make up a certain quantum in large concert audiences. Some, too—a larger and a younger number—who are critical on programmes; blasés with the best, fancying that they have sucked all the marrow out of [illegible] Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn [illegible] Schumann; they continually do cry—Give us [illegible] And plentifully have new tion; but is there yet enough of it all collectively to make good the imaginable loss of one great old symphony?

After the long hour of opium even a well worn Hungarian Rhapsody seemed sparkling and reviving, partly through the quaint, piquant nationality of its melodies—some grand, heroic, solemn, some elastic and vivacious, provocative to dancing. It was like a smart shower bath of tones after the sickly, tepid, steamy symphonie fantastique; but we had been dashed with it so many times before! Liszt has composed more than a dozen of these rhapsodies; they all sound very much alike; when you have heard one you have virtually heard them all. The performance this time was irresistibly brilliant and emphatic. And the orchestra acquitted itself admirably throughout the concert, but for the horrible rimbombo in the latter part of the witches' Sabbath.

The programme of Saturday, Dec. 6, offers Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture; a violin concerto of Goldmark to be played for the first time here by Franz Kneisel; and Schumann's second symphony, in C. J. S. D.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Adamowski Quartette Concert—The N. E. C. Club.

Again the exigency of two excellent chamber concerts on the same evening have forced the reviewer to attempt ubiquity, and once more the attempt to be in two places at once has been only partially successful. The audience in Steinert Hall last night was good sized as to quantity, and most representative as to quality, many of the leading musicians of Boston, being present. It is upon hearsay only that I can state that the Beethoven quartette was excellently given, but there was a trifle of roughness in the first movement of the Volkmann Quartette in G minor, which I came in season to listen to. The number, which probably created the most interest of the concert was Arthur Foote's Romance in E major, which was performed by Mr. T. Adamowski and the author. It is a musicianly work, possessing interesting treatment even from the beginning. The imitations of the short, violin phrases by the piano were very piquant, and although the chief theme had a flavor reminiscent of "Hear ye! Israel" in "Elijah," it was by no means such as suggested plagiarism.

Mr. Adamowski played this work like the great artist that he is, when he is at his best; the intonation was generally perfect, even in the highest positions, and the expressive quality with which he invested the violin part can scarcely be given too much commendation. Naturally the piano part was perfect in the hands of the composer. Both artists were cordially recalled. It is of necessity that I judge the whole edifice by these specimen bricks, but the programme so far as I was able to follow its numbers, was of great interest and worth.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

At Steinert Hall last evening the Adamowski Quartette gave the second concert of their third season. Despite the fact that Monday evenings are usually bespoken by the theatres with "first nights," the hall was well filled with a brilliant audience. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Quartette in G major, op. 18, No. 2. ..... Beethoven
Romance for violin and piano in E major, op. 9, No. 3. ..... Arthur Foote
Quartette in G minor, op. 14. ..... Volkmann

If the playing of the quartette was not altogether faultless, especially in the matter of intonation, there was some excellent work in the Beethoven G major. Aside from his uncertain tone at times, Mr. T. Adamowski's phrasing was not always pleasing and the opening bars of the slow movement were taken rather more slowly than even ad lib. required. But in the romance he played with verve, and gave good reason for the justly earned recall. Mr. Foote's composition has been given here before, and a rehearing only adds to the charming impression given then. The Volkmann number was interesting, but in lesser degree than the rendition.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 2, 1890

The Adamowski Concerts.

The second of the subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall before an audience which made up in understanding and appreciation what it lacked in size. The numbers for the quartette were Beethoven's G major, Op. 18, No. 2, and Volkmann's G minor, Op. 14. These were given with the precision and finish to be expected of such artists as compose the organization. The second number of the evening was Mr. Arthur Foote's romance in E major, Op. 9, No. 3, for violin and piano, rendered by the composer himself and Mr. T. Adamowski. The last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DEC. 2, 1890.

The patrons of the Adamowski quartet concerts enjoyed the second concert of this organization at Steinert Hall last evening, when, with Mr. Arthur Foote's assistance, the following works were played: Quartet in G major, No. 2, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza for violin and piano in E major, Foote; quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-musicians acquitted themselves with great credit on this occasion, and Mr. Foote gave his usual excellent support to his own most enjoyable romance.

NEW HAVEN REGISTER, SUNDAY NOVEMBER 30.

Hyperion Theater. - NIKISCH.

As fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage.—N. Y. World.

Boston SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

(SECOND CONCERT.)

Monday Eve., Dec. 8, at 8.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The program includes Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso;" the Schumann Symphony in B flat No. 1; Dvorak's Scherzo Cappriccioso, etc.

MR. KNEISEL will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark.

The sale of seats opens to-morrow (Monday) at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chapel st.

n30 1Su C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The second concert in the course given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at the Hyperion on Monday evening, December 8. The soloist for this occasion will be Franz Kneisel, who will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark. The program includes Listz's symphonic poem "Tasso," the Schumann symphony in B flat No. 1, and several other noted compositions. The concert promises to be one of the best of the series. The sale of seats will open to-morrow at Steinert's music store.

NEW HAVEN EVENING REGISTER, MONDAY, DECEMBER 1,

A week from to-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give another of its delightful concerts at the Hyperion theater. The sale of tickets assures a large house, and, as in former times, an appreciative and enthusiastic one.

The first three nights of this week "Inshavogue" will occupy the boards of the Grand Opera house. The play contains lots of genuine Irish wit and wholesome

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. MAX ZACH, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

:: THIRD SEASON. :::

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL.

THE THIRD CONCERT OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENING,

JANUARY 5TH, 1891.

Clipping from .....

.....

Date 12/90

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lovers of fine music will welcome the announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, to be given in the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. The history and superb playing of this organization are alike familiar to the public of this city. In all essentials the membership is the same as last year, and the opening concerts of the season already given in Boston show that it has lost nothing of its superiority during the summer vacation. At the concerts in Concordia Hall it will appear in full ranks, and programmes of great attractiveness are promised. The sale of season tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open next Friday morning at Talbott's, 13 North Charles street.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa

Date 12-2

GENERAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert, at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, December 10. The programme will comprise works representative of the modern romantic school, from the compositions of Liszt, Dvorak, Goldmark and Schumann. The symphony will be that by the latter composer in B flat. Franz Kneisel will be the violin soloist.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1890.

The corrected Boston Symphony programme for this week is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for Violin, in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark (Mr. Franz Kneisel); Two Melodies for Strings, Grieg; Symphony, No. 2, in C, Schumann.

Tonight Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre Symphony concert. Her selections include Raff's "Dream King and His Love," and a group of songs. The orchestra will play Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosprous Voyage"; overture, two movements from Tscharkousky's fourth symphony, and Schumann's B flat symphony.

An interesting programme is announced for the eighth Sunday Popular at Music Hall, next Sunday evening, when Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Sig. Campanini, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone, and Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cello, as soloists, will be assisted by the newly organized Boston Orchestral Club.

[51]

STEINERT HALL.

SECOND CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 1, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN G MAJOR OP. 18, NO. 2.	BEETHOVEN
ALLEGRO.—ADAGIO CANTABILE.—SCHERZO (ALLEGRO).—ALLEGRO MOLTO, QUASI PRESTO.
ROMANCE FOR VIOLIN AND PIANO, IN E MAJOR, OP. 9, NO. 3,	ARTHUR FOOTE
QUARTET IN G MINOR, OP. 14.	VOLKMANN
ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE.—SCHERZO.—FINALE.

The published order of the six Beethoven quartets which comprise opus 18 is not that in which they were written and it is an interesting fact that two of the least pretending as to style and least elaborate as to construction among them, namely, the A major and the B flat major, should have been the last in the order of production; while, if the dated manuscripts be reliable, the quartet in D, (No. 3), by some considered the most beautiful and original of the set, preceded them all in the design of the composer. Beethoven's model in the quartets of opus 18, which are dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, was Mozart. These six quartets which belong to the "first manner" have often been compared with the set of six composed by Mozart and dedicated to Haydn. The comparison, one writer observes, is not without a good show of reason. Before Beethoven was entirely and unreservedly himself, Mozart was not only his pattern, but his idol (for Haydn, although he studied with him some time, Beethoven entertained no very deep or hearty sympathy); and nowhere do the two masters more nearly approach each other than in the quartets respectively dedicated to Haydn and the Prince Lobkowitz.

In an analytical review by Theodor Helm of all the quartets of Beethoven we find the following on the work played today, the quartet in G major: "The composer toys with his motives, though the style and treatment are formal. Musicians call it the "compliment" quartet, as if one phrase bowed to another. Liken it if you will to a scene in some princely salon during a stately minuet. Note the charming thematic treatment; the sharp contrasts in the second movement. The allegro and the adagio distinctly mark Beethoven's first period. In the finale we meet again the companions of the salon, a little gay from wine. This, which Beethoven called the "unbuttoned" movement, is the richest in merry and surprising turns and twists. Observe the magic effect of the inversion of the leading theme, flung about as in a game of ball. The structure of the movement shows mastership."

The Romance for violin and piano is one of three pieces Mr. Foote has published under opus 9. The others of the set are a "Morning Song" and "Menuetto Serioso." There follows a short sketch of the Romance: After a half dozen bars of introduction by the piano, the violin takes up the melody of the piece and carries it on without interruption until the entrance of the secoud theme, in the relative minor; at this point the piano part alternates with the violin in taking the melody and ceases to be a mere accompaniment. At the return of the first theme (which is emphasized by the abrupt change from the dominant seventh chord of C sharp minor to the tonic of E major) the accompaniment of the piano becomes more varied, and in the coda at the very end the piano takes the melody, under which are heard sustained notes on the G string of the violin.

Robert Volkmann was a Saxon musician who, after studying with Schumann at Leipsic, (1836-38) removed to Prague, then to Pesth, Hungary. He was a prolific writer and at the time of his death, in 1883, had contributed to almost every form of composition, save that of opera. Apropos of his quartets, it may not prove uninteresting to quote from Ehlert's essay on Volkmann some general remarks about the quartet form.

"Amomg the various forms of art, the string-quartet is probably that form by means of which we may establish, with the greatest certainty, the specific value of a musical imagination. As lofty as is the position of Beethoven, that most versatile of tone-artists, upon all other domains, as high as we may place Mozart

---

...ness yet, shouting to true self-...ities and to honest music, insulting to the soul of poetry and art, is the last scene, "The Witches' Revel." Goethe's Mephisto could not conjure up so hideous a "Sabbath." Imps, witches, fiends and all unclean things make the orchestra resound with "yells, howls, cries of despair, and mocking and cruel laughter, the rejoicing over a fallen soul." And even in this pandemonium once more we hear that haunting melody, the fixed idea, but in a hellish way degraded and transformed into a vulgar caricature, a low dance tune, which has forfeited all its native charm, all its simplicity and purity, as we have said before now, he turns his heart's most sacred melody (this young artist over) into a cheap dance-hall jig, and tricks it out with twirls and curls and meretricious ornaments, making a wanton of the maid he loved. Is it not monstrous? Can the opium theory excuse it? Possibly it might in actual life; but what business has opium in the free, ideal, heavenly realm of art? When beauty, ideality, all poetry and purity are lost, art, too, is gone. Give us the most familiar symphony, sonata, overture or quartet of any of the classical composers rather than the most brilliant or dramatic "programme music" of the new, the over-ingenious, audacious, unideal, realistic masters of the latest fashions in the so-called art of music. How refreshing, what a God-send, what a precious bit of heaven's own sunshine would the most unpretentious symphony of Haydn have been after that harrowing "fantasia-tone" and unwholesome dream of opium!

The heartless travesty of the love melody in this last scene leads us to call it up to mind again in its unsophisticated shape, and to ask ourselves how good a melody really is it, after all? Is it free from sophistication at its best? We cannot help feeling that Robert Schumann was about right when he said that it has something flat about it." We find the impression of its beauty does not stay with us ... earlier hearings. "Somewhat impassioned it is, and somewhat "timid," but we cannot grant it "noble," as Berlioz would make us in his programme. On the contrary, it is morbid, sickly, cloying, and we soon weary of its repetition. If it were more noble it would not be so terrible, and would not suffer the witch ... of that worse than "Walpurgis Night." ... was there ever such a fiendish orgy, represented by all the noisiest enginery of the ... How uncanny those occasional ... horn tones sounded! What an ... coarse and vulgar ... brass basses in the caricature of the ... "Dies Irae"! Smaller outrages upon human ... have been prohibited by law. And is ... music? Has it any rightful fellowship with ... art? Should it be admitted ... good musical society? Let us trust that ... is now satisfied about it, and let us ... musical enjoyment, artistic aliment and ... at purer sources. But some there be ... to such fill of horrors better than they ... And such make up a certain quan... concert audiences. Some, too—a ... number—who are critical ... with the best, fancying ... all the narrow cut of ... Mendelssohn ...

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

At Steinert Hall last evening the Adamowski Quartette gave the second concert of their third season. Despite the fact that Monday evenings are usually bespoken by the theatres with "first nights," the hall was well filled with a brilliant audience. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Quartette in G major, op. 18, No. 2.....Beethoven
Romance for violin and piano in E major, op. 9, No. 3.....Arthur Foote
Quartette in G minor, op. 14.....Volkmann

If the playing of the quartette was not altogether faultless, especially in the matter of intonation, there was some excellent work in the Beethoven G major. Aside from his uncertain tone at times, Mr. T. Adamowski's phrasing was not always pleasing and the opening bars of the slow movement were taken rather more slowly than even ad lib. required. But in the romance he played with verve, and gave good reason for the justly earned recall. Mr. Foote's composition has been given here before, and a rehearing only adds to the charming impression given then. The Volkmann number was interesting, but in lesser degree than the rendition.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 2, 1890

The Adamowski Concerts.

The second of the subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall before an audience which made up in understanding and appreciation what it lacked in size. The numbers for the quartette were Beethoven's G major, Op. 18, No. 2, and Volkmann's G minor, Op. 14. These were given with the precision and finish to be expected of such artists as compose the organization. The second number of the evening was Mr. Arthur Foote's romance in E major, Op. 9, No. 3, for violin and piano, rendered by the composer himself and Mr. T. Adamowski. The last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DEC. 2, 1890.

The patrons of the Adamowski quartet concerts enjoyed the second concert of this organization at Steinert Hall last evening, when, with Mr. Arthur Foote's assistance, the following works were played: Quartet in G major, No. 2, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza for violin and piano in E major, Foote; quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-musicians acquitted themselves with great credit on this occasion, and Mr. Foote gave his usual excellent ... to his own most enjoyable romance.

NEW HAVEN REGISTER, SUNDAY NOVEMBER 30.

Hyperion Theater. - NIKISCH.

As fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage.—N. Y. World.

Boston SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
(SECOND CONCERT.)
Monday Eve., Dec. 8, at 8.
SOLOIST:
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The program includes Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso;" the Schumann Symphony in B flat No. 1; Dvorak's Scherzo Cappriccioso, etc.

MR. KNEISEL will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark.

The sale of seats opens to-morrow (Monday) at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chapel st.
n30 18u C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The second concert in the course given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at the Hyperion on Monday evening, December 8. The soloist for this occasion will be Franz Kneisel, who will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark. The program includes Listz's symphonic poem "Tasso," the Schumann symphony in B flat No. 1, and several other noted compositions. The concert promises to be one of the best of the series. The sale of seats will open to-morrow at Steinert's music store.

NEW HAVEN EVENING REGISTER, MONDAY, DECEMBER 1,

A week from to-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give another of its delightful concerts at the Hyperion theater. The sale of tickets assures a large house, and, as in former times, an appreciative and enthusiastic one.

The first three nights of this week "In-shavogue" will occupy the boards of the Grand Opera house. The play contains ... wit and wholesome

---

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 12/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lovers of fine music will welcome the announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, to be given in the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. The history and superb playing of this organization are alike familiar to the public of this city. In all essentials the membership is the same as last year, and the opening concerts of the season already given in Boston show that it has lost nothing of its superiority during the summer vacation. At the concerts in Concordia Hall it will appear in full ranks, and programmes of great attractiveness are promised. The sale of season tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open next Friday morning at Talbott's, 13 North Charles street.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa

Date 12-2

GENERAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert, at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, December 10. The programme will comprise works representative of the modern romantic school, from the compositions of Liszt, Dvorak, Goldmark and Schumann. The symphony will be that, by the latter composer in B flat. Franz Kneisel will be the violin soloist.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1890.

The corrected Boston Symphony programme for this week is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for Violin, in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark (Mr. Franz Kneisel); Two Melodies for Strings, Grieg; Symphony, No. 2, in C, Schumann.

Tonight Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre Symphony concert. Her selections include Raff's "Dream King and His Love," and a group of songs. The orchestra will play Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosprous Voyage"; overture, two movements from Tscharkousky's fourth symphony, and Schumann's B flat symphony.

An interesting programme is announced for the eighth Sunday Popular at Music Hall, next Sunday evening, when Miss ... da Lodi, soprano; Sig. Campanini, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone, and Mr. Leo ..., 'cello, as soloists, will ... the newly organized Boston ...

[51]

in his operas and Haydn in his oratorios, it is in the quartet that these three have given expression to the entire sum of their powers of invention; and it would not be asserting too much to say that, did we simply possess the quartets of these men, and were all their other works lost, we should at all events be able to form from them alone a true and approximately complete picture of these masters' intellectual peculiarities. There are quartet movements by Mozart that contain a half of "Figaro" or of "Don Juan"; quartet-movements by Haydn, that transport us into the same moods as the "Creation" and the "Seasons," and, in Beethoven's three Russian quartets, we encounter his entire being; for it was given to him to confine within the narrow boundaries of the four instruments the boundless circumference of his whole genius. A different thing it is in case of the three exponents of this triple constellation, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann. There can be no doubt of the fact that the specific musicianhood of these masters was not exhibited in its purest form in the quartet, and that we should have possessed but an incomplete, in fact, even erroneous idea of them, had we not recognized their importance in their other works.

If according to the preceding remarks, we are not led to expect in Volkmann's quartets the slightest development whatsoever of that form of art, that was built up with so much love by the greatest musical minds, yet it cannot be denied that among them there is much that is successful and portions even that are excellent. And especial praise may be conferred upon his style, for, with few exceptions, it adapts itself readily to the nature of this abstract music. Now and then we meet with movements possessing great vital power, even originality, notably in those places where the national element bursts forth. His principal weakness lies in the slow movements. Volkmann can not write an adagio in the manner of Beethoven. Beethoven first discovered a good part of our hearts, discovered them for us in this sense, that we only became clearly conscious of a certain power of feeling in tones through the immense life that he alone was capable of stirring in our hearts. What we call "Adagio" since Beethoven's time ended with him. Now-a-days there exist " Andantes" only. For, strange as it may sound, there is an important, and not only metronomical, difference between the two. And the slower a theme is reproduced, the weightier, more substantial and self-contained, the more unapproachable and positive it must be. The post-Beethoven themes do not bear so close an inspection. They crumble into separate parcels, with evident gaps in the feeling, and frequently only maintain their place by a romantic coloring similar to what we witness upon distant mountains, and that vanishes more and more, the nearer we approach. Exactly as we demand another measure, other motions and a different horizon in a tragedy than we do in a comedy, so do we also demand deeper abstraction, grander proportions and a wider range of vision in an Adagio than in an Andante; to the latter we willingly grant that it shall not be required to conjure up and regulate conflicts, but simply to appear like a "Lied," an instrumental song. The majority of the motives from Andantes that now arouse our deepest feelings of pleasure, would only produce an impression of perforated work, were we to hear them performed in adagio tempo.

The first movement of Volkmann's second quartet (op. 14), G minor, is an instructive example of how a happy facility may decide the fate of a musical work. Very few who hear its first movement will not acknowledge its manly and vigorous character. The most substantial share of this falls to the second first theme—we cannot term it otherwise. This penetrating motive, that is as firm as granite, and runs through the vibrating syncopations like a vein of stone, must produce a universal impression.

...ities and to honest music, insulting to the soul of poetry and art, is the last scene, "The Witches' Revel." Goethe's Mephisto could not conjure up so hideous a "Sabbath." Imps, witches, fiends and all unclean things make the orchestra resound with "yells, howls, cries of despair, and mocking and cruel laughter, the rejoicing over a fallen soul." And even in this pandemonium once more we hear that haunting melody, the fixed idea, but in a hellish way degraded and transformed into a vulgar caricature, a low dance tune, which has forfeited all its native charm, all its simplicity and purity. As we have said before now, he turns his heart's most sacred melody (this young artist lover) into a cheap dance-hall jig, and tricks it out with twirls and curls and meretricious ornaments, making a wanton of the maid he loved. Is it not monstrous? Can the opium theory excuse it? Possibly it might in actual ... but what business has opium in the free, ... heavenly realm of art? When beauty, ... reality, all poetry and purity are lost, art, too, ... Give us the most familiar symphony, ... overture or quartet of any of the classical composers rather than the most brilliant or dramatic "programme music" of the new, the ever ingenious, audacious, unideal, realistic masters of the latest fashions in the so-called ... of music. How refreshing, what a God-send, what a precious bit of heaven's own sunshine would the most unpretentious symphony of Haydn have been after that harrowing "fantasique" and unwholesome dream of opium!

The heartless travesty of the love melody ... this last scene leads us to call it up to mind again in its unsophisticated shape, and to ask ourselves how good a melody really is, after all? Is it free from sophistication at its best? We cannot help feeling that Robert Schumann was about right when he said that ... was something flat about it." We find the impression of its beauty does not stay with us ... earlier hearings. "Somewhat impassioned it is, and somewhat "timid," but we cannot grant it "noble," as Berlioz would make it in his programme. On the contrary, it is morbid, sickly, cloying, and we soon weary of its repetition. If it were more noble it would not be corruptible, and would not suffer the witch ... of that worse than "Walpurgis Night." ... was there ever such a fiendish orgy, represented by all the noisiest enginery of the ... art? How uncanny those occasional ... stuffed horn tones sounded! What an ... stunning, coarse and vulgar ... of the brass basses in the caricature of the ... "Dies Irae"! Smaller outrages upon human ... have been prohibited by law. And is ... music? Has it any rightful fellowship with ... symphonic art? Should it be admitted ... good musical society? Let us trust that ... is now satisfied about it, and let us ... musical enjoyment, artistic aliment and ... at purer sources. But some there be ... to see full of horrors better than they ... And such make up a certain quan... concert audiences. Some, too—a ... number—who are critical ... with the best, fancying ... all the marrow out of ... Schubert, Mendelssohn ...

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1890

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

At Steinert Hall last evening the Adamowski Quartette gave the second concert of their third season. Despite the fact that Monday evenings are usually bespoken by the theatres with "first nights," the hall was well filled with a brilliant audience. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Quartette in G major, op. 18, No. 2.....Beethoven
Romance for violin and piano in E major, op. 9, No. 3.....Arthur Foote
Quartette in G minor, op. 14.....Volkmann

If the playing of the quartette was not altogether faultless, especially in the matter of intonation, there was some excellent work in the Beethoven G major. Aside from his uncertain tone at times, Mr. T. Adamowski's phrasing was not always pleasing and the opening bars of the slow movement were taken rather more slowly than even ad lib. required. But in the romance he played with verve, and gave good reason for the justly earned recall. Mr. Foote's composition has been given here before, and a rehearing only adds to the charming impression given then. The Volkmann number was interesting, but in lesser degree than the rendition.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 2, 1890

The Adamowski Concerts.

The second of the subscription concerts by the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening at Steinert Hall before an audience which made up in understanding and appreciation what it lacked in size. The numbers for the quartette were Beethoven's G major, Op. 18, No. 2, and Volkmann's G minor, Op. 14. These were given with the precision and finish to be expected of such artists as compose the organization. The second number of the evening was Mr. Arthur Foote's romance in E major, Op. 9, No. 3, for violin and piano, rendered by the composer himself and Mr. T. Adamowski. The last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DEC. 2, 1890.

The patrons of the Adamowski quartet concerts enjoyed the second concert of this organization at Steinert Hall last evening, when, with Mr. Arthur Foote's assistance, the following works were played: Quartet in G major, No. 2, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza for violin and piano in E major, Foote; quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-musicians acquitted themselves with great credit on this occasion, and Mr. Foote gave his usual excellent ... to his own most enjoyable romance.

NEW HAVEN REGISTER, SUNDAY NOVEMBER 30.

Hyperion Theater. - NIKISCH.

As fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage.—N. Y. World.

Boston SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
(SECOND CONCERT.)
Monday Eve., Dec. 8, at 8.
SOLOIST:
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The program includes Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso;" the Schumann Symphony in B flat No. 1; Dvorak's Scherzo Cappriccioso, etc.

MR. KNEISEL will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark.

The sale of seats opens to-morrow (Monday) at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chapel st.
n30 1Su C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The second concert in the course given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at the Hyperion on Monday evening, December 8. The soloist for this occasion will be Franz Kneisel, who will play the second and third movements of concerto for violin by Goldmark. The program includes Listz's symphonic poem "Tasso," the Schumann symphony in B flat No. 1, and several other noted compositions. The concert promises to be one of the best of the series. The sale of seats will open to-morrow at Steinert's music store.

NEW HAVEN EVENING REGISTER, MONDAY, DECEMBER 1,

A week from to-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give another of its delightful concerts at the Hyperion theater. The sale of tickets assures a large house, and, as in former times, an appreciative and enthusiastic one.

The first three nights of this week "In-shavogue" will occupy the boards of the Grand Opera house. The play contains ... Irish wit and wholesome

---

Clipping from Daily Courier Baltimore Md.
Date 12/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lovers of ... music will welcome the announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, to be given in the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. The history and superb playing of this organization are alike familiar to the public of this city. In all essentials the membership is the same as last year, and the opening concerts of the season already given in Boston show that it has lost nothing of its superiority during the summer vacation. At the concerts in Concordia Hall it will appear in full ranks, and programmes of great attractiveness are promised. The sale of season tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open next Friday morning at Talbott's, 13 North Charles street.

Ledger Philadelphia Pa
Date 12-2

GENERAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert, at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, December 10. The programme will comprise works representative of the modern romantic school, from the compositions of Liszt, Dvorak, Goldmark and Schumann. The symphony will be that by the latter composer in B flat. Franz Kneisel will be the violin soloist.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1890.

The corrected Boston Symphony programme for this week is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for Violin, in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark, (Mr. Franz Kneisel); Two Melodies for Strings, Grieg; Symphony, No. 2, in C, Schumann.

Tonight Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre Symphony concert. Her selections include Raff's "Dream King and His Love," and a group of songs. The orchestra will play Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosprous Voyage"; overture, two movements from Tscharkousky's fourth symphony, and Schumann's B flat symphony.

An interesting programme is announced for the eighth Sunday Popular at Music Hall, next Sunday evening, when Miss Ida ..., soprano; Sig. Campanini, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone, and Mr. ... 'cello, as soloists, will be assisted by the newly organized Boston ...

[51]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Date 12-1

To the Editor of the Bro[illegible]

I wish to echo from upstairs the suggestion of "Dress Circle" as to a Philharmonic conductor and orchestra. Don't suppose for a moment that we in the loftier recesses of the Academy are any less sensible than those downstairs to good music and its adequate performance. I don't see how there can be any question as to the expediency of adopting the plan proposed by your correspondent. To those who have heard the Boston band, either at home or upon its occasional visits to New York, it is unnecessary to say anything about it. Those who have not yet heard it may be assured in unqualified terms of its very high quality. Mr. Nikisch inherited from his predecessor a first class organization and has given to its development his own rare capacity and experience. It is hard to believe that the Philharmonic directors or subscribers could hesitate for a moment between this superb, permanent band and a scrap orchestra, gathered here and there in New York and playing together only a dozen times a year. Is the inconvenience of appointing other days of the week than Friday and Saturday for rehearsals and concerts to be considered for a moment in the comparison? By all means let us have Nikisch. FAMILY CIRCLE.

BROOKLYN, November 30, 1890.

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 3 1890

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Adamowski Quartet—New England Conservatory Club, and Mr Buermann.

The second Adamowski programme of the season, given at Steinert Hall last Monday evening, was: Quartet in G major op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; Romance for violin and piano, in E major, op. 9, No. 3, Arthur Foote; Quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. The usual cultivated audience listened. Of the six Beethoven quartets of opus 18, the one in G is as frequently played, and is as enjoyable as any. The last movement which we find the composer calling the "unbuttoned" movement is not only the strongest in point of workmanship but it possesses undeniable humor. Volkmann's G minor quartet, barring the fine first movement, is less worthy a place in the catalogue of standard works than its companion in E minor. Both works were played with evident appreciation of their characteristics. Mr. Foote's Romance is one of his most spontaneous works. It was charmingly played by Mr. Adamowski, the composer adding the piano accompaniment.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5, 1890.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch Sings at the Sanders Theatre Concert.

Interest in the Symphony concert at Sanders Theatre (Cambridge) last evening centred in the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, as soloist, this being her first appearance in this vicinity. The programme for the evening was as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Raff, song, "Traumkonig und Sein Lieb"; Tschaikowsky, andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano; Schumann, symphony in B flat, No. 1.

Mrs. Nikisch accompanied her husband upon his return to America, two months ago, and has only been heard in public once since her arrival, at the Symphony concert in Providence a few weeks since.

The audience were clearly predisposed in favor of the singer, and when she appeared a most cordial round of friendly applause told of the attitude of the audience toward her. The selections made by Mrs. Nikisch were the song by Raff, "Traumkonig und Sein Lieb," which she sang with orchestral accompaniment, and for the songs with piano she selected Heuberger's "Gieb Einen Hauch Mir," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Goldmark's "Die Quelle." Raff's uninteresting song served to display the remarkable range and admirable schooling of Mrs. Nikisch's voice, and her intelligence and musical nature found expression in its interpolation. She has a very musical mezzo-soprano voice, faultlessly true and skilfully trained, and her phrasing is at all times a delight to the ear. It was in the songs at the piano, however, that the singer captured her audience, and a more complete success is rarely made than that attending these numbers. The simple bit of vocal work done in the Jensen song fairly captivated the audience, and a more pleasing or daintier effort is seldom enjoyed. The applause following the group of songs recalled the singer a half-dozen times, and she was finally compelled to add an encore number to satisfy her audience.

The orchestra was heard at its best in the instrumental work of the evening, and the playing of the accompaniments to the songs, with piano by Mr. Nikisch added greatly to their effect.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DEBUT.

Receives a Cordial Reception in Sanders' Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, last evening before an audience which completely filled the house. Besides the regular subscribers, there were many of the Boston patrons present, drawn thither by the announcement that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, would be the soloist.

As this was Mrs. Nikisch's first appearance in these parts much interest was manifested.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch began her career in opera nine years ago in Cologne at the Stadt Theatre. In 1888 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic for a year. After meeting with the greatest success here she accepted an engagement for one year at the Hof Theatre in Cassel.

During this time she was engaged to Mr. Nikisch, and in 1885 was married to him, and left the operatic stage.

She has sung many times since in concert at Heidelberg, Stuttgart and other large cities. Her debut in America was made Nov. 19 last, in Providence, when the orchestra gave its second in the course of six concerts.

Her voice is a rich mezzo-soprano of delightful quality, and her success in this country is apparently assured. She has a most attractive stage presence, and her singing showed her perfect method and artistic training.

The song with orchestral accompaniment, last evening, was Raff's "Traumkonig und sein Lieb," and was effectively rendered; but the most enjoyable numbers were the three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

The first was Henberger's "Gieb einen Hauch mir;" the second, Jansen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," was a dainty little thing, and drew forth much applause, for which the accompanist came in for a good share; Goldmark's "Die Quelle" was the third.

Mrs. Nikisch was recalled three times, and responded to an encore.

Among the orchestral numbers were Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," a beautiful thing, and Tschaikowski's Andantina and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4 in F minor, the second movement of which brings the stringed instruments pizzicatti.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1890

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The third of the series of concerts given this season at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture—Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage ..... Mendelssohn
Song—Traumkönig und sein Lieb ..... Raff
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony No 4, in F minor ..... Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
(a) "Gieb einen Hauch mir" ..... Heuberger
(b) "Am Ufer des Manzanares" ..... Jensen
(c) "Die Quelle" ..... Goldmark
Symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38 ..... Schumann

The orchestral numbers of the above programme do not call for extended comment, as two of the numbers were familiar, and the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony were reviewed in a late number of the POST. A second hearing of these extracts from the Russian's symphony confirms the impression that the andantino is a movement of real beauty and genuine musical worth; and it is superior to the more popular scherzo with its piquancy which soon becomes monotonous. In the Mendelssohn overture the drummer beat his drums until they became unmusical instruments; it is to be regretted that in this he was aided and abetted by the direct encouragement of the conductor.

Mrs. Nikisch has an agreeable, pleasant voice of good compass and considerable flexibility. She is a delightful contrast to many of the German singers whom we have of late been obliged to hear; for her intonation is correct, she does not scream, she does not force her tones. With the exception of the song by Jensen, her selections were unfortunate. The song by Raff, with orchestral accompaniment, tells of the amours of a dreamking, and tells of them at length. It is a rambling composition which might have been cut short or extended at the caprice of the composer without serious detriment to the coherency of the song. The song of Heuberger was without aim or purport, and that by Goldmark was disappointing. Mrs. Nikisch is not a dramatic singer, nor did her selections give an opportunity of judging of her abilities in bravura work; but she sang intelligently what was given her, and her phrasing was in good taste, supplementing the natural charm of her voice. She was most heartily applauded, and there can be no doubt but that her personality had much to do with the warmth of her reception. To the group of songs Mr. Nikisch played a delightful accompaniment.

PHILIP HALE.

No. American, Phil. Pa.

Date 12-7

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The full programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert is as follows:

Symphony in B flat ..... R. Schumann
Concerto for violin (first time) ..... Goldmark
Scherzo Capricioso ..... A. Dvorak
Symphonic poem, "Tasso" ..... F. Liszt

It will be seen that this selection is exclusively representative of the modern romantic school of composition, and as it is in the interpretation of this class of music that Mr. Nikisch is said to be most in his element, the concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on the evening of Wednesday, December 10, promises to be a most enjoyable and suggestive one. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the orchestra and an admirable violinist, will be the soloist. Seats may now be secured at 1119 Chestnut street.

...ews, New Haven Conn.

Date 12/3

The second Boston Symphony orchestra concert of the season takes place at the Hyperion next Monday night. Arthur Nikisch will be as usual the leader of the orchestra, and Frank Kniesel will be the soloist. Mr. Nikisch will present largely on this occasion music from the modern and romantic school.

lipping from News
Baltimore Md
ate 12 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The announcement of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be read with pleasure by the concert-going public of this city. Five performances will be given at the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. While the principal feature of those concerts is always the playing of the superb body of musicians under its gifted conductor, an additional attraction will be the solo artists who will appear in each concert. Engagements have already been effected with Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the well-known pianiste; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, and Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the noted Russian pianist and unrivalled Chopin player. Sterling programmes, including the works of modern composers as well as of the old masters, are promised. The sale of subscription tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open at Talbott's ticket office, 13 N. Charles-st., next Friday morning.

Bulletin Philadelphia Pa.

Date 12/5

The Programme for the Second Symphony Concert.

The full programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert is as follows:

Symphony in B flat ..... R. Schumann
Concerto for violin (first time) ..... Goldmark
Scherzo Capriccioso ..... A. Dvorak
Symphonic poem, "Tasso" ..... F. Liszt

It will be seen that this selection is exclusively representative of the modern romantic school of composition, and as it is in the interpretation of this class of music that Mr. Nikisch is said to be most in his element, the concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on the evening of Wednesday, December 10, promises to be a most enjoyable and suggestive one. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the orchestra and an admirable violinist, will be the soloist. Seats may now be secured at 1119 Chestnut street.

[52]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

E.....

Date 12-1

To the Editor of the Bro...

I wish to echo from upstairs the suggestion of "Dress Circle" as to a Philharmonic conductor and orchestra. Don't suppose for a moment that we in the loftier recesses of the Academy are any less sensible than those downstairs to good music and its adequate performance. I don't see how there can be any question as to the expediency of adopting the plan proposed by your correspondent. To those who have heard the Boston band, either at home or upon its occasional visits to New York, it is unnecessary to say anything about it. Those who have not yet heard it may be assured in unqualified terms of its very high quality. Mr. Nikisch inherited from his predecessor a first class organization and has given to its development his own rare capacity and experience. It is hard to believe that the Philharmonic directors or subscribers could hesitate for a moment between this superb, permanent band and a scrap orchestra, gathered here and there in New York and playing together only a dozen times a year. Is the inconvenience of appointing other days of the week than Friday and Saturday for rehearsals and concerts to be considered for a moment in the comparison? By all means let us have Nikisch. FAMILY CIRCLE.

BROOKLYN, November 30, 1890.

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 3 1890

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Adamowski Quartet—New England Conservatory Club, and Mr Buermann.

The second Adamowski programme of the season, given at Steinert Hall last Monday evening, was: Quartet in G major op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; Romance for violin and piano, in E major, op. 9, No. 3, Arthur Foote; Quartet in G minor, op. 14, Volkmann. The usual cultivated audience listened. Of the six Beethoven quartets of opus 18, the one in G is as frequently played, and is as enjoyable as any. The last movement which we find the composer calling the "unbuttoned" movement is not only the strongest in point of workmanship but it possesses undeniable humor. Volkmann's G minor quartet, barring the fine first movement, is less worthy a place in the catalogue of standard works than its companion in E minor. Both works were played with evident appreciation of their characteristics. Mr. Foote's Romance is one of his most spontaneous works. It was charmingly played by Mr. Adamowski, the composer adding the piano accompaniment.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5, 1890.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch Sings at the Sanders Theatre Concert.

Interest in the Symphony concert at Sanders Theatre (Cambridge) last evening centred in the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, as soloist, this being her first appearance in this vicinity. The programme for the evening was as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Raff, song, "Traumkonig und Sein Lieb"; Tschaikowsky, andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano; Schumann, symphony in B flat, No. 1.

Mrs. Nikisch accompanied her husband upon his return to America, two months ago, and has only been heard in public once since her arrival, at the Symphony concert in Providence a few weeks since.

The audience were clearly predisposed in favor of the singer, and when she appeared a most cordial round of friendly applause told of the attitude of the audience toward her. The selections made by Mrs. Nikisch were the song by Raff, "Traumkonig und Sein Lieb," which she sang with orchestral accompaniment, and for the songs with piano she selected Heuberger's "Gieb Einen Hauch Mir," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Goldmark's "Die Quelle." Raff's uninteresting song served to display the remarkable range and admirable schooling of Mrs. Nikisch's voice, and her intelligence and musical nature found expression in its interpolation. She has a very musical mezzo-soprano voice, faultlessly true and skilfully trained, and her phrasing is at all times a delight to the ear. It was in the songs at the piano, however, that the singer captured her audience, and a more complete success is rarely made than that attending these numbers. The simple bit of vocal work done in the Jensen song fairly captivated the audience, and a more pleasing or daintier effort is seldom enjoyed. The applause following the group of songs recalled the singer a half-dozen times, and she was finally compelled to add an encore number to satisfy her audience.

The orchestra was heard at its best in the instrumental work of the evening, and the playing of the accompaniments to the songs with piano by Mr. Nikisch added greatly to their effect.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DEBUT.

Receives a Cordial Reception in Sanders' Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, last evening before an audience which completely filled the house. Besides the regular subscribers, there were many of the Boston patrons present, drawn thither by the announcement that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, would be the soloist.

As this was Mrs. Nikisch's first appearance in these parts much interest was manifested.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch began her career in opera nine years ago in Cologne at the Stadt Theatre. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic for a year. After meeting with the greatest success here she accepted an engagement for one year at the Hof Theatre in Cassel.

During this time she was engaged to Mr. Nikisch, and in 1885 was married to him, and left the operatic stage.

She has sung many times since in concert at Heidelberg, Stuttgart and other large cities. Her debut in America was made Nov. 19 last, in Providence, when the orchestra gave its second in the course of six concerts.

Her voice is a rich mezzo-soprano of delightful quality, and her success in this country is apparently assured. She has a most attractive stage presence, and her singing showed her perfect method and artistic training.

The song with orchestral accompaniment, last evening, was Raff's "Traumkonig und sein Lieb," and was effectively rendered; but the most enjoyable numbers were the three songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

The first was Henberger's "Gieb einen Hauch mir;" the second, Jansen's "Am Ufer des Manzaneres," was a dainty little thing, and drew forth much applause, for which the accompanist came in for a good share; Goldmark's "Die Quelle" was the third.

Mrs. Nikisch was recalled three times, and responded to an encore.

Among the orchestral numbers were Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," a beautiful thing, and Tschaikowski's Andantina and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4 in F minor, the second movement of which brings the stringed instruments pizzicatti.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1890

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAMBRIDGE.

The third of the series of concerts given this season at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture—Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage.....Mendelssohn
Song—Traumkönig und sein Lieb.....Raff
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony No 4, in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
(a) "Gieb einen Hauch mir".....Heuberger
(b) "Am Ufer des Manzanares".....Jensen
(c) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
Symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38.....Schumann

The orchestral numbers of the above programme do not call for extended comment, as two of the numbers were familiar, and the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony were reviewed in a late number of the POST. A second hearing of these extracts from the Russian's symphony confirms the impression that the andantino is a movement of real beauty and genuine musical worth; and it is superior to the more popular scherzo with its piquancy which soon becomes monotonous. In the Mendelssohn overture the drummer beat his drums until they became unmusical instruments; it is to be regretted that in this he was aided and abetted by the direct encouragement of the conductor.

Mrs. Nikisch has an agreeable, pleasant voice of good compass and considerable flexibility. She is a delightful contrast to many of the German singers whom we have of late been obliged to hear; for her intonation is correct, she does not scream, she does not force her tones. With the exception of the song by Jensen, her selections were unfortunate. The song by Raff, with orchestral accompaniment, tells of the amours of a dreamking, and tells of them at length. It is a rambling composition which might have been cut short or extended at the caprice of the composer without serious detriment to the coherency of the song. The song of Heuberger was without aim or purport, and that by Goldmark was disappointing. Mrs. Nikisch is not a dramatic singer, nor did her selections give an opportunity of judging of her abilities in bravura work; but she sang intelligently what was given her, and her phrasing was in good taste, supplementing the natural charm of her voice. She was most heartily applauded, and there can be no doubt but that her personality had much to do with the warmth of her reception. To the group of songs Mr. Nikisch played a delightful accompaniment.

PHILIP HALE.

No. American, Phil., Pa.

Date 12-3

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The full programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert is as follows:

Symphony in B flat.....R. Schumann
Concerto for violin (first time).....Goldmark
Scherzo Capricioso.....A. Dvorak
Symphonic poem, "Tasso".....F. Liszt

It will be seen that this selection is exclusively representative of the modern romantic school of composition, and as it is in the interpretation of this class of music that Mr. Nikisch is said to be most in his element, the concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on the evening of Wednesday, December 10, promises to be a most enjoyable and suggestive one. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the orchestra and an admirable violinist, will be the soloist. Seats may now be secured at 1119 Chestnut street.

...e, New Haven Conn.

Date 12/3

The second Boston Symphony orchestra concert of the season takes place at the Hyperion next Monday night. Arthur Nikisch will be as usual the leader of the orchestra, and Frank Kniesel will be the soloist. Mr. Nikisch will present largely on this occasion music from the modern and romantic school.

lipping from News
Baltimore Md
ate 12/3

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The announcement of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be read with pleasure by the concert-going public of this city. Five performances will be given at the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of December 12, January 16, February 27, March 24 and April 28. While the principal feature of those concerts is always the playing of the superb body of musicians under its gifted conductor, an additional attraction will be the solo artists who will appear in each concert. Engagements have already been effected with Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the well-known pianiste; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, and Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the noted Russian pianist and unrivalled Chopin player. Sterling programmes, including the works of modern composers as well as of the old masters, are promised. The sale of subscription tickets, each covering a reserved seat for the five concerts, will open at Talbott's ticket office, 13 N. Charles-st., next Friday morning.

Bulletin Philadelphia Pa.

Date 12/3

The Programme for the Second Symphony Concert.

The full programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert is as follows:

Symphony in B flat.....R. Schumann
Concerto for violin (first time).....Goldmark
Scherzo Capriccioso.....A. Dvorak
Symphonic poem, "Tasso".....F. Liszt

It will be seen that this selection is exclusively representative of the modern romantic school of composition, and as it is in the interpretation of this class of music that Mr. Nikisch is said to be most in his element, the concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on the evening of Wednesday, December 10, promises to be a most enjoyable and suggestive one. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the orchestra and an admirable violinist, will be the soloist. Seats may now be secured at 1119 Chestnut street.

[52]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DÉBUT.—We spoke last week of the success achieved by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the great Boston conductor, at her début, which took place at Providence, R. I., on the occasion of the first concert there this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is what the Providence "Journal" has to say on the subject:

"Furthermore the concert was notable in affording the first public appearance in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose début has been awaited with much pleasant expectation. Mrs. Nikisch, as has already been made known, was before her marriage a dramatic singer in Cologne and Leipsic, in which cities she has won an excellent name; and her coming to America was made the occasion of her reappearance upon the concert stage. From the unqualified success of her performance last evening it was made evident that she will be an important and highly prized addition to American concert singers. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is a mezzo rather than a true soprano, with its best tones in the lower register, but of a delightfully pure and even quality throughout. Her singing of the aria from 'Mignon' was of an exquisitely graceful and touching expressiveness, full of passion and power in the middle portion, touched with a true feeling and animated by an instinctive artistic impulse through its whole extent.

"Mrs. Nikisch's style is essentially lyric, so far as it was shown last evening, and not only was this the dominant note in the 'Mignon' aria, but it was made even more charmingly evident in the three songs by three masters of the German 'Lieder' form. Her singing of these was a delight in its freshness and spontaneity, its just and characteristic interpretation of the sentiment and its freedom from all affectation and exaggeration that so easily spoil the perfect and delicate outlines of such compositions. Especially fine in its breadth and fire was her rendering of the wonderful song of Schumann's; while not the least charming characteristic of the performance was the perfect balance that existed between the singer's work and her husband's refined and exquisitely shaded accompaniments. The three recalls that Mrs. Nikisch responded to after her aria and the two after her group of songs showed the and worked at Graz, has been engaged by Director Pollini as conductor for the Hamburg Opera House. Hamburg thereby gains one of the most thoroughly artistic and brainy operatic conductors.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1890.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Cambridge.

There was not a vacant seat and many were standing in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, when Mr. Arthur Nikisch stepped upon the platform preparatory to beginning the third concert in the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme and the work of the orchestra will be duly reviewed in this column tomorrow. This notice concerns itself mainly with the appearance of the latest addition to our force of concert singers, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who on this occasion was heard for the first time by Boston connoisseurs.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was in fact the central figure of the concert. She was received in the friendliest fashion by the representative Cambridge audience, reinforced by several constant attendants on the Boston concerts of the orchestra, and straightway sang her way to the hearts of her hearers. Raff's song of "The Dream King and his Love" displayed to high advantage the sympathetic mezzo-soprano voice which Mrs. Nikisch uses most artistically. "Genuinely pleasurable singing," a comment many times repeated after the concert, tells in few words the charm produced by an unaffected style, a well-modulated voice, nice phrasing, and the air of singing for pure pleasure. This summing up of her qualities, emphasized by the singer's performances of a group of short songs, the second of which, Jensen's "On the Bank of the Manzanares," proved especially delightful. The others in this group, all of which were sung with pianoforte accompaniment, played, gracefully as usual, by Mr. Nikisch, were "Give Me a Hope," by Heuberger, and "The Spring," by Goldmark. The titles as printed here, by the way, are translations of the German titles printed on the programme, and German was the tongue which the singer used. Raff's song was accompanied by the orchestra. Mrs. Nikisch, a pretty picture in her ashes-of-roses gown with her wavy nut-brown hair, fair throat and arms and sweet face, was recalled again and again, and at last graciously sung Schumann's "Spring Night." So complete was her mastery of the audience that it will be strange indeed if when she shall be heard in Boston the experience shall not be repeated.

Boston Daily Courier

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1890.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

There was a charming audience last night in the most admirable hall for music in this part of the country, the Sanders Theatre of Harvard University. The occasion was the third Symphony concert, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soloist. The orchestra played what has already been discussed this season in this column. Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra in Providence a short time since, but had not been heard hereabouts before. Her selections were Raff's "Dream King and His Love," with orchestra, and these songs: Heuberger, "Geib Einen Hauch Mir"; Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares"; Goldmark, "Die Quelle." By reason of her sweet ways, and soulful singing Mrs. Nikisch will win many admirers for her work in public. She has a rich and sympathetic mezzo soprano, about as strong a voice as Mrs. Henschel. It is probably not under as good control now as when she sang in public all the time—voices, like pianists' hands and violinists' arms, have to be exercised—yet from the standpoint of the vocalist Mrs. Nikisch sings well. Her singing is vital because of its high expressive quality; moreover, she is so well able to control tone as to give to the mood of what she sings its appropriate color. Altogether the debut of Mrs. Nikisch was most interesting. Her manner is charming, and it is no wonder that all Cambridge admired her last night, nor that her husband permitted her just one tiny encore song.

COMMONWEALTH

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1890.

The seventh Symphony concert had for a conspicuous number the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. An exercise in hallucination resting upon a "fixed idea" might be added as a sub-title to this work of questionable music though of unquestionable inventive power. The work is the tribute of the youth Berlioz to his beloved Miss Smithson, and in its contrasting moods may now be taken as a picture of the life he afterward led with her. As a study in instrumentation, the symphony is important, and when we consider that it was written by a young student it becomes remarkable; for with all its eccentric and bizarre combinations it shows an extraordinary grasp of orchestral technique and great creative ability. Though the dominating movements, the "March to Execution," and the "Witches' Revel," are morbid art, there is a purer musical character in the "Scene in the Fields"—the theatreism here being but the natural development of Beethoven's "Pastoral"—while the Ball scene is exquisite at all points. Mr. Nikisch read the Symphony with a full appreciation of its hideousness. The other orchestral pieces at the concert, where no soloist was provided, were the "Euryanthe" overture and the first of the Liszt Rapsodies. As the overture was performed last year under Mr. Nikisch, one wonders if he forgets his public here in his admiration for Master Weber's composition.

The record to date includes three chamber concerts. The second Adamowski Quartet programme presented no novelty; the ensemble numbers were the second of Beethoven's six quartets, published under opus 18, and Volkmann's quartet in G minor. The G major of Beethoven does not show the greatest quartet writer in his individual strength, as it belongs to the period of musical infancy while yet the influence of Haydn and Mozart dominated him; but there is in the last movement a greater individuality than elsewhere, also a racy kind of humor. Volkmann's music is unequal: scholasticism and sentiment combined make the first movement of the G minor quartet an admirable piece of work, but the other portions are weak. The Adamowski group is working hard for honors and is deserving of many a compliment for the expressive quality of all it does. Between the two quartet numbers at the concert, Mr. Arthur Foote's lovely Romanza for violin with piano accompaniment was played. It is a delightful expression of Mr. Foote's musicianship, and the solo part was played with all Mr. Adamowski's whilom sentiment.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1890. TI

The program of the Seventh Symphony concert appears to be a sop thrown to the so-called "romantic element" of the audience; but the liquor in which this sop was steeped was raw and uncunningly prepared.

* * * * * *

First, the overture to "Euryanthe" was played. Mr. Nikisch played it last year, and it has been heard in this city upon several other occasions, even before Mr. Nikisch sighted Castle Garden. The only reason apparently for its appearance upon Saturday's program was to give the director a chance of showing how differently it sounded each time it was led by him; and in this peculiarity, he is not unlike the juggler who pours different wines, both white and red, out of the same old glass bottle. Now in the case of this overture it is perfectly proper, it is in fact a matter of tradition (as pointed out by that experienced man, Heinrich Dorn) to play the air in B-flat given to the first violins at a slower pace than the fiery first motive, and to sing it as though it came from human lips; but the change in tempo should be so gradually worked that the hearer is not rudely shaken thereby. Mr. Nikisch does not approach the melody; he plumps into it. Then, too, his theatrical mannerisms, his prolonged fermatas and his exaggerated ideas as to the claims of the brass and drums to be heard, are becoming tiresome. They cease to create surprise or wonder.

* * * * *

Then there was a Liszt Rhapsody, the No. 1 in F. It was not badly played; on the contrary in it was seen the best work of the orchestra that evening. But it afforded no contrast to the other numbers of the program.

* * * * *

We have actually lived to see the composition of a Frenchman upon a Symphony program, a composition chosen by the director and not by a player of solos. Last year Mr. Nikisch favored us in a similar manner, and his choice was even less fortunate than upon this occasion; for the overture to "Phèdre" does not show Massenet at his best, nor is the symphony of Berlioz the greatest of his works. Yet it is great in certain respects; or it is perhaps better to say that it abounds in great things. It is hard in speaking of this fantastic work to separate the man from the musician, and as the man's individuality is intense, so too is the program explanatory of the music more vividly drawn than the customary diagrams of composers. It is a sketch in the manner of Hoffmann of the ill-starred passion of a super-sensitive musician who was so haunted by the fixed idea of the loved one, seeing her in brilliant ball and lonely fields, knowing that she did not heed his sorrow or his love, that he poisoned himself with opium; yet he did not die, and he dreamed dreams of horror and saw the scaffold welcome him as murderer of the woman; he is dead and witches and warlocks howl with glee at his burial and greet with frenzy the woman, now lost and obscene, who has destroyed his soul; the Dies Irae though it tells of the judgment is hooted at, and Hell rejoices, and mocks the plain song of the holy Church. Now it is as hard to "write up" to such a program as it is to live up to the rules of conduct so placidly laid down by ancient Stoics. Nor is the program-preface of so much importance as the musical contents themselves. The first movement is comparatively dull; its themes lack spontaneity, and the developments are tiresome; the "typical" melody would not be of interest, were we not told that it represented something; and as we at once try to trace this resemblance, we are obliged to take notice of the tune. The movement as a whole is vague and long spun out. The ball-scene is much better and as played in Paris is full of charming grace; as played Saturday evening, the feet of the dancers moved heavily, and the ball-room became a dance-house. Were not the third movement "In the Fields" so long drawn out, it would be wholly admirable. It is truly expressive music, where the intimate acquaintance of Berlioz with orchestral instruments is openly shown, not hinted at. So too the "March to the Gallows" is full of power and suggestion. The final movement, "The Witches' Revel," is tiresome, the last adjective which Berlioz would have wished or expected to have been applied to this descriptive music. It is a dreary, cacophonous mess, an interminable galimatias. The burlesque Dies Irae may have had its origin in the manner in which it was handled by the organist of an Italian church, the occasion being the burial of the son of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense, which funeral Berlioz attended. As Berlioz describes it in a letter to Ferrand, the organist enlivened the plain song by playing jigs in six-eight time as interludes upon the piccolo stop. However this may be, the movement in spite of the accumulated horrors does not so much inspire terror as fatigue.

* * * * *

To say that the symphony was badly played would be untrue. It is a difficult composition, and taking everything into consideration, there was much more to praise than to blame. The performance did lack the fiery recklessness so indispensable in certain movements, and the ball scene was not played with elegance as Berlioz wished. This was rather the fault of the director than of the orchestra; for it seemed as though Mr. Nikisch was constantly saying to himself, "I suppose I ought to occasionally let these people hear something besides the overtures of Weber and Mendelssohn and the symphonies which I used to hear in Leipzig. I am safe enough in giving this, for Schumann praised it." And so he led it, but in a certain perfunctory manner. Nor was strict attention paid to the requirements of Berlioz' score.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang Thursday evening at the Sanders Theater, Cambridge, at a concert given by the Symphony Orchestra. Her selections, with the exception of Jensen's pretty "Am Ufer des Manzanares," were not pleasing. Her voice, agreeable in quality, is light and without much color; she uses it with considerable taste, and she does not offend by false intonation and shrieking, as do so many of her German sister singers. In no sense of the word is she a great or remarkable singer, but she will, without doubt, always please in a small hall and in judicious selections. She was loudly and persistently applauded last Thursday evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch's seventh programme had not the merits of contrast, but it had the value of progression in force and excitability, and was either immensely liked or tremendously disliked by the auditors, according to their tastes and the states of their nerves. It began with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which was not so well played as it has been heard under Mr. Gericke or even under Mr. Nikisch last year; it sounded too much as if the conductor wanted to have it off his hands in order to plunge into something else which he liked better, and the ferocious kettle-drum player wreaked havoc on the general effect whenever he could Next came the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz—that work which is an epitome of so many moods of his passionate, ambitious, rebellious and unsatisfied soul. Ostensibly built about a theme intended, like that of the "Harold" symphony, to suggest the passage of one being through the various episodes which stud a vital progress from the yearning dreams of passion to despair, doom and demoniac mockery, it soon overwhelms this lonely and feeble subject with the whirling mass of its emotion and the tremendous weight of its extravagant scoring. Berlioz's genius was unbalanced and his expression of it unequal and often exasperating; he made scarcely less than preposterous demands in the composition of his ideal orchestra and he devised combinations which probably could never attain the effects he devised. But he stirred moods and touched passions as none had done before him and none has done since. Not that his scores alone record and evoke emotions, but that their peculiarly pungent and potent fashions were his own, and while they are often extraordinary and objectionable, they do portray supreme moments and compel sympathy for them. Mr. Nikisch gave his own fancy and his orchestra free rein, and in a broad and romantic way expressed the spirit of the symphony. A normal band of eighty cannot attain what Berlioz idealized in an orchestra three times as large, and the necessary substitutions made in the scheme of instrumentation did not always compensate in quality or in quantity of tone. Moreover, Mr. Nikisch does not take kindly to those details by which so much can be done when might is unattainable, and so the rendering lost something of the poetry which belongs to the work. A bold, free and enthusiastic performance of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody capped the climax of the evening, and any other than the conventional Symphony audience would have been keyed up to the pitch of shouting when it got into the street. Tonight the programme will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schumann's second symphony, Goldmark's violin concerto (new) to be played by Mr. Kneisel, and a couple of new little things by Grieg.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

On Monday evening, in Steinert Hall, the Adamowski Quartette gave their second concert, playing from Beethoven and Volkmann and adding Mr. Foote's romance for violin and piano, in which they had the author's assistance.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1890.

THE MUSIC HALL "POP."

The eighth Sunday "Pop" at Music Hall, last evening, attracted an audience that by its immense numbers left not a shadow of doubt as to the popularity of the artists engaged for the occasion, these being Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. C. Del Puente, the barytone; Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club. The honors of the evening were equally shared by Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente, and both these talented artists put forward their best efforts on this occasion. The renewed vigor, purity and musical quality of Sig. Campanini's voice were again as apparent as when he sang here a few weeks ago, and he gave his most delightful vocal work in Ponchielli's aria "Cielo e Mar" from "Gioconda," and the song by Tosti, "Vorrei Morire," both of which created the greatest enthusiasm among the audience by reason of the merits of their interpretation by this consummate artist. Recall after recall followed each selection, and necessitated additional efforts by the singer, who should be spared such unreasonable demands upon his voice.

Sig. Del Puente had quite as enthusiastic a reception, and the friendly rivalry between the two men singers resulted most happily for the audience. Sig. Del Puente chose as his selections the aria "Di Provenza" and a couple of his own song compositions, "From Flower to Flower" and "Why?" thus giving himself an opportunity of being heard to the best possible advantage. The "Traviata" aria seldom has a better hearing than when it is sung by this accomplished singer, and he woke the audience to a grand ovation in his honor at the close. The tuneful songs from his own portfolio are good evidences of Sig. Del Puente's musical nature, and well worthy the efforts of even so good an artist as he is. He was gracious as usual in responding to the applause of his audience, and fully maintained his great popularity with the Boston public in his appearances.

Miss Ida Klein was heard with much pleasure in the "Jewel Song," from "Faust," and some ballads by Jensen, the former displaying the admirable training of her voice to excellent advantage, and the latter, with added encore numbers, her fine taste and intelligence as a ballad singer.

The three vocalists were also heard in the familiar trio "I Lombardi," which created great enthusiasm, despite the late hour at which it was reached in the programme.

Mr. Leo Schulz gave some excellent 'cello playing in his solo number, which displayed his technical attainments to splendid advantage.

The Boston Orchestral Club, made up of Mr. E. Fielder and Mr. J. Hoffman, violins; Mr. S. Goldstein, viola; Mr. L. Schulz, violoncello; Mr. A. [illegible]stein, bass, and Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, made its first public appearance on this occasion. The players of the organization are all well and favorably known as musicians of rare ability and extensive experience in orchestral work, and their efforts as an organization [illegible] predicted without hesitation [illegible] selected the [illegible]

[53]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DÉBUT.—We spoke last week of the success achieved by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the great Boston conductor, at her début, which took place at Providence, R. I., on the occasion of the first concert there this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is what the Providence "Journal" has to say on the subject:

"Furthermore the concert was notable in affording the first public appearance in this country of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose début has been awaited with much pleasant expectation. Mrs. Nikisch, as has already been made known, was before her marriage a dramatic singer in Cologne and Leipsic, in which cities she has won an excellent name; and her coming to America was made the occasion of her reappearance upon the concert stage. From the unqualified success of her performance last evening it was made evident that she will be an important and highly prized addition to American concert singers. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is a mezzo rather than a true soprano, with its best tones in the lower register, but of a delightfully pure and even quality throughout. Her singing of the aria from 'Mignon' was of an exquisitely graceful and touching expressiveness, full of passion and power in the middle portion, touched with a true feeling and animated by an instinctive artistic impulse through its whole extent.

"Mrs. Nikisch's style is essentially lyric, so far as it was shown last evening, and not only was this the dominant note in the 'Mignon' aria, but it was made even more charmingly evident in the three songs by three masters of the German 'Lieder' form. Her singing of these was a delight in its freshness and spontaneity, its just and characteristic interpretation of the sentiment and its freedom from all affectation and exaggeration that so easily spoil the perfect and delicate outlines of such compositions. Especially fine in its breadth and fire was her rendering of the wonderful song of Schumann's; while not the least charming characteristic of the performance was the perfect balance that existed between the singer's work and her husband's refined and exquisitely shaded accompaniments. The three recalls that Mrs. Nikisch responded to after her aria and the two after her group of songs showed the and worked at Graz, has been engaged by Director Pollini as conductor for the Hamburg Opera House. Hamburg thereby gains one of the most thoroughly artistic and brainy operatic conductors.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1890.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Cambridge.

There was not a vacant seat and many were standing in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, when Mr. Arthur Nikisch stepped upon the platform preparatory to beginning the third concert in the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme and the work of the orchestra will be duly reviewed in this column tomorrow. This notice concerns itself mainly with the appearance of the latest addition to our force of concert singers, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who on this occasion was heard for the first time by Boston connoisseurs.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was in fact the central figure of the concert. She was received in the friendliest fashion by the representative Cambridge audience reinforced by several constant attendants on the Boston concerts of the orchestra, and straightway sang her way to the hearts of her hearers. Raff's song of "The Dream King and his Love" displayed to high advantage the sympathetic mezzo-soprano voice which Mrs. Nikisch uses most artistically. "Genuinely pleasurable singing," a comment many times repeated after the concert, tells in few words the charm produced by an unaffected style, a well-modulated voice, nice phrasing, and the air of singing for pure pleasure. This summing up of her qualities, emphasized by the singer's performances of a group of short songs, the second of which, Jensen's "On the Bank of the Manzanares," proved especially delightful. The others in this group, all of which were sung with pianoforte accompaniment, played, gracefully as usual, by Mr. Nikisch, were "Give Me a Hope," by Heuberger, and "The Spring," by Goldmark. The titles as printed here, by the way, are translations of the German titles printed on the programme, and German was the tongue which the singer used. Raff's song was accompanied by the orchestra. Mrs. Nikisch, a pretty picture in her ashes-of-roses gown with her wavy nut-brown hair, fair throat and arms and sweet face, was recalled again and again, and at last graciously sung Schumann's "Spring Night." So complete was her mastery of the audience that it will be strange indeed if when she shall be heard in Boston the experience shall not be repeated.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1890.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

There was a charming audience last night in the most admirable hall for music in this part of the country, the Sanders Theatre of Harvard University. The occasion was the third Symphony concert, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soloist. The orchestra played what has already been discussed this season in this column. Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra in Providence a short time since, but had not been heard hereabouts before. Her selections were Raff's "Dream King and His Love," with orchestra, and these songs: Heuberger, "Geib Einen Hauch Mir"; Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares"; Goldmark, "Die Quelle." By reason of her sweet ways, and soulful singing Mrs. Nikisch will win many admirers for her work in public. She has a rich and sympathetic mezzo soprano, about as strong a voice as Mrs. Henschel. It is probably not under as good control now as when she sang in public all the time—voices, like pianists' hands and violinists' arms, have to be exercised—yet from the standpoint of the vocalist Mrs. Nikisch sings well. Her singing is vital because of its high expressive quality; moreover, she is so well able to control tone as to give to the mood of what she sings its appropriate color. Altogether the debut of Mrs. Nikisch was most interesting. Her manner is charming, and it is no wonder that all Cambridge admired her last night, nor that her husband permitted her just one tiny encore song.

COMMONWEALTH

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1890.

The seventh Symphony concert had for a conspicuous number the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. An exercise in hallucination resting upon a "fixed idea" might be added as a sub-title to this work of questionable music though of unquestionable inventive power. The work is the tribute of the youth Berlioz to his beloved Miss Smithson, and in its contrasting moods may now be taken as a picture of the life he afterward led with her. As a study in instrumentation, the symphony is important, and when we consider that it was written by a young student it becomes remarkable; for with all its eccentric and bizarre combinations it shows an extraordinary grasp of orchestral technique and great creative ability. Though the dominating movements, the "March to Execution," and the "Witches' Revel," are morbid art, there is a purer musical character in the "Scene in the Fields"—the theatreism here being but the natural development of Beethoven's "Pastoral"—while the Ball scene is exquisite at all points. Mr. Nikisch read the Symphony with a full appreciation of its hideousness. The other orchestral pieces at the concert, where no soloist was provided, were the "Euryanthe" overture and the first of the Liszt Rapsodies. As the overture was performed last year under Mr. Nikisch, one wonders if he forgets his public here in his admiration for Master Weber's composition.

The record to date includes three chamber concerts. The second Adamowski Quartet programme presented no novelty; the ensemble numbers were the second of Beethoven's six quartets, published under opus 18, and Volkmann's quartet in G minor. The G major of Beethoven does not show the greatest quartet writer in his individual strength, as it belongs to the period of musical infancy while yet the influence of Haydn and Mozart dominated him; but there is in the last movement a greater individuality than elsewhere, also a racy kind of humor. Volkmann's music is unequal: scholasticism and sentiment combined make the first movement of the G minor quartet an admirable piece of work, but the other portions are weak. The Adamowski group is working hard for honors and is deserving of many a compliment for the expressive quality of all it does. Between the two quartet numbers at the concert, Mr. Arthur Foote's lovely Romanza for violin with piano accompaniment was played. It is a delightful expression of Mr. Foote's musicianship, and the solo part was played with all Mr. Adamowski's whilom sentiment.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1890 TI

The program of the Seventh Symphony concert appears to be a sop thrown to the so-called "romantic element" of the audience; but the liquor in which this sop was steeped was raw and uncunningly prepared.

* * * * *

First, the overture to "Euryanthe" was played. Mr. Nikisch played it last year, and it has been heard in this city upon several other occasions, even before Mr. Nikisch sighted Castle Garden. The only reason apparently for its appearance upon Saturday's program was to give the director a chance of showing how differently it sounded each time it was led by him; and in this peculiarity, he is not unlike the juggler who pours different wines, both white and red, out of the same old glass bottle. Now in the case of this overture it is perfectly proper, it is in fact a matter of tradition (as pointed out by that experienced man, Heinrich Dorn) to play the air in B-flat given to the first violins at a slower pace than the fiery first motive, and to sing it as though it came from human lips; but the change in tempo should be so gradually worked that the hearer is not rudely shaken thereby. Mr. Nikisch does not approach the melody; he plumps into it. Then, too, his theatrical mannerisms, his prolonged fermatas and his exaggerated ideas as to the claims of the brass and drums to be heard, are becoming tiresome. They cease to create surprise or wonder.

* * * * *

Then there was a Liszt Rhapsody, the No. 1 in F. It was not badly played; on the contrary in it was seen the best work of the orchestra that evening. But it afforded no contrast to the other numbers of the program.

* * * * *

We have actually lived to see the composition of a Frenchman upon a Symphony program, a composition chosen by the director and not by a player of solos. Last year Mr. Nikisch favored us in a similar manner, and his choice was even less fortunate than upon this occasion; for the overture to "Phèdre" does not show Massenet at his best, nor is the symphony of Berlioz the greatest of his works. Yet it is great in certain respects; or it is perhaps better to say that it abounds in great things. It is hard in speaking of this fantastic work to separate the man from the musician, and as the man's individuality is intense, so too is the program explanatory of the music more vividly drawn than the customary diagrams of composers. It is a sketch in the manner of Hoffmann of the ill-starred passion of a super-sensitive musician who was so haunted by the fixed idea of the loved one, seeing her in brilliant ball and lonely fields, knowing that she did not heed his sorrow or his love, that he poisoned himself with opium; yet he did not die, and he dreamed dreams of horror and saw the scaffold welcome him as murderer of the woman; he is dead and witches and warlocks howl with glee at his burial and greet with frenzy the woman, now lost and obscene, who has destroyed his soul; the Dies Irae though it tells of the judgment is hooted at, and Hell rejoices, and mocks the plain song of the holy Church. Now it is as hard to "write up" to such a program as it is to live up to the rules of conduct so placidly laid down by ancient Stoics. Nor is the program-preface of so much importance as the musical contents themselves. The first movement is comparatively dull; its themes lack spontaneity, and the developments are tiresome; the "typical" melody would not be of interest, were we not told that it represented something; and as we at once try to trace this resemblance, we are obliged to take notice of the tune. The movement as a whole is vague and long spun out. The ball-scene is much better and as played in Paris is full of charming grace; as played Saturday evening, the feet of the dancers moved heavily, and the ball-room became a dance-house. Were not the third movement "In the Fields" so long drawn out, it would be wholly admirable. It is truly expressive music, where the intimate acquaintance of Berlioz with orchestral instruments is openly shown, not hinted at. So too the "March to the Gallows" is full of power and suggestion. The final movement, "The Witches' Revel," is tiresome, the last adjective which Berlioz would have wished or expected to have been applied to this descriptive music. It is a dreary, cacophonous mess, an interminable galimatias. The burlesque Dies Irae may have had its origin in the manner in which it was handled by the organist of an Italian church, the occasion being the burial of the son of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense, which funeral Berlioz attended. As Berlioz describes it in a letter to Ferrand, the organist enlivened the plain song by playing jigs in six-eight time as interludes upon the piccolo stop. However this may be, the movement in spite of the accumulated horrors does not so much inspire terror as fatigue.

* * * * *

To say that the symphony was badly played would be untrue. It is a difficult composition, and taking everything into consideration, there was much more to praise than to blame. The performance did lack the fiery recklessness so indispensable in certain movements, and the ball scene was not played with elegance as Berlioz wished. This was rather the fault of the director than of the orchestra; for it seemed as though Mr. Nikisch was constantly saying to himself, "I suppose I ought to occasionally let these people hear something besides the overtures of Weber and Mendelssohn and the symphonies which I used to hear in Leipzig. I am safe enough in giving this, for Schumann praised it." And so he led it, but in a certain perfunctory manner. Nor was strict attention paid to the requirements of Berlioz' score.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang Thursday evening at the Sanders Theater, Cambridge, at a concert given by the Symphony Orchestra. Her selections, with the exception of Jensen's pretty "Am Ufer des Manzanares," were not pleasing. Her voice, agreeable in quality, is light and without much color; she uses it with considerable taste, and she does not offend by false intonation and shrieking, as do so many of her German sister singers. In no sense of the word is she a great or remarkable singer, but she will, without doubt, always please in a small hall and in judicious selections. She was loudly and persistently applauded last Thursday evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch's seventh programme had not the merits of contrast, but it had the value of progression in force and excitability, and was either immensely liked or tremendously disliked by the auditors, according to their tastes and the states of their nerves. It began with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which was not so well played as it has been heard under Mr. Gericke or even under Mr. Nikisch last year; it sounded too much as if the conductor wanted to have it off his hands in order to plunge into something else which he liked better, and the ferocious kettle-drum player wreaked havoc on the general effect whenever he could Next came the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz—that work which is an epitome of so many moods of his passionate, ambitious, rebellious and unsatisfied soul. Ostensibly built about a theme intended, like that of the "Harold" symphony, to suggest the passage of one being through the various episodes which stud a vital progress from the yearning dreams of passion to despair, doom and demoniac mockery, it soon overwhelms this lonely and feeble subject with the whirling mass of its emotion and the tremendous weight of its extravagant scoring. Berlioz's genius was unbalanced and his expression of it unequal and often exasperating; he made scarcely less than preposterous demands in the composition of his ideal orchestra and he devised combinations which probably could never attain the effects he devised. But he stirred moods and touched passions as none had done before him and none has done since. Not that his scores alone record and evoke emotions, but that their peculiarly pungent and potent fashions were his own, and while they are often extraordinary and objectionable, they do portray supreme moments and compel sympathy for them. Mr. Nikisch gave his own fancy and his orchestra free rein, and in a broad and romantic way expressed the spirit of the symphony. A normal band of eighty cannot attain what Berlioz idealized in an orchestra three times as large, and the necessary substitutions made in the scheme of instrumentation did not always compensate in quality or in quantity of tone. Moreover, Mr. Nikisch does not take kindly to those details by which so much can be done when might is unattainable, and so the rendering lost something of the poetry which belongs to the work. A bold, free and enthusiastic performance of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody capped the climax of the evening, and any other than the conventional Symphony audience would have been keyed up to the pitch of shouting when it got into the street. Tonight the programme will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schumann's second symphony, Goldmark's violin concerto (new) to be played by Mr. Kneisel, and a couple of new little things by Grieg.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

On Monday evening, in Steinert Hall, the Adamowski Quartette gave their second concert, playing from Beethoven and Volkmann and adding Mr. Foote's romance for violin and piano, in which they had the author's assistance.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1890.

THE MUSIC HALL "POP."

